This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

PREFACE.

In the thirty-sixth volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER the characteristics of the publication will be found unaltered. Every endeavour has been made to render the reports succinct and accurate, and they have been published as soon as possible after the decisions have been pronounced. It is believed that the cases in this volume may be cited with the confidence which the Profession has always placed in the WEEKLY REPORTER.

The Annual Digest contains, as usual, a summary of all the cases published during the past year in the WEEKLY REPORTER and in the Law Reports, the Law Journal Reports, and the Law Times Reports, besides those given in the Irish Reports.

THE

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1887-88.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. Oct. 24.

BIRD v. ANDREW. (a.)

Practice—Appeals—Case in the general list—Application for postponement—Sufficient reason.

An application to postpone the hearing of an appeal which is in the general list, though made with the consent of all parties, will not be granted as a matter of course. The court requires some sufficient reason for the postponement to be shown. The fact that negotiations with a view to settlement of the appeal are pending is such sufficient reason.

Motion.

This case stood third in the general list of appeals for these sittings, but was not in the cause list of the day (the 24th of October).

F. T. Procter, with the consent of all parties to the action, moved on the first day of the sittings (24th of October) that the appeal might be postponed for three weeks, on the ground that certain witnesses, whose examination would probably have to be taken orally, would have to come up from Wales, and that the solicitor of one of the parties was at present abroad.

COTTON, L.J.—It is a great mistake to suppose that an application for the postponement of the hearing of an appeal in the list, made with the consent of all parties, will be granted as a matter of course. Parties cannot be allowed to settle the list for themselves. Appeals must come on for hearing in their due course unless a sufficient reason is shown to the court for postponing them. If parties desire that their cases should not come on in their regular turn they must apply to the court and show the court sufficient reason for granting the application. No sufficient cause has been shown here, and the application must, therefore, be refused.

LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ., concurred.

Solicitors, H. P. Cobb; H. Thomas.

NOTE.—Subsequently an application made in another cause for the postponement of an appeal appearing in the general list, though not in the cause list of the day, was granted, counsel stating that the postponement was sought with a view to enable the parties to complete terms of arrangement then in progress for the purpose of settling the matter in dispute.

SHEPPARD v. SCINDE, PUNJAUB, AND DELHI RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway company—Purchase of undertaking by Government—Fully paid-up stock—Shares partly paid up—Division of purchase-money.

The capital of the Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Railway Co. comprised stock consisting of £20 shares which had been fully paid up, and of £20 shares upon which £5 only had been paid. The company had, under the Act incorporating it, power to call up the amount unpaid on the shares, but had never done so.

The Government of India purchased the undertaking of the company under statutory provisions, and this action was brought to determine the manner in which the purchase-money was to be distributed amongst the stockholders and shareholders respectively.

Dividends were payable to the shareholders in accordance with the provisions of the 120th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, which was incorporated in the Acts governing the company.

Held, that the holders of partly-paid shares and holders of stock were entitled to have the purchase-money divided between them rateably in proportion to the amounts paid by them respectively, so that each holder of £20 stock would receive four times as much as each holder of a £20 share on which £5 had been paid.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (35 W. R. 516), affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., reported 35 W. R. 516.

The facts fully appear from the report in the court below.

Rigby, Q.C., R. S. Wright, and C. A. Reeve, for the appellant.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Barber, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the respondents.

The arguments and cases referred to were the same as in the court below.

June 28.—COTTON, L.J.—The question has been argued at great length, but its determination does not depend on what ought to be done in the case of the winding up of a company. The only winding up here is under the Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Railway Purchase Act, 1886, and that Act cannot be used by the appellant in support of his contention that the same rules are to apply here as in the case of an ordinary winding up.

The only question we have to consider is whether the directors are right in the division they propose of the purchase-money received from the Secretary of State for India. The plaintiff claims that, as between the holders of the partly paid-up shares (£20 shares with £5 per share paid up) and the holders of stock of the defendant company, the purchase-money ought to be distributed upon the principle that the holders of stock were first entitled to receive seventy-five per cent. of the amount of their stock, and that the balance of the purchase-money was then distributable amongst the holders of partly-paid up shares and the holders of the stock equally, upon the footing that five shares of £20 each were equivalent to £100 stock.

In the present case the fund which is to be divided is more than enough to provide for the payment of the subscribed capital, and the plaintiff asks that £15 paid by each stockholder in respect of each sum of £20 stock held by him in excess of the £5 paid up by each shareholder in respect of each £20 share should be repaid to each stockholder, and that after such payment the residue should be divided equally between the stockholders and shareholders. The question is whether that contention is right. There is no contract here expressly and directly dealing with the division of this fund. If there was we should have to consider it. And although it is material to consider section 120 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, that section applies to declaration of dividends, and does not apply to dealings with surplus capital.

Is there any decision which helps the plaintiff in his contention? No case was cited on his behalf which helps him. Cases were cited arising in the winding up of companies, but they were cases in which a loss had been incurred, and different considerations apply in such cases from those which apply here, because there the parties who had not paid up were liable to pay up in order to make the losses of the shareholders equal.

In the present case, at the time when the Secretary of State gave notice of his intention to purchase the undertaking and at the time when that notice expired no calls could have been made. It is obvious that the Secretary of State had power to regulate the making of calls, and it is obvious that when he gave notice to purchase the undertaking he would not have allowed further calls to be made so as to increase the amount of the purchase-money which would have to be paid. As to the case of Somes v. Currie, 1 K. & J. 605, 3 W. R. Dig. 76, which has been referred to, I would rather not rely upon it in the present case, as the decision turned so much upon the facts of the case, but it certainly is a decision which in no way assists the plaintiff's contention.

In dealing with the case before us it may be well to know what would be the rule in the case of an ordinary partnership. In my opinion the rule is not that which is contended for on behalf of the plaintiff. I think the general rule is that, after providing for the capital at the credit of each partner, the surplus assets should be distributed in the proportions in which the capital has been contributed by the partners. That view is supported by Binney v. Mutrie, 12 App. Cas. 160, 35 W. R. Dig. 143, and is in accordance with the proposition laid down in Lindley on Partnership, 4th ed., p. 679.

Now, as there is no express contract here we must consider what, in accordance with the true principles of equity, the division of this fund ought to be. The directors say that the division ought to be in proportion to the capital paid up. The plaintiff says that after the stockholders have been paid the excess of payments made by them over the amounts paid by the shareholders the surplus ought to be divided in proportion to the nominal capital. Which of these contentions is right? I think the plaintiff's contention is wrong. We must look at the particular circumstances of this particular case to see under what circumstances the plaintiff and the other shareholders took the shares and what is right to be done with the surplus moneys. The shares were issued in October, 1870. Previously to that by the Scinde Railway Co.'s Amalgamation Act, 1869, which also incorporated the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, provision was made for amalgamating various undertakings of the company and enabling the company to issue consolidated stock in lieu of shares, and to contract with the Government of India for the sale to them of the company's property.

Before the plaintiff entered into or became a member of the company there was a contract for amalgamation, which contained a provision as to the purchase of the company's property by the Secretary of State. It has been contended that if that affected the rights of shareholders it was ultrà vires. In my opinion that contention is wrong. There being no express contract here the plaintiff must be taken to have come in with notice of this agreement that the Secretary of State might purchase the property. And when new shares were issued in October, 1870, an option was given to subscribers to pay in full and take stock or to pay only £5 on each share and remain liable for the remaining £15 when called up. And this option remained open until February in the following year. The plaintiff did not think right to avail himself of this option; he only paid £5 per share, but he knew his liability and also that calls only could be made if sanctioned by the Secretary of State. Ought we, then, in the special circumstances of this case, to say that the liability is to stand as if the money had been fully paid up? In my opinion we have sufficient here to show that the proper rule in equity is not that contended for by the plaintiff and that liability does not equal payment. The payment of dividends was not to be in accordance with the nominal liability, but on the amount actually paid, as the plaintiff knew, and the liability was not to be considered as equivalent to payment. The payment on the shares and not the liability on them was what was to be regarded in ascertaining the price to be paid by the Secretary of State for the property of the company.

If an estate is sold and the purchase-money is divided, any person who has advanced money for the original purchase of it would obviously be entitled to a share of profits proportionate to the amount he advanced.

In my opinion the division proposed by the directors is right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question seems to me to turn on a simple ground, though the case is not an easy one. We must first take care to see out of what the rights of the parties spring, and as soon as we have seen from what the rights arise we must then apply the rules of equity. The great part of the plaintiff's argument was based on the assumption that this was a case of a winding up of a company; but when we examine the law we find that it is not a case of winding up in its strict sense. The rights of the parties were settled by the Act of 1886. Neither is this a case of a dissolution of partnership. There is no right arising out of any contract at all, and the plaintiff does not come here to claim the distribution of the fund under any contract. The distribution does not arise out of any contract, and the equity we have to apply is not the consequence of any contract. The plaintiff seeks to prevent the distribution of the fund in a particular way. This is a case of the distribution of a fund, not because of any contract for distribution, but because under the circumstances, everyone is interested in having it distributed, and what we have to consider is whether the proposed method of distribution is equitable or not. We have first to consider what is the situation. Here we have a company which has been turned into a special kind of thing, and which has made arrangements to sell itself bodily. By the Act of 1869, s. 21, and the agreement made thereunder in 1870 with the Secretary of State, he was to have the option of taking over the whole concern upon payment of a sum equal to the value in the market of its stocks and shares. At the time when the plaintiff took these shares he had full notice of this agreement, and he knew that if the Secretary of State gave notice that he would purchase the concern the purchase-money would be assessed in a particular way. Under these circumstances what value is to be attached to the liability to pay calls?

Under these particular circumstances the provisions of section 120 of the Companies Clauses Act as to the division of profits have to be considered. Is there anything inequitable in the way the directors propose to divide this fund? That can be answered in one way only according to common sense. If the fund be produced by unequal contributions there can be nothing inequitable in the division being on the same footing. Was the sum produced in any way by the liability to pay calls? That is a question of fact, and I am satisfied that the liability to pay calls was in no way an element in the production of this purchase-money. It in no way entered into the production of the profits of the company. It was not so treated in the agreement. It is said we must not look at the agreement. I do not agree with that; the plaintiff had notice of it when he purchased the shares.

Since 1870 it is admitted that there was no substantial chance of further calls being made, and after March, 1885, when the Secretary of State gave notice to purchase, no calls could be made. That being so, as a matter of fact this purchase-money was not the result of the liability to pay calls, but was produced by the money actually paid. I do not rely on Somes v. Currie, because I think that case probably turns on the view which the Vice-Chancellor took of the facts.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question arises on the sale of a whole undertaking. At the time of the sale the property of the company consisted of contributions by stockholders and shareholders; the capital consisted of £11,010,160 stock and 14,832 shares of £20 each, on which £5 only had been paid. There was no money owing on debentures or loans. After the sale the produce must be distributed, because there was no reason for keeping the money together. I think there was no express agreement as to the distribution, and no statutory provision exists. It seems to me that we have a simple case of property resulting from unequal contributions, and the question is, What principle applies? Now it is obvious that the distribution must be an equal one. But equality according to what? It cannot be by counting the heads of the stockholders and shareholders. It can only be according to contributions of those who have produced the property. It seems to me that, in this case, distribution must be proportionate to contribution. But it is said, suppose the property to have been produced not by unequal contributions but by unequal liabilities to pay, the proceeds must therefore be distributed according to the unequal liabilities. I agree that in that case the distribution must be guided by the amount of liabilities. I conclude that in this case the assumption of liability by shareholders has not in any way produced the property, and that it cannot be said that capital has, in the least, been increased by the liability. But if it were otherwise, and the property was produced partly by contributions and partly by liability, how would distribution have to be made? I say that renders it necessary to look at the constitution of the company. That, I think, necessitates the introduction into the constitution of the company of the mode in which the company had agreed to sell to the Secretary of State. The constitution of the company says that everything in the way of good things is to go according to the money paid, and not according to the money subscribed but not paid. By the Act payment goes for everything, liability for nothing. The moment that notice was given by the Secretary of State of his intention to purchase no further calls could be made, and, therefore, the liability to pay was of no moment.

Then another objection was raised. It was said that it was reasonable and proper that the property should be distributed in the way that losses are to be borne. I think that would be unjust here, because profit and loss according to my view do not run together.

In my judgment the surplus must be regarded as a sum paid in the expectation of future profit and therefore it should follow the same line as profits. Here the profit was estimated on the amount paid, and not on the amount subscribed.

I agree with the other Lords Justices that the cases cited do not decide this case.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Trinders & Romer.

Solicitors for the respondents, Hollams, Son, & Coward.

From Chan. Div. March 8.

Helmore v. Smith. (No. 2) (a.)

Partnership—Judgment against one partner—Execution by sheriff—Dissolution—Purchase of interest by other partner—Payment out of partnership assets—Setting aside sale.

Under a judgment against one of two partners, the sheriff at a sale by auction sold his interest in the partnership to the other partner, and executed an assignment of it to him. The purchase-money was paid by the partner out of the partnership assets.

Held, that the sale must be set aside.

Held, also, that, under these circumstances, there was no dissolution of the partnership.

Whether there would have been a dissolution of the partnership if the partner had paid the purchase-money out of his own money, quære.

A sheriff under a fi. fa. can only sell such assets of a firm as are seizable, not book debts or goodwill.

Decision of Bacon, V.C., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C.

The case has been reported on another point, 35 W. R. 157, 35 Ch. D. 449.

In December 1881, the plaintiff, who carried on business in co-partnership with the defendant as coal merchants, in the name of Helmore & Smith, became temporarily deranged in mind, and was confined in Bethlehem Hospital. In April, 1882, he was discharged from the hospital.

The plaintiff at the time of his confinement in the hospital was plaintiff in three actions then pending, but owing to his state of health they were abandoned and judgment was allowed to go against him by default. About £86 was required to satisfy the judgments.

On the 15th of March the sheriff levied execution on the judgments upon the plaintiff's "chattel interest" in the goodwill and effects of the partnership business.

On the 24th of March this interest was sold by the sheriff by auction to the defendant for £125, and on the 30th of March, 1882, an assignment thereof to the defendant was executed by the sheriff. The defendant thereupon changed the name of the firm, maintaining that the partnership had been dissolved and that the plaintiff had no further interest in it.

(a.) Reported by W. Ivimey Cook, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff, on the other hand, alleged that the purchase was void on the ground that the £125 paid by the defendant for the plaintiff's interest in the partnership was a totally inadequate sum, and that it was in fact worth £2,500, and that the defendant had taken advantage of the plaintiff's illness and absence to purchase the interest at an inadequate price and to secure it for his own benefit.

This action was accordingly brought by the plaintiff claiming (1) a declaration that the purchase by the defendant of the plaintiff's share and interest in the partnership business was a purchase by him as trustee for the plaintiff; or (in the alternative) a declaration that the purchase was fraudulent and void as against the plaintiff and ought to be set aside, and the deed of the 30th of March, 1882, delivered up to be cancelled; or a declaration that in any event the plaintiff's share did not pass by the sale and assignment by the sheriff; (2) a declaration that, notwithstanding the said transaction, the defendant remained and was partner with the plaintiff in the business; a dissolution of the partnership as from the date of the writ; and the usual accounts and other relief incidental to a partnership action.

It was admitted by the defendant in evidence that the £125 was paid to the sheriff out of money standing to the credit of the partnership.

On the 8th of November, 1886, Bacon, V.C., held that the sale by the sheriff was inoperative, and must be set aside; and that, notwithstanding the purchase, the defendant remained a partner with the plaintiff, and that the partnership must be dissolved as from the date of the judgment, and the ordinary partnership accounts taken.

The defendant appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for the appellant.—The partnership was dissolved by the seizure and sale by the sheriff of the plaintiff's interest. [COTTON, L.J.—I suppose, beyond doubt, a sale to a stranger would operate as a dissolution.] Yes, that would be so: Skipp v. Harwood, 2 Swans. 586, n.; Aspinall v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 1 W. R. 518, 11 Hare, 325; Habershon v. Blurton, 1 De G. & Sm. 121. As to payment by the defendant out of the partnership assets, the defendant intended to purchase the plaintiff's interest with his own money, and after the sale he might well have supposed himself to be owner of the whole business, including the money at the bank. [LINDLEY, L.J.—The sheriff obviously purported to seize more than he could under a fi. fa.] That may be so. He can only convey what he has a right to seize.

Millar, Q.C., Oswald, and Emanuel, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Bacon, V.C. The plaintiff and the defendant were carrying on business in partnership together, when unfortunate circumstances connected with the health of the plaintiff necessitated his being under confinement for a time. He seems to have brought various actions, which were not prosecuted by him, and the defendants in these actions obtained judgment against him for the costs of these actions. On these judgments the defendants issued writs of execution; the writs were placed in the hands of the sheriff, and the sheriff seized chattels belonging to the partnership. That being so, the defendant bought from the sheriff the interest of the plaintiff in a great deal more than the chattels seized, for he bought the share and interest of the plaintiff in the partnership; and this was assigned to him as well as the interest of the plaintiff in the chattels which were seized.

Now I do not think that it would be right in this case—certainly not without hearing further argument—to lay down general principles or rules as to the rights of the solvent partner, or as to the right of a stranger purchasing from the sheriff under such circumstances. To my mind the case is to be decided against the defendant, on the ground that he did not buy these goods with his own money. I will assume—and it is only assuming, for we have not heard the plaintiff here—that the defendant, when he paid for what he bought from the sheriff, thought he would become entitled to the whole of the partnership property, including the balance at the bankers; but, in fact, he paid the purchase-money out of the banking account of the partnership; therefore, notwithstanding the seizure by the sheriff, the plaintiff would be entitled to have an account. The defendant bought with part of the partnership property, subject to such rights of account as there might be between the plaintiff and the defendant; and, in my opinion, that being so, he cannot insist that he bought for himself so as to prevent the plaintiff from being considered as still a partner in the business, on the ground that the purchase from the sheriff was of that which the sheriff had a right to seize. It was said that the defendant intended to buy for himself, and that he thought what he was paying was his own money. I will assume that he did: but did not he do so under a mistake of fact? He knew this was a partnership banking account; and the mere fact that an opinion was entertained by him (if it was) that the assignment by the sheriff had given him a right to consider the banking account as his own will not make the money his if in fact it was not. The mere mistake in law will not excuse or alter the effect of what he has done. Undoubtedly, if there is a seizure of partnership effects by the sheriff under an execution against one of the partners, and a purchase by a stranger, that is a dissolution of the partnership.

I give no opinion as to what would have been the result if the co-partner, the defendant, had in fact bought with his own money; but, as a fact, that which he took was not his own money, but the money of himself and his partner, subject to the partnership account. In my opinion it would be wrong to say that by the seizure and purchase by him he had made himself owner of the plaintiff's interest in the partnership, so that after that time he could carry on this business treating himself as solely and absolutely entitled to the partnership business. The account must be taken, and in the account the sum paid will have to be charged to the plaintiff. That is a very different thing from the contention urged by Mr. Rigby, that from the time of the sale by the sheriff and purchase by the defendant the defendant was the sole owner of the business, subject to any rights of taking the accounts which the plaintiff might have. In my opinion, although it would be right to correct the mere date in the Vice-Chancellor's judgment by saying that the dissolution and end of the partnership took place on the 1st of April, 1886, according to the provision in the articles, that is no material alteration. The decree of the Vice-Chancellor must be affirmed, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In giving my reasons I may say that the subject involved is one which I have frequently studied for more than twenty years, and I know the difficulties surrounding it. But in this case no difficulty arises. A writ of fi. fa. was issued against one of two partners in the business of coal merchants. Let us consider what the sheriff could do under that fi. fa. He could seize all such of the assets of the firm as are seizable under a fi. fa., but he could not seize book debts or goodwill. The fi. fa. does not touch such things; and it is a mistake, and a very serious mistake, to suppose that when the sheriff, under a separate execution against one of several partners, seizes the partnership goods, and sells the share and interest of the execution debtor in these goods, the sheriff can, or does, in practice sell the whole of the execution debtor's interest in the partnership. Such a case is conceivable, but in practice it never arises, because there are always in practice assets which cannot be reached by fi. fa. What the sheriff has got to sell is not the share and interest of the execution debtor in the partnership, but the share and interest of the execution debtor in such of the chattels of the partnership as are saleable under a fi. fa. The unfortunate purchaser from the sheriff has to find out what he has really had assigned to him, and that he can only do by a partnership account; there is no other method of proceeding. That does involve practically a dissolution of the whole concern. Now, what makes this particular case easy is this: When the sheriff sold under the fi. fa. he sold to the continuing partner, the solvent partner, who did not pay the purchase-money to the sheriff out of his own money, but paid for what he purchased out of the assets of the partnership. In point of law, the necessary result of buying this share with the funds of the concern is that there was no dissolution at all. The purchase was made on behalf of the firm, and the Vice-Chancellor was quite right in treating such a seizure and such a sale as not amounting to a dissolution. We must correct the date, as suggested by Cotton, L.J., but the appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

Lopes, L.J.—If the defendant in this case had bought from the sheriff what he did buy with his own money very difficult questions would have arisen, which would have required time and consideration to determine. But it is clear in this case that the defendant did not buy with his own money, but with the partnership assets. Under these circumstances he cannot, in my opinion, successfully contend that he bought for himself, nor can he contend that he is entitled to exclude the plaintiff from the benefit of the purchase made with the money belonging to the partnership. I think the Vice-Chancellor was right in holding in this particular case that there was no dissolution.

In re Cameron and Wells. (a.)

Voluntary conveyance—Marriage settlement of widower—Limitation to his children by first wife—Consideration—Subsequent mortgagee—27 Eliz. c. 4.

The principle of Newstead v. Searles, 1 Atk. 265, West temp. Hardw. 287, 9 App. Cas. 320 note, that the children of a widow by a former marriage taking under a settlement made on her second marriage are not to be treated as volunteers, does not extend to the case of the children of a widower.

By a settlement made on the second marriage of a widower land belonging to him was conveyed in trust for his children by a first marriage absolutely, and personally belonging to the wife was settled on her absolutely. The husband afterwards mortgaged the land.

Held, that the settlement was voluntary as regards the children of the husband, and that, by 27 Eliz. c. 4, the limitation in their favour was void as against the mortgagee.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874. The contract was for the sale of certain freehold property situate at Holyhead, which the vendor sold as mortgagee under his power of sale. The mortgage of the property to the vendor by John Ellis was dated the 10th of July, 1880, but the abstract of the title disclosed an indenture of the 24th of December, 1879, made between John Ellis of the first part, Jane Owen of the second part, and trustees of the third part, whereby, after reciting that a marriage was intended between John Ellis and Jane Owen, that John Ellis was seised of the freehold hereditaments intended to be thereby granted (which included the property now contracted to be sold) in fee simple, and that Jane Owen was possessed of personal estate, and that it had been agreed to assign the respective properties and premises in manner thereinafter appearing "in order to provide for the children of the said John Ellis by his first wife," in consideration of the premises and of the intended marriage the freehold hereditaments were conveyed by John Ellis and Jane Owen, and the personal estate was conveyed by Jane Owen to the trustees in trust, with respect to the property of John Ellis, "for the children of the said John Ellis by his first wife, share and share alike as tenants in common"; and, with respect to the property of Jane Owen, in trust for her absolutely. The marriage was afterwards solemnized. In the requisitions on the title the purchaser declined to admit that the deed of the 24th of December, 1879, was voluntary as regards the children of the first marriage of John Ellis. The vendor insisted that the consideration of marriage did not extend to those children, and that the deed, being, therefore, voluntary as regards them, was invalid as against the mortgagee. The summons was taken out by the purchaser asking a declaration that his objection to the title had not been sufficiently answered, and that he might be discharged from the contract.

Renshaw, Q.C., and J. Maurice Lloyd, for the purchaser.—The settlement of the 24th of December, 1879, is not void, under 27 Eliz. c. 4, against the mortgagee as being without consideration and voluntary, for the children of John Ellis by his first wife were within the marriage consideration and not volunteers. A limitation in favour of existing children of the settlor is an exception to the rule that the consideration of marriage does not extend to relatives other than the issue of the marriage: Newstead v. Searles, 1 Atk. 265; Gale v. Gale, 25 W. R. 772, 6 Ch. D. 144; Mackie v. Herberteon, 9 App. Cas. 303, 32 W. R. Dig. 176. [Kay, J.—Those were cases of the children of the wife by a former marriage.] In Clarke v. Wright, 9 W. R. 571, 6 H. & N. 849, Blackburn, J., treats Newstead v. Searles as deciding that the owner of property may, on making a settlement on marriage, make a binding provision for his existing children, thus including the case of a husband's children.

They referred to Dav. Conv., vol. iii., pt. 2 (2nd ed.), p. 833, where the cases are collected.

Bardswell, for the vendor.—In Price v. Jenkins, 25 W. R. 427, 4 Ch. D. 483, Hall, V.C., held that a limitation in a marriage settlement in favour of a son of the intended husband was void as against a subsequent purchaser from the husband, and, although the decision was reversed on another ground, the Court of Appeal said they gave no opinion on this point: s. c., 5 Ch. D. 619, 25 W. R. Dig. 253. The case of the children of a widow is an exception to the general rule, and Dart says

(a.) Reported by H. F. Ameron, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(V. & P., 5th ed., p. 897) that a settlement by a husband on his second marriage in favour of issue by a former wife is not within the exception, and this statement of the law is expressly left untouched by Fry, J., in Gale v. Gale.

Renshaw replied.

Kay, J.—In this case the question, which is one of very considerable interest, arises in this way. On the marriage of John Ellis to a lady who had some property of her own, a settlement was made which is in a very short form. [His lordship read the material parts of the settlement, and continued:—] After that the husband mortgaged the property which he had so settled upon the children of the first marriage, and the question is whether, under the statute 27 Eliz. c. 4, that mortgage can prevail against the children of the first marriage.

Undoubtedly the ordinary rule is that a settlement of that kind is voluntary as to every one who does not come, as it is phrased, within the marriage consideration, and the only persons who come within the marriage consideration—that is, the only persons from whom it is assumed that consideration moves—are the husband, the wife, and the children of the marriage. The phrase that they come within the marriage consideration means that they must be all treated as persons from whom consideration moves for the settlement. If there is in the settlement a limitation in favour of collaterals, of course no consideration moves from those collaterals, if, that is, they settle no property of their own. Therefore collaterals, generally speaking, are not within the consideration for a marriage settlement, and when it is said that collaterals are not within the marriage consideration, this is, in truth, an expansion of the phrase that no consideration moves from the collaterals, and, therefore, so far as collaterals are concerned, the interest given by the settlement to them is by way of voluntary gift. As between the husband and wife it is not a voluntary gift; there is ample consideration as between the husband and wife for every provision contained in the settlement, but that does not make the collateral any the less a volunteer. According to the case of Davenport v. Bishopp, 1 Ph. 698, the settlement is a contract between the husband and wife; they can enforce it, and, when it is enforced, the collaterals get the benefit of it. So, also, if there be an executed settlement, as this was, the volunteer can assert and enforce the trust in his favour; but, still, he is only a volunteer, and if the settlement is impugned, either under 13 Eliz. c. 5, by creditors of the settlor who are creditors at the date of the settlement, or under 27 Eliz. c. 4, by a purchaser for value in the case of lands, then the collateral is treated, for the purposes of those statutes, as being only a volunteer, and the ordinary principle, which has been adopted rather by addition to the words of the statute than otherwise, that every voluntary settlement shall be deemed to be fraudulent and void, applies. But it is said that there is an exception to this principle when a widow provides by such a settlement for her children by a former marriage. How those children are any the less volunteers than any other stranger to the marriage consideration I confess I am entirely unable to see. No consideration moves from them. It is impossible to say that they are within the consideration of the second marriage of the widow. But, undoubtedly, in the case of Newstead v. Searles, a decision pronounced very long ago by a great judge—Lord Hardwicke—some kind of exception was made in favour of the children of a widow who are included in the limitations under a settlement made on her subsequent marriage. I do not profess to understand it, and I may say so without much reluctance, because, observing the decisions which have been based upon that one I do not find that the reasons given in explanation of it have always been consistent. Lord Selborne, in the recent case in the House of Lords—Mackie v. Herbertson—gave a very ingenious reason—namely, that in Newstead v. Searles the children were to take pari passu with the children of the marriage which was then being contracted, and, therefore, were so complicated and mixed up with those children that their number determined the shares of those children. That is a very ingenious reason, but whether that was the reason which Lord Hardwicke had in his mind may be doubted. In Clarke v. Wright no such reason seems to have been given, but the case of Newstead v. Searles was treated as an absolute authority for the proposition that the children of a widow, at all events, taking under a marriage settlement, were not to be considered volunteers, although every other collateral might be. I confess myself unable to understand that. It seems to me that whatever bargain may be made between the husband and wife in favour of the children of the former marriage of the wife has no more to do with the matter than in the case of any other collateral whatever. When any collateral takes an interest under a marriage settlement it may be the bargain between the husband and wife that the collateral should so take; but that does not make him any the less a volunteer, because no consideration moves from him, which is the test whether the interest of the collateral is or is not that of a volunteer. But then it is said that that exception has never been extended to the case of the children of the husband, and that there is a distinction between the children of a widower by his former marriage and the children of a widow by her former marriage. I confess I do not see why there should be any such distinction. There might, of course, be a distinction in a case where the widower takes nothing whatever from the intended wife, but if a settlement on his children be a part of the bargain by which property both of the intended husband and of the intended wife is settled, why should not that be a bargain for value between the husband and wife? I confess I do not see why it should not. Suppose that only property of the intended husband was settled, and that it was settled upon his children, by a marriage settlement reciting that, in consideration of the marriage, the husband and wife agreed that the husband's property should be settled on his children, why should not that be a valuable consideration as between those two? No one could doubt that it was so, because the marriage proceeds on the faith of the contract being carried out. But then how does that make the children of the husband anything but volunteers? As between them and the husband and wife no consideration moves from them. I see no distinction in the world in this particular case between the children of the husband and those of the wife. But I confess myself unable to understand any intelligible principle under which the children of the intended wife by a former marriage, taking under a settlement such as this, could be anything but volunteers. There has been this exception introduced in their favour very long ago, and by a great judge; though as Williams, J., in his judgment in Clarke v. Wright, at p. 880, said, when the decree in Newstead v. Searles was made the law had not been yet settled. Still, that decision has been adopted and followed, so far as I know, ever since, but only in the case of children of the intended wife. I am asked to apply it to children of the intended husband, but I find that in the case of Price v. Jenkins Hall, V.C., distinctly refused to apply the doctrine to children of the intended husband, and in Gale v. Gale Fry, J., following Newstead v. Searles, and applying the doctrine to children of the intended wife, says: "My decision has nothing to do with the case of the husband making a provision for his children by a former wife, as to whom Mr. Dart suggests that the same considerations do not apply." Therefore I presume that other judges were in the same mental condition upon the point as I am; they did not thoroughly understand how the exception in the case of the children of the wife came to be introduced, and, not so understanding, they declined to carry it further by applying it to the children of the husband. That is a state of authority which, though I think it a lamentable one, I am bound to regard. I therefore hold that this settlement is voluntary as regards the children of the husband by his former marriage, and that the mortgage is good as against them.

In re ROYAL LIVER FRIENDLY SOCIETY. (a.)

Friendly society—County Court—Certiorari—Jurisdiction—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), ss. 22 (sub-section d.), 30 (sub-section 10).

Under sections 22 (sub-section d.) and 30 (sub-section 10) of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, the jurisdiction conferred on the county court is not exclusive, but permissive only.

Motion.

This case raised a question whether the provisions in the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, ss. 22 and 30, for the reference of all disputes between the society and its members to the county court are permissive or peremptory.

The Royal Liver Friendly Society was established in 1850 under the Act then in force with reference to friendly societies.

At a meeting of the society held in 1886 new rules were certified, of which rule 7 provided as follows:—"The provisions of section 30 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, apply to this society, and are hereby incorporated with the rules of this society, and whenever the words 'the society,' 'a society,' or 'any society,' occur, they shall be held to include the Royal Liver Friendly Society." The provisions of the said section are as follows:—"(10) In all disputes between a society and any member or person insured, or any person claiming through a member or person insured or under the rules, such member or person may, notwithstanding any provision of the rules of such society to the contrary, apply to the county court or to the court of summary jurisdiction for the place where such member or other person resides, and such court may settle such dispute in manner herein provided." At the same meeting a resolution was passed for the payment of a sum of about £1,600 in respect of certain costs.

Two members of the society applied to the county court for a declaration that the proposed payment was ultra vires, and a rule nisi was obtained for a certiorari.

Cause was now shown against making the rule absolute.

R. Neville showed cause, citing The Municipal Permanent Investment Building Society v. Kent, 32 W. R. 681, 9 App. Cas. 260.

Romer, Q.C., and Rutherford, contrd.—That case was decided on a different Act.

CHITTY, J.—It was admitted on behalf of the plaintiffs in the county court action that the case was a fit one to be removed into the High Court if the High Court had any jurisdiction in the matter. The question of jurisdiction depends upon sections 22 and 30 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875. Section 22 renders it necessary to refer to the rules of the particular society in order to see whether the rules do provide the manner in which disputes of this nature are to be settled. The dispute in this case is certainly a dispute of the nature mentioned in section 22. Sub-section d. is permissive only so far as the person aggrieved is concerned, and so far as the county court and the court of summary jurisdiction are concerned confers jurisdiction on them. But it does not exclude the jurisdiction of the High Court.

I now turn to section 30, which has been slightly amended by 42 & 43 Vict. c. 9; but the amendment is immaterial for the present purpose, it being admitted that this is a society within the scope of the first part of the section—i.e., a society which receives contributions by means of collectors at a greater distance than ten miles from the registered office. As the society was in existence at the commencement of the Act, all the provisions of section 30 are, by sub-section 13, made applicable. Sub-section 10 is, again, a permissive section, giving the member the right to resort to the county court or to the court of summary jurisdiction, but not conferring exclusive jurisdiction on those courts. The statutory enactment overrides any rule which provides that the member may not go to the county court or may not go to the court of summary jurisdiction. The effect of section 30, therefore, is that the provisions of this section do, and from the enactment itself must, apply to this society.

Rule 7 is the only rule of this society which is material to be considered. It correctly states that the society is governed by section 30, and in stating what the provisions of that section are it mentions sub-section 10, the effect of which I have already stated. For the purpose of answering the question whether the rules of this society do contain any direction as to the manner in which disputes shall be decided, I turn again to section 22, and the answer appears to be they do not. Sub-section 10 of section 30 merely enacts that the member aggrieved may go to the county court or court of summary jurisdiction notwithstanding any provision to the contrary to be found in the rules. Here there is no provision to the contrary; but, with the exception of rule 7, there is no rule whatever on the subject of how disputes are to be settled. There are no such provisions in the Act before me as were to be found in the Building Societies Act, 1874, on which the decision of the House of Lords in The Municipal Permanent Investment Building Society v. Kent turned. The county court has jurisdiction, but not exclusive jurisdiction. The rule will be made absolute.

Practice—Substituted service—Domicile out of jurisdiction—Rules of 1883, ord. 9, r. 2; ord. 10 r 1; ord. 11, r. 2.

Where effectual personal service cannot be made upon a person "domiciled or ordinarily resident in Ireland" owing to ord. 11, r. 1 (e.), the court will not allow substituted service to be made.

Motion to set aside order of master for substituted service of writ.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant, up to the 3rd of November, 1886, resided in London. On that date she married a Mr. Smyth, who resided in Ireland. The defendant left for Ireland on the 8th of November, and with the exception of two visits to her house in town had resided there ever since. The house in London was settled upon her by her first marriage settlement, and was still in her possession. The plaintiff took out a writ against the defendant on the 9th of November, of which previous notice had been given her. By an order of the master substituted service of the writ was allowed upon the defendant's sister, who had been left in charge of the defendant's London house. Against this service the defendant now appealed.

Robson, for the defendant.—The defendant's domicile is that of her present husband, and that is in Ireland. The application to the master was ex parte.

Munday, for the plaintiff.—The defendant retains possession of the house in London, and has visited it when she chose. She was ordinarily resident there at the time of the claim. She had notice of the claim, and may have left on purpose to avoid service of the writ.

A. L. SMITH, J.—This is an appeal against an order for the substituted service of a writ. The motion for the order was heard ex parte, and I have no doubt that the master, upon the materials before him, exercised a sound discretion. But the defendant now appears before us on appeal against the order. The orders for substituted service are regulated under ord. 9, r. 2, and ord. 10, r. 1, but what we really have first to consider in this case is whether service out of the jurisdiction could have been allowed against the defendant. Now it is an express rule under order 11, r. (e.), that service out of the jurisdiction is not to apply to persons "domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland" in order to prevent inhabitants of those countries being brought within the jurisdiction, assumimg them to have been domiciled in Scotland or Ireland at the time; and I have often heard it said by the Lord Chief Justice that this was expressly added by the framers of the new rule to deal with the difficulty which had arisen in those cases. If personal service can be effected upon any Scotchman or Irishman in this country, that would be good; but substituted service for persons domiciled in those countries is expressly excepted; and, clearly, being once so domiciled, a person is not to be brought within the English jurisdiction unless voluntarily submitting to such jurisdiction by allowing personal service of the writ. This is clear from the judgments of James and Mellish, L.JJ., in Sloman v. Government of New Zealand, 25 W. R. 86, 1 C. P. D. 565. Well, then, could direct service have been effected on the defendant? It could not if she was "domiciled or ordinarily resident in Ireland." Undoubtedly she was ordinarily resident in England up to the 3rd of November, 1886, but upon her second marriage she voluntarily adopts her husband's domicile, and that is in Ireland. The fact that she has property and separate estate of her own in England does not alter her domicile or ordinary residence; nor does the fact of her having been over here for short periods in April and May since that time, or the assumption that she left England earlier to avoid service of the writ, prove in any way that she was not, and is not, now ordinarily resident in Ireland. Her ordinary residence is with her husband, and that residence is admitted to be in Ireland. I think the service of this writ must be set aside, and the plaintiff must pay the costs of this application.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The affidavits prove satisfactorily that the defendant is now "domiciled or ordinarily resident in Ireland." The first question for us, under these circumstances, is whether she could be served personally? Clearly not, as the new rule forbids service of a writ out of the jurisdiction upon persons "domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland." That, to my mind, disposes of the case at once, for it cannot be supposed that it was intended that substituted service could be allowed upon a defendant who was not legally liable to personal service.

Appeal allowed.

COURTNEY v. COLE. (a.)

Shipping — Compulsory pilotage — Ship trading to Boulogne or place in Europe north of Boulogne—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 379, sub-section 3.

A ship which is continually engaged in voyaging from London to the East, and back to London, and then to the North of Europe, and back to London, is, while passing down the Thames on her way to a port in the North of Europe, a ship trading to a place in Europe north of Brest within the meaning of section 379, sub-section 3, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, as modified by an Order in Council of the 21*st of December*, 1871, and is therefore exempt from compulsory pilotage.

Case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

The appellant, who was the master of the ship Cardiganshire, was convicted by the justices of Gravesend under section 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, of unlawfully piloting his ship within the London district without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do. The ship was one of a line of steamers which sailed regularly from London to Japan, China, and the Straits Settlements and back to London, and thence to Amsterdam and Hamburg, and back to London. In April, 1886, she arrived in London with a cargo from the East, and discharged that part of the cargo which was destined for London. The crew were then discharged; and having shipped runners on coasting articles for the voyage to the Continent and back, she left London for Amsterdam with the rest of the cargo. When she was off Gravesend, the informant, who was a duly licensed pilot, offered to take charge of the ship for the purpose of piloting her to the seaward limits of the London district. The appellant refused the offer, and continued to pilot the ship himself, without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do. The ship proceeded to Amsterdam and Hamburg; and, after discharging her cargo, took in a fresh part cargo for the East, with which she returned to London, and then, after making up a complete cargo, she proceeded on her next voyage to the East. She had been engaged in making similar voyages for some years.

By section 379, sub-section 3, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, ships trading to Boulogne or to any place in Europe north of Boulogne, are, when not carrying passengers, exempted from compulsory pilotage. An Order in Council of the 21st of December, 1871, has the effect of substituting Brest for Boulogne in this sub-section.

The question was whether, under the above circumstances, the ship was exempt from compulsory pilotage.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C. (Fox with him), for the appellant.—The ship was exempt. She was not less a ship trading to the north of Europe, because she also voyaged to China and Japan. It is clear historically that the policy of the Legislature has been to encourage trading to the northern ports. This ship was trading between London and Amsterdam. And if it is necessary, in order that she should be exempt, that she should be constantly trading between London and the northern ports, the facts show that she was constantly so trading.

Bucknill, Q.C. (J. P. Aspinall with him) for the respondent.—Trading in sub-section 3 of section 379 means constantly trading: The Sea Queen, B. & L. 359; The Agricola, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 10. Here the vessel was a foreign trader, London being only her calling port. It was not the intention of the Legislature to exempt ships voyaging from a place outside a pilotage district to another place outside it and calling at a place inside it: see sub-section 6.

He also cited The Moselle, 2 Aspinall, 586.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C., in reply.—The Agricola and The Sea Queen are not in point. The Agricola was under an earlier statute; and The Sea Queen was under a different sub-section.

He also cited The Wesley, Lushington, 268, 10 W. R. Adm. Dig. 29.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—It is obvious that this case comes directly within the words of the exemption given by sub-section 3. This vessel was a ship trading to a place in Europe north of Brest. It has, however, been argued that compulsory pilotage has been imposed by the Legislature solely for the benefit of ships themselves and the protection of human life, and that the section ought to be construed with reference to that principle. But I think it is impossible to say, looking at all the exemptions, that the legislation was designed solely with that purpose, and without any idea of favouring particular trades. For instance, sub-section 1 exempts ships employed in the coasting trade in the United Kingdom. Sub-section 2 has the effect of favouring trades carried on by small vessels. Again, the effect of sub-section 4 is that ships from Guernsey, Jersey, &c., laden with stone are exempt, but if laden with fruit are not exempt. It is clear that there must have been an intention to favour the stone trade between those islands and England. It is, however, not necessary to say whether the Legislature intended to favour trading between London and the north of Europe. Mr. Gainsford Bruce may be right; but it would be unsafe to ground our construction of this section on a historical basis which may be untrue. It is enough to say that this vessel was a ship trading between London and Amsterdam, a place in Europe north of Brest, and doing that habitually; for it is stated that she has been making similar voyages for some years. Not that I think it is necessary, in order to be exempt, that she should be habitually so trading. That question, however, I do not decide; there is no necessity for me to decide it, as I think in fact she was habitually so trading. She comes within sub-section 3, and is therefore exempt.

A. L. Smith, J.—The question is, whether this vessel was a ship trading to Boulogne or to a port north of it, within the meaning of the section. It has been pointed out that Dr. Lushington decided that by a ship "employed in the coasting trade," exempted in sub-section 1, was meant a ship continually so employed, and not a ship ordinarily engaged in the foreign trade, though at the time de facto engaged in the coasting trade: see The Sea Queen and The Agricola. But does that decision govern sub-section 3? I think not. The reasons given for it, however they may apply to the first sub-section, cannot apply to others. If it is necessary to give a reason for the exemption granted by sub-section 3, that reason may be found in the desire to favour trade in the North Sea and the Baltic. I think that the sub-section means what it says, and that a vessel, when it is trading to Boulogne or any port to the north of it, is exempt. If I am wrong in this view, I think that the facts here show that this vessel was constantly trading from London to Amsterdam and back. For I think it is impossible that the sub-section can mean ships that are confined to trading to Boulogne and the northern ports. The judgment was erroneous, and must be reversed.

Conviction set aside.

Reg. v. Cuming.
Ex parte Hall. (a.)

Royal Navy—Deserter—Resignation against the will of Admiralty—Arrest without warrant—Naval Discipline Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109), ss. 19, 50, 51, 86, 87—"Queen's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions" of 1879, art. 160.

A commissioned officer of the Royal Navy, appointed to one of her Majesty's ships, and who has joined the ship, may not resign his commission without the assent of the Admiralty. Until such assent be given he is "a person belonging to her Majesty's Navy" within the Naval Discipline Act, 1866, s. 87. Section 50 of that Act does not prohibit a naval officer from making an arrest without a warrant under section 51 of the same Act.

This was a rule calling on the captain of the flagship Royal Adelaide (William H. Cuming), and the master at arms of the same ship, to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue directing them to bring up the body of Lieutenant Edward Brace Turville Hall, in order that he might be discharged from their custody.

A. Staveley Hill, Q.C. (Judge Advocate of the Fleet), and A. T. Lawrence, for the Lords of the Admiralty, showed cause.

Sir Henry James, Q.C. (A. Charles, Q.C., and R. H. Simonds with him), for Lieutenant Hall, in support of the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 30.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

A. L. Smith, J.—In this case a rule nisi for a habeas corpus has been obtained on behalf of Lieutenant Edward Brace Turville Hall, calling upon the defendants to show cause why he should not be brought up before this court and discharged from custody; and on the 10th inst. cause was shown against this rule by the Judge Advocate of the Fleet, Mr. Staveley Hill, Q.C., for the defendants. The facts are as follows:—

On the 15th of July, 1870, the applicant (Lieutenant Hall) entered her Majesty's Royal Navy as a cadet; and, having passed through the grade of mishipman, received his commission as sub-lieutenant on the 17th of January, 1878, and, on the 30th of June, 1882, was promoted to the rank of lieutenant. Subsequently thereto Lieutenant Hall was appointed to and joined her Majesty's ship Orontes. In September, 1886,

(a.) Reported by Sir Sherston Baker, Barrister-at-Law.

Lieutenant Hall applied for an appointment in the London Salvage Corps. His application was successful; but as The Orontes, upon which he was serving, was then on a cruise, and was not expected to return to England till April, 1887, the committee of the Salvage Corps agreed to wait until that time for him to take up the appointment. On the 29th of October, 1886, Lieutenant Hall, by letter to the Admiralty, requested to be allowed to retire, or resign his appointment or his commission, and offered also to pay the passage-money for a lieutenant to Gibraltar should he be relieved there. This application was refused. Shortly after this Lieutenant Hall learned that the cruise of The Orontes was extended, and that she would not return to this country till the month of July, 1887; and he thereupon forwarded, through his commanding officer, a telegram to the Admiralty requesting leave to retire, with which request the Admiralty refused to comply. Mr. Hall then determined to resign his commission; and on the 1st of Februsry, 1887, The Orontes being then at Simon's Bay, in South Africa, he asked permission of his captain to go to Cape Town till the following afternoon. At this time a notice was standing in the saloon and officers' ward-room intimating that all leave expired at midnight on the 2nd of Febuary; and it was generally known that the captain of The Orontes intended sailing from Simon's Bay as soon after daylight on the 3rd of February as possible. The requested permission to go ashore was granted, and Lieutenant Hall thereupon left the ship; but, instead of returning the following afternoon, pursuant to his leave, he, from the shore, wrote to his captain on the 2nd of February, as follows:—"I have the honour to inform you that, in accordance with the conditions laid down in article 160 of the Admiralty Regulations, I retire from the service; and I beg to hand you my commission." This he did. Lieutenant Hall thereupon took his passage home in the mail steamer Grantully Castle, which left Table Bay for Plymouth at four p.m. on the 2nd of February. The letter which Lieutenant Hall wrote to his captain had not been delivered when The Orontes left Simon's Bay on the 3rd of February. On the morning of that day the captain of The Orontes, finding that Lieutenant Hall had sailed for England, telegraphed to the Admiralty, and on the arrival of The Grantully Castle in the Sound Lieutenant Hall was arrested by a naval officer, and was taken in his custody to Devonport, where he was detained as a prisoner on board The Royal Adelaide, under the command of Captain Cuming, with a view to his being brought to trial before a court-martial under section 19 of the Naval Discipline Act, 1866 for having absented himself from his ship with an intention of not returning.

The question raised for our determination is one of great importance—viz., whether a commissioned officer in the Royal Navy who has accepted an appointment to serve on board one of her Majesty's ships is entitled without permission from the Admiralty to resign his commission and to leave his ship. The Judge Advocate of the Fleet, who showed cause against the rule, contended that the officer's commission bound him to serve in the navy so long as he remained fit to perform his duty and the State required his services. On the other hand it was contended for the applicant that the commission might be resigned at any time, like an ordinary mandate to one required to act as agent, and that the Crown had no right in time of peace to control the liberty of the subject, or insist upon the performance of duties from which the officer desired to escape.

We are unable to agree with either contention.

The cases of Parker v. Lord Clive, 4 Burr. 2419, and Vertue v. Lord Clive, 4 Burr. 2472, would seem to contain a complete condemnation of both propositions. Lord Mansfield, in delivering the considered judgment of the court, said (4 Burr., at p. 2422): "Upon the general abstract question we are all of opinion that a military officer in the service of the East India Co. has not a right to resign his commission at all times and under any circumstances whatsoever whenever he pleases"; and, à fortiori, we would add, an officer holding a commission in her Majesty's navy. But the learned counsel for Lieutenant Hall presented an alternative view of the matter, and insisted that, even though the commission could not be resigned under all circumstances and at the pleasure of the officer, still his obligation went no further than to bind him to serve for a reasonable time and upon reasonable terms, and thus that he was free, upon due notice, and for such causes and under such circumstances as existed in this case, to leave his ship and surrender his commission. The cases relied upon in support of this view were Parker v. Lord Clive and Vertue v. Lord Clive above mentioned. These were actions in which officers of the East India Co. sought to recover damages for having been wrongfully arrested and brought to court-martial upon a charge of having thrown up their commissions while on active service in the company's army. The court was called upon to determine what was the nature of the engagement between the company and their officers, and would seem to have rightly come to the conclusion that their acceptance of their commissions imposed upon them the obligation to serve as officers in the Indian Army in a reasonable manner, so as not to defeat the purposes of their employment, and to submit themselves to the ordinary military tribunal for any alleged breach of discipline. In each case the court-martial had acquitted the officer. In the actions for false imprisonment the question whether the plaintiffs had been guilty of a breach of duty was treated as one for the jury, and, upon a finding against the plaintiffs, the judgment was entered in each case for the defendants. These authorities have no direct bearing upon this application.

It is not necessary to deal with the case of Lieutenant Hall upon any suggestion of an express or implied contract between him and the Crown. His position seems clearly defined by the terms of the Naval Discipline Act, 1866. Section 19 provides that "every person subject to this Act who shall absent himself from his ship or from the place where his duty requires him to be, with an intention of not returning to such ship or place, or who shall at any time and under any circumstances, when absent from his ship or place of duty, do any act which shows that he has an intention of not returning to such ship or place, shall be deemed to have deserted, and shall be punished accordingly." Section 86 defines the word "officer" to mean "an officer belonging to one of her Majesty's ships"; and section 87 describes the persons liable to the Act—"Every person in or belonging to her Majesty's navy, and borne on the books of any one of her Majesty's ships in commission, shall be subject to this Act."

Lieutenant Hall seems to us, at the time when he left his ship without any intention to return, to come clearly within these sections. He was an officer of The Orontes, whose name was borne on the ship's books while the ship was in commission. But it was said that when he left for England he was not a person in or belonging to her Majesty's navy within section 87, because he had sent his commission to his captain; and it was urged that every section of the Act which in terms applies to "persons subject to the Act" must be read as applying only to those who had not so resigned their commissions. If this were so, every officer of one of the Queen's ships might with impunity abandon the ship whenever he pleased. It is obvious that such a construction would be fatal to the spirit and object of the Act.

It was further contended that the persons "liable to the Act" did not include those officers who, after reasonable notice and under reasonable circumstances, had resigned their commissions; and that the Act, as regards such persons, was inoperative. But this mode of interpreting the statute would lead to this consequence, that it would be always matter of doubt whether an officer who had gone through the form of resigning his commission was still in the navy or not. If his reasons were sufficient and he was entitled to leave the service, he would not be in the navy; if he were not in a position to resign his commission, he would still be an officer. His superior officer would have no means of judging as to the sufficiency of the grounds upon which he claimed to resign. If the officer were right, he would be entitled to resist his detention by force or to bring an action subsequently for false imprisonment. And so, if he were brought to a court-martial and imprisoned, he might, in an action against the officers of the court, question their jurisdiction, and submit to the jury that, when placed under arrest, he had ceased to be an officer in the navy. The difficulty and confusion that this mode of interpretation would give rise to may be illustrated by reference to the sections of the Act with respect to neglect of duty, mutiny, and insubordination. An officer on board one of her Majesty's ships in commission might be guilty of the misconduct at which those sections are aimed and be free from punishment if he could afterwards satisfy a jury that at the time when he was alleged to have done wrong he had taken all reasonable steps for resigning his commission. Reference was made to article 160 of the Admiralty Regulations of 1879, under which Lieutenant Hall had acted. The regulation is in the following terms:—"If any officer shall retire from his employment without the sanction of the Admiralty, except on good and sufficient reasons to be judged of by the Admiralty, or shall refuse or avoid service if found capable of serving, he shall not be allowed to receive half-pay; and his name shall be removed from the list of officers of the Royal Navy."

The learned counsel for Lieutenant Hall did not rely upon this regulation as a justification of or authority for the resignation of Lieutenant Hall, but pointed to it in support of his contention as to the meaning of the statute. We are clearly of opinion that the regulation must be construed with the statute, and that it was not intended to control its operation. The regulation points out what may follow upon an officer resigning his commission without such sufficient cause as shall satisfy the Admiralty, or where he refuses employment offered him by the Admiralty, and his doing so is not otherwise punishable.

It is not necessary for us to decide the very grave question whether the mere acceptance of a commision would of itself and under all circumstances suffice to bring an officer within the jurisdiction of a court-martial for refusing to enter upon any particular service. Some of us, as at present advised, are of opinion with Yates, J., in the case cited (Vertue v. Lord Clive) that it would not. We leave the question, however, distinctly open to be argued and decided if in any case hereafter it shall be necessary to decide it. But we are clearly of opinion that, where a commissioned officer accepts an appointment to serve in one of her Majesty's ships in commission, and enters upon the performance of his duties, he subjects himself to the provisions of the Naval Discipline Act, and at his own will and pleasure cannot resign his appointment, and may be tried by court-martial for any of the offences specified in the Act. We are urged to depart from the plain meaning of the statute because of the consequences which, it was said, would otherwise result. It was argued that, if the Act applied to everyone in the Royal Navy whose name was borne on the books of one of her Majesty's ships in commission, the result would be that the Lords of the Admiralty might impose upon an officer perpetual servitude by directing his name for life to remain on the ship's books. But this difficulty seems to us remote and far-fetched. The Legislature cannot have contemplated a proceeding so unreasonable and entirely unlikely to be adopted. We are not disposed, in order to escape from a peril so remote and improbable, to adopt an interpretation which would entail the consequences above pointed out—i.e., of her Majesty's ships in commission being left unofficered and uncommanded, at the sole will and pleasure of the officers.

A further point was made by Sir Henry James for Lieutenant Hall, that the arrest of Lieutenant Hall on board The Grantully Castle was illegal. According to Lieutenant Hall's affidavit, which is not contradicted, he was arrested by a naval officer who exhibited no warrant, and who, it must be taken, had none. By section 50 of the Naval Discipline Act, 1866, "Every officer in command of a fleet or squadron of her Majesty's ships, or one of her Majesty's ships, or the senior officer present at a port, may by warrant under his hand authorize any person to arrest any offender subject to this Act for any offence against this Act mentioned in such warrant . . . and any person named in any such warrant may forthwith on his apprehension, if the warrant so directs, be taken on board the ship to which he belongs or some other of her Majesty's ships."

The contention on the part of Lieutenant Hall is, that he could only be arrested under such a warrant, and that there was no such warrant in this case. It is to be observed, however, that, under such a warrant, not merely a person in her Majesty's navy, but any person may make the arrest; and, further, that, although the section authorizes the person named in the warrant to be taken on board one of her Majesty's ships, it does not authorize his detention on board. Such an authority, if it stood alone, would be a very imperfect instrument for the bringing to punishment of offenders against the Act. There is, however, another section of the Act, the 51st, of a far more effectual character. By that section "every person subject to this Act who shall not use his utmost endeavours to detect, apprehend, and bring to punishment all offenders against this Act, and shall not assist the officers appointed for that purpose, shall suffer imprisonment or such other punishment as is hereinafter mentioned." The words are not "every person to whom a warrant is directed," but "every person subject to this Act;" and we think that the necessary inference is that such a person has power to apprehend and bring to punishment any offender against the Act, for it would be manifestly unjust to punish a man with imprisonment for not doing that which he had no power to do. Moreover, it seems to us, looking at the nature and number of the offences dealt with in the first forty-five sections of the Act, that it would be quite impossible to maintain discipline on board amongst a ship's crew if no offender could be arrested until a warrant had been obtained from the officer in command of the ship. In this case the arrest was effected by a naval officer. It is not stated that he was not a person subject to the Naval Discipline Act; and we think we ought not, upon the facts stated to us, to infer that he was not so subject, and we infer that he was. Even if we considered the arrest to have been irregular, it is by no means clear that it would have been our duty, under the circumstances, to decree the discharge of the applicant before he had been brought to trial by the proper tribunal—viz., a court-martial: see Reg. v. Mount, 23 W. R. 572, L. R. 6 P. C. 283. In holding, as we do, that Lieutenant Hall is subject to the jurisdiction of a court-martial, we think it right to add that he has acted, as it seems to us, in good faith and in the honest belief that the terms of the regulations referred to entitled him, without permission from the Admiralty, to retire from the service. In dealing with this case, should it be brought to trial, we have no doubt that it will be borne in mind that the regulation in question has unfortunately been so framed as to leave considerable doubt as to its meaning. It seems to us that even a lawyer of some learning and experience might be excused if he failed to interpret it correctly; and this being so we are of opinion that, though the rule should be discharged, it should be discharged without costs. We accordingly discharge it without costs.

Rule discharged.

Divorce—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 19), s. 4—Separation order by justices—Application to discharge on ground of adultery—No original jurisdiction to hear in High Court—Appeal—Admissibility of evidence—Child born more than nine months after separation order—Admission by wife—Presumption of illegitimacy.

Section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, which empowers the court or magistrate before whom a husband is convicted of an aggravated assault upon his wife to make an order in the nature of a decree for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, and to order maintenance, and deal with the custody of children under ten, contains a proviso that "no order for payment of money by the husband, or for the custody of children by the wife, shall be made in favour of a wife who shall be proved to have committed adultery, unless such adultery has been condoned; and that any order for payment of money or for the custody of children may be discharged by the court or magistrate by whom such order was made upon proof that the wife has, since the making thereof, been guilty of adultery; and provided also that all orders made under this section shall be subject to appeal to the Probate and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice."

In sections 2 and 3 of the same Act, dealing with costs in cases of intervention by the Queen's Proctor and the power to vary settlements, the words "the court" were used for the Probate and Admiralty Division.

Held, that the words "the court" in section 4 do not mean the Probate and Admiralty Division, but the court before whom the husband is convicted, and that court alone can vary or discharge the order; but there is a right of appeal to the Probate and Admiralty Division even from the refusal of such court to vary or discharge any such order, and that right exists notwithstanding that the justices may have stated a case for the consideration of the Queen's Bench Division; but the Probate and Admiralty Division, as a matter of discretion, will not hear the appeal while there is a special case pending in the Queen's Bench Division.

There is a legal presumption that any child born more than nine months after the date of a separation order made under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, is illegitimate. An admission made by the wife that she has had a child born more than nine months after a separation order of which the husband was not the father is admissible as evidence of her adultery.

Application under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, to discharge an order made on January 1, 1883, under the same section by the justices of the Chester Ward Division of the county of Durham, whereby it was ordered that William George Hetherington, having been convicted before the said justices of an aggravated assault on his wife, Elizabeth Hetherington, she should be no longer bound to cohabit with him, that he should pay her ten shillings weekly, and that she should have the custody of the children.

The ground of the application was that since the date of the order the wife had been guilty of adultery. The evidence relied on was the admission of the wife that she had recently given birth to a child of which the husband was not the father, made in cross-examination on a proceeding in the police court against her husband on September 16, 1886, to enforce the payment of arrears of her allowance. After this proceeding the husband took out a summons to vary the order, which was heard at the Consett Police Court on October 9 and 16, 1886. The justices refused to allow the husband to give evidence of non-access or to compel the wife to give evidence as to the parentage of the child or to receive evidence of her admissions made on the previous proceedings, on the ground that such evidence was inadmissible against her as affecting the status of a child born in wedlock. The justices at the hearing, being of opinion that the appeal from their decision was to the Queen's Bench Division, stated a special case; the special case was entered in that division, and at the same time the husband appealed to this division against the justices' decision. That appeal was heard on January 18 and 25, 1887, when Hannen, P., being informed of the special case before the Queen's Bench Division, expressed his opinion that as the question raised was one relating to admissibility of evidence, that division had concurrent jurisdiction, and as a matter of comity it would not be right for this division to decide a case which was actually before another division, and ordered the application to stand over. That appeal and the special case were then withdrawn, and the present application was substituted.

H. D. Pritchard, for the husband, in support of the application.—Since this application was made one of the magistrates who made the original order is dead, and, therefore, we must come here, as it is only the magistrates who made the order who can rescind it. It was so held on a similar clause in Ex parte Sharpe, 12 W. R. 756, 33 L. J. M. C. 152, which was the case of a protection order made under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 21; and a statute (27 & 28 Vict. c. 44) was passed to remedy that defect. The magistrates were wrong in refusing to receive the evidence. A child begotten after a divorce à mensa et thoro was held a bastard: 1 Salkeld, 123; see also Taylor on Evidence, 8th ed., p. 817. The sole issue was whether the wife had committed adultery, not the legitimacy of the child. That being so, we are right in coming to this court. In the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, the court means this court, and we are not barred by having applied to the magistrates. The remedy is concurrent, or we can treat that application as a nullity: Reg. v. The Justices of Middlesex, 9 Dowl. Pr. 163.

Back (Walton with him), for the respondent, the wife.—The applicant has already elected to appeal to another court. There is no double appeal. But, beyond that, this is an original application, which can only be made in the first instance to the court which made the original order; the court, on section 4, can only have that meaning. The evidence here was inadmissible; it was obtained in an entirely different proceeding: Babbage v. Babbage, L. R. 2 P. & D. 222.

(a.) Reported by J. Gerard Laing, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, is sufficiently set out in the head-note.

Hannen, P.—I regret very much that this litigation has reached the present pitch, and I hope the opinion I am about to express will bring the case to an end. I mean my opinion on the point whether there was evidence on which the magistrates might have acted for the purpose of discharging the original order. It appears that on January 1, 1883, an order equivalent to a judicial separation was made by the justices, and from the time of that order the parties are authorized to live apart, and the husband is bound not to molest his wife. From that moment all the presumption which ordinarily exists in the case of married persons as to access and legitimacy of children is reversed, and from that moment if a child is born more than nine months afterwards it is presumed, unless it is shown to be otherwise, that the child is illegitimate. That point was lost sight of before the magistrates, but it is well established by the case cited in 1 Salkeld, 123. How, then, does this case stand as to the facts. The woman appears to have admitted that she had a child born about eight weeks before the hearing of the summons in September, 1886. A woman, although married, may always prove the date of the birth of her child, and in this case there was a legal presumption that the child was illegitimate. Unfortunately, in refusing to act on the evidence, the magistrates were persuaded that the issue was one of bastardy, which it was not. Then as to the proceedings. In the first place, an application was made to the magistrates to discharge the order of January 1, 1883, and it turned out that one of the magistrates who made the order was dead, the magistrates refused the application, but stated a case for the consideration of the Queen's Bench Division. Then an application was made to me under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, by way of appeal from that refusal. I said then that I did not doubt (and I adhere to that opinion) that I have the power, by way of appeal, to consider a refusal by the magistrates to make an order where they improperly refuse. The question whether the appeal should be to the Divisional Court was not raised, but, as a matter of discretion, I did not think it right to hear this case while there was a special case pending in the Queen's Bench Division, and I allowed the case to stand over.

But now the case comes before me in the form of a substantive application to discharge the original order, on the ground that under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, I have the power on fresh evidence to discharge the original order of the magistrates. I have come to the conclusion that I have not the power. Undoubtedly the word "court" is used in some sections of the Act as applying to the Divorce Court—viz., in section 2, relating to costs of the Queen's Proctor, and in section 3, relating to settlements. But then in section 4 we come to a totally different enactment, in which the word "court" is used in a different collocation. The words are, then, that in a case of aggravated assault "the court or magistrate before whom he shall be so convicted may" rule that the wife be no longer bound to cohabit. I think the words must be read distributively. The same words "court or magistrate" occur in the first sub-section, and it is inconceivable that the Legislature meant to refer to this court the question dealt with in that sub-section—viz., the husband's means for the purpose of determining the allowance to the wife. That would be a most unnatural construction. The whole collocation of the governing sentence and the sub-section show that the Legislature intended that the husband should be convicted and subsequently dealt with entirely by the same court, I am not sure what court, whether quarter sessions, assizes, or justices, but certainly not this court. The only natural construction is that the section means that the court or magistrate before whom the husband is convicted is to consider his means and make the order for payment by him. Further light is thrown on it by the language of the proviso, which provides for the discharge of the order by the court or magistrate "by whom" such order was made, and this construction is strengthened by the concluding words by which all orders are made subject to appeal to the Probate and Admiralty Division. I, therefore, think that I have no power to discharge this order. That can only be done by the court or magistrate by whom the order was made, but that from their order, whether discharging or refusing to discharge the original order, there is an appeal to this court. This application must be dismissed, with costs, and the costs in this court of the abandoned motion.

Myburgh, Q.C., and Pike, for the appellants, the owners of The Kate.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C., and Raikes, for the respondents, the owners of The Sutherland.

It appeared from the process containing the shorthand notes of the evidence taken in the court below that The Sutherland, which was one of a line of steamers regularly trading between Liverpool and Hamburg, had, on the 31st of December, as she was proceeding from Liverpool towards Hamburg, come into collision in the English Channel, west of Dungeness, with the barque Sereca, and received serious damage; that in order to repair this damage the master of The Sutherland determined to make for the Thames, and accordingly took on board, off Dungeness, a Trinity pilot, and was piloted by him as far as Gravesend; that at Gravesend he took another Trinity House pilot on board, who was acting in charge of The Sutherland at the time of the collision with The Kate; and that, after that collision, The Sutherland went on to London, where nearly all her cargo was discharged, and that of the cargo so discharged a portion was transhipped on board another steamer belonging to the same owners as The Sutherland, and so carried to Hamburg, whilst the remainder of the cargo of The Sutherland, after the completion of her repairs, which took about three weeks, was re-shipped on The Sutherland and taken in her to the same port.

For the appellants it was contended that The Sutherland was exempt from compulsory pilotage, both as being a vessel in distress within section 362 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and section 63 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, and as being a vessel "trading to a port north of Boulogne" within section 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

The counsel for the respondents argued that The Sutherland had at the time of the collision with the brig been bound by compulsion of law to employ a Trinity House pilot by virtue of sections 353 and 376 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

The following authority was referred to: Courtney v. Cole, ante, p. 8, 19 Q. B. D. 447.

HANNEN, P.—In deciding this case we have nothing to do with the policy of the law, we have only to see what intention is expressed by the words which the Legislature has employed. The first question we have to consider is, whether or not the exemption in the 3rd sub-section of section 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, applies to any other vessels than those which start from or are proceeding to the London district or one of the Trinity House outport districts. In considering this question no one section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, has been referred to which leads to the conclusion that any limit is to be put on the general words of the 379th section of that Act, and when the language of the several sub-sections of that section is considered it is impossible that the construction Mr. Gainsford Bruce has suggested can be the right one. The material words in the section in question are "the following ships, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district and in the Trinity House outport districts." The reference to the London district and the Trinity House ports is for the purpose of stating what compulsory pilotage the vessels are not to be subjected to. When we have to determine what vessels are to be exempt from compulsory pilotage we have certain vessels thus described in sub-section 1 of the section, "Ships employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom," that obviously means ships from any ports in the United Kingdom proceeding on a coasting voyage from one port of the United Kingdom to another. These words cannot be restricted to vessels coming out of or going into the London district or the Trinity House outport districts. Then in the 3rd sub-section are these words: "Ships trading to Boulogne or any place in Europe north of Boulogne." We see no reason for putting a restriction on these general words which we cannot put on the preceding sub-section. Now it is unnecessary to determine whether or not this 3rd sub-section applies to foreign vessels. We are dealing with an English vessel which was proceeding from a port in England to a port in Europe north of Boulogne, and so far such a vessel seems to me to come directly within those words. If we speculate on the object which it is to be supposed the Legislature had in view, it would appear that the idea was to give certain privileges to vessels engaged in particular ways, such as those engaged in the coasting trade. Vessels trading to certain places in the north of Europe were intended to be exempted, in the same way as in the next sub-section an advantage is given to those bringing stone, the produce of the Channel Islands. The question then arises, Was this vessel trading to a place north of Boulogne? That she was doing so originally is beyond dispute, and, therefore, we have to consider if she had ceased to be a vessel trading to Boulogne, or to a port north of Boulogne. The Sutherland met with an accident off Dungeness. Can it be said that the moment the captain saw it was necessary that some repairs should be done to his ship his vessel ceased to be a vessel trading to Hamburg. It appears, then, that no accident which could happen to her could cause her to lose her particular trading character. That is the only essential character which the Legislature requires that the vessel should have. I agree that it is not because a vessel is generally engaged in trading to a port north of Boulogne that she would be exempt if she were not at the material time engaged on a voyage to Boulogne or a port north of Boulogne; but if a vessel trading to a port north of Boulogne is obliged for temporary purposes to put into a port, she does not on that account cease to be engaged in trading to the port to which she was trading at the commencement of her voyage. Nor can it make any difference whether the port or harbour in which she may take refuge is a long one, as the harbour of London, or one of a very limited area. Suppose the vessel had put into Ramsgate for the purpose of repairs and had gone out again immediately, could it be said that that vessel lost its character of trading to the place which was originally its place of destination? I base my decision on the generality of the language of the Act, and hold that, as The Sutherland was trading to a place north of Boulogne, she was not bound to take a pilot. The decision of the court below must be reversed.

BUTT, J.—I am of the same opinion. In dealing with a penal enactment we must take the words of the enactment and apply them strictly. I have no doubt whatever that this ship, at the time in question, was a ship trading to a port of Europe north of Boulogne, and that her voyage was only temporarily interrupted by her going into the Thames. I agree, therefore, in thinking that this appeal must be allowed.

Bruce asked for leave to appeal.

HANNEN, P.—If the consent of the court is necessary for a further appeal we grant that leave.

"THE FIRE QUEEN." (a.)

Damage—Order in Council of June 24, 1885, relating to the navigation of the River Mersey—Construction of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17—Infringement by no possibility contributing to collision.

A barque which had come up the River Mersey from sea in tow of a steam tug on the last of the flood was, in the early morning of January, before sunrise, and when nearly abreast of the Canada Basin and in the act of being turned in order to bring her head to tide, run into almost amidships on the starboard side by a steamship proceeding down the river. To recover for the damage sustained in this collision the owners of the barque instituted an action of damage against the steamship.

From the evidence at the hearing it appeared that the green light required to be carried by the barque under the Order in Council of June 24, 1885, relating to the navigation of the River Mersey, was so placed as to be obscured by the starboard cathead of the barque from right ahead to considerably less than one-third of a point on the starboard bow; and that the stern light required by the same Order in Council to be shown from her sternrail had been placed on the deck aft in such a position as not to be properly visible astern.

The court found that there had been a reasonable compliance with the Order in Council with respect to the extent of the visibility of the green light of the barque, and that the obscuration of it had nothing to do with the collision; that the neglect to properly show a stern light from the sternrail of the barque could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision, and that the steamship ought to have slackened speed sooner than the evidence proved she did.

Held, that there had been no such infringement of the Order in Council of June 24, 1885, as brought the case within the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1873, and that the barque could not be deemed to blame under that section.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the barque Nordens Dronning against the steamship Fire Queen to recover the damage sustained in a collision between the two vessels in the early morning of the 13th of last January before sunrise, when The Nordens Dronning having come up the River Mersey in tow of a steam tug on the last of the flood, when in the act of being turned by the tug in order to be brought head to tide and anchor about abreast of the Canada Basin was run into by The Fire Queen as that vessel was proceeding down the river. The plaintiffs pleaded (inter alia), and in substance proved by the evidence called on their behalf, that The Nordens Dronning had her regulation side lights up and a bright globe light on deck aft, and the tug towing The Nordens Dronning the proper lights for a tug towing in the Mersey duly exhibited and all burning brightly; that as The Nordens Dronning began to swing and her head had come round to about S.E. under a starboard helm the masthead and red light of The Fire Queen had been seen from The Nordens Dronning about two points on the starboard bow of The Nordens Dronning and about a mile off, and that when the head of The Nordens Dronning had been swung round to nearly N.E. and The Fire Queen was about on the starboard beam of The Nordens Dronning The Fire Queen opened her green light and came into collision with The Nordens Dronning striking the starboard side of The Nordens Dronning between the fore and main rigging.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was now heard before Butt, J., assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

Sir W. Phillimore and Stubbs, for the plaintiffs.

Kennedy, Q.C., and Pickford, for the defendants, the owners of The Fire Queen.

BUTT, J.—In this case the plaintiff's vessel, the barque Nordens Dronning, was in tow of a steam tug called The Great Western. She had come into the River Mersey, and was about to be rounded to by the tug to bring her head upon tide. The tug and the vessel in tow came up on the western or Cheshire side of the river; and when those whose duty it was to direct the navigation thought the time had come to turn the ship the proper measures were taken for so doing, and the barque and tug began to come round. At that time the steamer Fire Queen, the defendants' ship, was coming down somewhere about half-way between mid-river and the eastern shore, navigating in that which was her own water. I see no reason to suppose that in the state of things existing the tug and her tow were not justified in putting their helms to starboard, and going round when, and where, and as they did.

The case set up on behalf of the steamship Fire Queen is this: Those on board say, As we come down on the eastern side of the river, we first became aware of the existence of some vessel ahead, or nearly ahead of us, by seeing what afterwards proved to be the single white light at the masthead of the steam tug; that was not more than 400 or 500 yards distant. It has been contended on the part of The Fire Queen that those on board of her could not see the tug's light, which they admit to have been a good one—I am speaking of only one light at present—at a greater distance on account of the thickness of the weather. The master of The Fire Queen says:—"I thought that was the light of a vessel at anchor; it was slightly on my port bow, and I intended to go down inside of it, leaving it on my port hand, when suddenly, not long after that light was seen, a second light—namely, a green light, apparently on board the same ship, was also seen on the quarter, whereupon I assumed that they were the lights of a steamer standing in across the river towards the eastern shore. I gave the order at once to starboard the helm. I cleared the vessel with the lights, and, then, if there had been nothing behind her, there would have been no danger; but it turned out that the tug had a barque in tow, and I ran into the starboard broadside of that barque. I should not have done so if the proper indications had been given me of there being a vessel in tow of the tug."

What indications had the officer in charge of The Fire Queen a right to have? He had a right in the first instance to have a warning that there was a vessel in tow given him by two lights at the masthead of the tug, and he had a right to have another warning given him by the green light of the ship in tow. Possibly—although that, I do not think, can be successfully maintained—he may say, "I had the right also to have a third warning by a white stern light." Now, he says, "I had none of these warnings. I had a right, on the assumption that the white light I saw and this green light of the same vessel were the lights of a steamer not towing to act as I did." The most important matter to determine in this case is, had that tug one or two good lights at her masthead, an inefficent light is practically no better than no light at all. Now there is a strong body of evidence to the effect that the tug had had, up to the time of the collision, and at the time of collision, and continued to have after the collision, two perfectly good lights at her masthead. There is a strong body of evidence on the other side that the tug never had after she got into the Mersey any good light save one at her masthead; and that at the time of collision and the time just preceding it she had only one light of any sort at her masthead. I have to determine that, but before I advert further to that question of fact there are other matters to be dealt with. First of all, I have to consider whether the barque carried a good green light? I have no hesitation in finding at once that she did. I am speaking of the carriage of the light, and not of its position. Secondly, was it a light properly fixed? that is, was the carrying of that light where, and as it was, carried a compliance with, or a departure from, the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which by Order in Council are applicable to the Mersey.

Now The Nordens Dronning, like other vessels, has a cathead, and in one sense, no doubt, the cathead was in the way of the light. I think both sides have given fair and honest evidence as to the amount of the obstruction of that light. The result comes to this that the cathead obscured the side light for some two and a half or possibly three degrees—that is considerably less than the third of a point—on the vessel's bow. And that save for that third of a point her side lights showed an unbroken light over ten points of the horizon. Is it a breach of the Regulations for a vessel to have her lights obscured to the extent I have described? It is certain that a literal compliance with these Regulations is not intended. A literal compliance with these Regulations is an impossiblity. I will take an instance, a vessel at anchor is to carry, not more than twenty feet above the hull, a light which shall show an unbroken light all round the horizon. If a vessel has any mast or rope which runs to a greater height than the prescribed twenty feet above the water, it is utterly impossible that any lantern hung at that height could show an unbroken light all round the horizon. A number of other instances might be given, I am only pointing out that the letter of the Regulations cannot be complied with. What we must look to is, whether there is a reasonable compliance with the Regulations.

Several surveyors have been called, and amongst others a gentleman whose evidence is entitled to be treated with every respect—Mr. Laslett, the Board of Trade surveyor. What does his evidence come to? He says: "I should not have passed these lights in the position in which they were placed, and having regard to the position of the cathead." And he described to what extent on either bow the light would be obscured. But he was asked what the Board of Trade would do, and he produced his instructions. The result of following them is, that he gets out of one difficulty into another. The Board of Trade is careful not to have any obscuration of the light on either bow from right ahead, but in obtaining that desideratum it causes a departure from the rule, which to my mind is a far more serious matter. It turns out that Mr. Laslett would have passed this vessel if her cathead had been removed, although there would be a greater degree of error, in the sense that each side light would then be seen across the bow of the vessel. I do not know how these regulations are to be worked out. There cannot be a strict compliance with their letter.

I am strongly inclined to believe that the right thing to aim at would be to adhere to the arc of ten points, starting from two points abaft the beam, and to carry the light so as to allow it to be seen no further forward than an arc of ten points would allow. That would leave, if it were exactly carried out and the ship were motionless, a space in darkness right ahead equivalent to the beam of the ship but the lights would not then be visible across the stem. The question here is whether the departure from the strict requirements of this rule is a departure which is, under the circumstances, unreasonable; whether, because this cathead obscured the light of the vessel to the extent I have described, two and a half degrees or three degrees on the vessel's bows, it is a breach of the Regulations which is to entail the very severe penalty enacted by the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1873. I am not inclined to say it is; I have asked the Elder Brethren and they agree with me in thinking that there was a reasonable compliance with the Regulation regarding lights. The Nordens Dronning is, therefore, not to blame for having the green light carried where it was, having regard to the position of the cathead. I asked Mr. Laslett this question, how he would fix the lights, and he said they should be carried farther forward, and he would place them some three feet higher, and that would be a way of obviating the difficulty. But he obviates one difficulty by running into another; the Elder Brethren tell me that if that suggestion were complied with there would probably be a serious obscuration of the light by the headsails of the vessel.

I have been dealing with this merely as a question under the statute. When I come to the merits of the case I have not the slightest doubt, as a matter of fact, that the obscuration, as far as it was an obscuration, of the green light by this cathead, had nothing to do with this collision, because I have no doubt that the two vessels, The Fire Queen and The Nordens Dronning, were in such positions that that cathead never could have obscured the light of the barque from those on board The Fire Queen, and that it ought to have been seen earlier by them. They did not see it, and they starboarded into The Nordens Dronning. I come now to the stern light. I have already intimated in the course of the case, after consulting with the Elder Brethren, that the stern light was improperly placed, and that its position constituted a breach of article 5 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions applicable to the River Mersey—regulations having statutory effect, and the breach of which entails the statutory penalty imposed by section 17 of the Act of 1873. Had the improper position of that light any effect on the collision? I have no hesitation in saying it had not, but then it was said that is not the question. Could it have any effect on this collision? It appears to me it would be a proper compliance with article 5 of the Mersey Regulations to hang a white globe lantern from the centre of the taffrail of the vessel, so that it would hang a foot or eighteen inches below the taffrail. The Elder Brethren agree with me in this, that the real intention in prescribing these stern lights, as they are called, is to have them so placed that they should not be seen in front of the stern. However, taking it that that would have been a compliance, what follows? Why, that had it been there, by no possibility could those on board The Fire Queen have seen it before the collision. I know that one or two of the plaintiffs' witnesses, when asked to place models on the paper or on the table, from which diagrams were drawn, put the vessels in the position in which the stern light, carried as I have suggested it should be, would have been seen from The Fire Queen. But I do not accept that as the correct view of things. The vessels were never, and never could have been, in the position indicated by these diagrams. But, taking it that the collision between The Fire Queen and The Nordens Dronning was either a right-angle blow, delivered by the stem of The Fire Queen, or a blow, as the captain of The Fire Queen put it, leading aft on The Nordens Dronning, it follows, having regard to the fact that both vessels were under a starboard helm at the time and before the collision, that The Fire Queen never could have been in a position to have seen a light over The Nordens Dronning's stern. Therefore, although I say there was an infringement of this regulation with regard to what is called the stern light, it is an infringement which could not have any effect upon the question of collision. Neither in respect of the green light nor of the stern light can I find The Nordens Dronning to blame.

Now let me consider the other matters. I am asked to believe, and, as I have said, this is an important point, that the tug had only one masthead light. [The learned judge examined the evidence as to this point, and came to the conclusion that the tug had two sufficient mastheads lights at the time, and that they ought to have been seen by those on The Fire Queen.] There is one other matter on which I desire to say a word. The night was hazy; had it not been hazy the steamer Fire Queen certainly might have seen the one masthead light, which she admits was on the tug, at a very much greater distance than 400 or 500 yards. It was hazy, and it may be that that justifies the look out; but the weather being hazy and going down, as the captain must have been aware he was, at something like seven knots an hour, he saw a light, one point only on his port bow and 500 or 600 hundred yards off. He could not have told for a minute what that light was; he came to the conclusion that it was a vessel at anchor and acted accordingly. It turned out to be a vessel under way—namely, the tug. I must say that, having regard to the state of weather and the pace he was going and to the uncertainty there was with regard to that light, in common prudence he should at once have eased his engines. He did not stop at all, but he went on until he got other indications, and he got into the difficulty with which we have to deal. On the whole I come to the conclusion that there must be a decree that The Fire Queen is alone to blame.

Company—Register of mortgages—Mortgage to director not registered—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 43.

Debentures in a company incorporated under the Companies Acts were issued to a director. The debentures were not registered within the meaning of section 43 of the Companies Act, 1862. Upon the company going into liquidation the validity of the debentures was contested both by unsecured creditors and by other debenture-holders.

Held, that the mere omission to register did not invalidate the debentures.

Reasoning of Jessel, M.R., in In re Globe New Patent Iron Co., 27 W. R. 424, approved.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, affirming a decision of Chitty, J.

The appellant was a director in Joseph Wright & Co. (Limited), a company incorporated under the Companies Acts, which went into liquidation in 1881. By its articles of association the directors had power to raise money on debentures, and in October, 1878, they issued two debentures to the appellant, who was at that time a director. The debentures were not registered in accordance with the requirements of section 43 of the Companies Act, 1862. In the winding up the validity of these two debentures was contested by the respondents, including both creditors and other debenture-holders.

Chitty, J., and the Court of Appeal considered themselves bound by In re Native Iron Ore Co., and held that the debentures were invalid.

The appellant appealed to the House of Lords.

Nov. 25, 26, 1886.—Macnaghten, Q.C., and Phipson Beale, for the appellant.—The whole question is as to the correct construction of section 43 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89. This case is clearly covered by In re Wynn Hall Coal Co., 18 W. R. 1128, L. R. 10 Eq. 515; Ex parte Valpy & Chaplin, 20 W. R. 347, L. R. 7 Ch. 289; and In re Native Iron Ore Co., 24 W. R. 503, 2 Ch. D. 345; but those cases were wrongly decided, and have been disapproved: In re Borough of Hackney Newspaper Co., 3 Ch. D. 669, 25 W. R. Dig. 60; In re International Pulp and Paper Co., 25 W. R. 822, 6 Ch. D. 556; In re South Durham Iron Co., 27 W. R. 845, 11 Ch. D. 579; and In re Globe New Patent Iron Co., 27 W. R. 424. Mere omission to register cannot create a forfeiture; there must be some fraudulent concealment. In re Great Western Forest of Dean Coal Consumers' Co., 34 W. R. 516, 31 Ch. D. 496, and In re Underbank Mills Cotton Spinning and Manufacturing Co., 34 W. R. 181, 31 Ch. D. 226, were also referred to.

Ince, Q.C., and J. G. Laing, for the respondents.—A director is in a fiduciary position as regards the register, and may not take advantage of his own wrong. An officer must make known his own charges, and if he does not do so there is an equity to estop him from setting them up: Savage v. Foster, 9 Mod. 35; Boyd v. Belton, 1 Jo. & Lat. 730, 2 White & Tudor's Cas., 6th ed., 84; Govett v. Richmond, 7 Simons, 1. Ex parte Harper, 30 W. R. 7 Ch. 109, were also referred to.

Macnaghten, Q.C., in reply.—The non-registration did not act in any way as an inducement to the respondents to advance money.

June 13.—Lord HALSBURY, C.—I believe the only question which your lordships have to determine upon this appeal is the true construction of the 43rd section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89. I do not think that any materials are before us upon which we could properly pronounce an opinion upon the question of fact referred to at your lordships' bar. If a director who has a fiduciary duty towards his shareholders omits that duty, and thereby gains an advantage for himself, it is clear he cannot retain it; and even without the fiduciary relation, if one man induces another to advance money upon a property which is alleged to be unincumbered, and which the borrower (either a borrower for himself or for a company of which he is director or agent) knows to be incumbered, such a transaction cannot stand if the borrower either himself makes or knowingly permits others to make such a representation. Whether any facts are susceptible of proof which could call upon your lordships to decide upon the validity of Mr. Joseph Wright's debentures upon any such grounds as I have glanced at I do not know; and I desire expressly to guard myself against expressing any opinion upon the subject. Neither Chitty, J., nor the Court of Appeal have determined, or professed to determine, the question upon any such ground, but solely upon the ground that Mr. Joseph Wright's debentures were not registered, and that he was a director and manager of the company. It is therefore apparent that the true construction of the section I have quoted must determine the question in debate. The language of that section is as follows:—"Every limited company under this Act shall keep a register of all mortgages and charges specifically affecting property of the company, and shall enter in such register in respect of each mortgage or charge a short description of the property mortgaged or charged, the amount of charge created, and the names of the mortgagees or persons entitled to such charge. If any property of the company is mortgaged or charged without such entry as aforesaid being made, every director, manager, or other officer of the company who knowingly and wilfully authorizes or permits the omission of such entry shall incur a penalty not exceeding £50. The register of mortgages required by this section shall be open to inspection by any creditor or member of the company at all reasonable times; and if such inspection is refused, any officer of the company refusing the same, and every director and manager of the company authorizing or knowingly and wilfully permitting such refusal, shall incur a penalty not exceeding £5, and a further penalty not exceeding £2 for every day during which such refusal continues; and in addition to the above penalty, as respects companies registered in England and Ireland, any judge sitting in chambers, or the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries in the case of companies subject to his jurisdiction, may by order compel an immediate inspection of the register."

The first observation that arises upon the section is that the validity of the mortgage or charge is not, in express terms at all events, made to depend upon its registration; nor do I understand that any court has ever decided that that is its effect; and if it is once granted that a charge may be effectual, notwithstanding its non-registration, it is difficult to see how the exhibition of the register can be a representation that the mortgages registered are the only ones in existence. The second observation is that the register of mortgages required by the Act can only be inspected by a creditor or a member of the company; and in considering the decisions which your lordships are called upon to review, it is most important to bear these two propositions in mind. Eight years after the passing of the Act Malins, V.C., appears to have put a construction upon the section which certainly was founded upon a misapprehension of its terms. He appears to have thought a person hesitating whether he should deal with the company or not was intended by the Legislature to have the opportunity of consulting the register to guide his judgment as to whether he should trust the company or not; but, as I have already pointed out, it is only persons who are already members, or already creditors, who have a right to see the register at all. The error is important, because Malins, V.C., treats this as the key to the meaning of the section, which it is clear it is not, though, of course, a creditor already a creditor might be misled if he were advancing further money upon the property of the company, and the register was made a condition to the validity of a debenture. Notwithstanding the high authority of James, Mellish, and Baggallay, L.JJ., it is impossible to acquiesce in the bald statement that there is a "rule" or an "equitable principle" that an unregistered mortgage or debenture is invalid as against a director without some further exposition of what the "rule" or the "principle" is by which it is rendered invalid. The statute, for very obvious reasons, in constituting a code for the regulation of trading companies, has enacted that they shall keep an account of mortgages or charges specifically affecting their property. Had the Legislature thought right it might have rendered all mortgages or charges invalid unless they had been entered in this account. It has not done so. It might further have enacted that no director or officer of the company should take any benefit from any charge or mortgage whereof he was the owner if he were a party to its non-registration. This it has not done. It has simply enacted a pecuniary penalty for the non-performance of the statutory duty when that statutory duty is knowingly and wilfully omitted.

If the principle is supposed to be that no director can be allowed to derive any benefit from a debenture which he has obtained by lending money to the company of which he is a director, because he has in any respect disobeyed, or permitted to be disobeyed, the provisions of the Companies Act in some respect or another, the proposition is so wide as to become, on the face of it, absurd. If, on the other hand, it amounts to this, that the non-registration of his debenture by a director is a continuous representation to every other shareholder and creditor that such a debenture does not exist, it assumes a construction of the section to which I cannot assent; and I know of no authority which this or any other court has to add additional penalties to that which the Legislature has specifically enacted.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the order appealed from should be reversed, with costs, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord Watson.—Joseph Wright & Co. (Limited) was in 1875 incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, and in August, 1881, went into liquidation. By its articles of association the directors had power to raise money upon debentures; and on the 22nd of October, 1878, two debentures for £500 each were issued to the appellant Joseph Wright. On the 18th of July, 1881, Mr. Wright executed a voluntary deed, which was duly intimated to the company, declaring that he held these documents of debt in trust for his wife, the other appellant; but, notwithstanding that circumstance, Mr. Wright must, for the purposes of the present case, be regarded as the holder of the debentures.

In 1878, when the debentures were issued, and also at the time of the liquidation, Mr. Wright was one of the directors of the company. A book was kept by the company, which contained a list of its debentures; but it is conceded that the entries in that book do not fully comply with the requirements of section 43 of the Companies Act, 1862, and that the appellants' debentures are not registered within the meaning of the clause. In these circumstances, Chitty, J., and the Court of Appeal have found, first, in a question between the appellants and the unsecured creditors of the company, and, secondly, in a question between them and a debenture-holder, who was not a director or official of the company, that the appellants' debentures are invalid, in so far as they purport to charge the undertaking and property of the company.

The principle affirmed by the judgments appealed from appears to be this, that a director or other official who lends to his company on the security of its property, and then fails to make an entry of the charge in terms of section 43, not only incurs the statutory penalty enacted by that section, but, in addition, loses the benefit of his mortgage. There has been no expression of judicial opinion in this case with respect to the soundness or unsoundness of the principle, it having been conceded, on all hands, that the courts below were bound by two previous decisions of the Court of Appeal.

The rule in question was first laid down by Malins, V.C., in In re Wynn Hall Coal Co., and was thus explained by that learned judge:—"In this case the mortgagees are the directors who have committed an illegal act by not registering the mortgage, and upon the strict construction of the language of the Act, I think they are precluded from setting up the mortgage. But, independently of the language of the Act, I am of opinion that, upon general principles, it cannot be permitted that directors who get a charge on the property of the company, and omit to register it, but keep it as a pocket security concealed from the creditors, should set it up against the general creditors." A decision of Lord

Bomilly, M.R., to the same effect in Ex parte Valpy & Chaplin, was upheld by James, L.J., sitting alone. "Everyone," the Lord Justice said, "standing in a fiduciary position to the company, is bound to see that the company obeys the directions of the Legislature; and I am of opinion that the failure of the appellant to do so is fatal to his case." Next followed In re Native Iron Ore Co., in which a similar decision of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, consisting of James, Mellish, and Baggallay, L.JJ., all of whom were of the opinion expressed by Mellish, L.J., that the rule established by the two preceding cases was "founded on a perfectly good equitable principle."

These are the decisions upon which the rule at present rests. In several subsequent cases the late Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel) expressed very strong disapproval of it. He did so in In re Borough of Hackney Newspaper Co. and also in In re International Pulp and Paper Co. In the first of these cases he held that directors who had realized their security before the commencement of the winding up could not be compelled to refund the proceeds, inasmuch as they had not "knowingly and wilfully authorized or permitted the omission" to enter their mortgage on the register; and, in the second, he decided that the sub-mortgagee of a director was not affected by the want of registration. In In re South Durham Iron Co. Hall, V.C., decided that the rule in In re Native Iron Ore Co. did not apply to a mortgage made to partners, of whom one only was a director of the company; and his decision was affirmed in the Court of Appeal by the Master of the Rolls and Bramwell, L.J. (Baggallay, L.J., dissenting). Bramwell, L.J., whilst recognizing the authority of Ex parte Valpy & Chaplin and In re Native Iron Ore Co. as binding on the Court of Appeal, did not conceal his disapproval of the principle laid down in these cases. In In re Globe New Patent Steel and Iron Co. the late Master of the Rolls again took the opportunity of reviewing the previous decisions, and of delivering an elaborate argument against the rule which they established.

I do not think any one of the learned judges who have supported the rule adopts the first reason assigned by Malins, V.C., in In re Wynn Hall Coal Co. I do not think it can be reasonably affirmed that the rule has been enacted, either expressly or impliedly, by the Legislature in section 43 of the Companies Act, 1862, or that it could be sustained in equity apart from the provisions of that section. The clause provides that all mortgages and charges specifically affecting the property of the company, whether held by its directors or shareholders, or third parties, shall be entered in a register, to be kept for that purpose by the company; and that "every director, manager, or other officer of the company who knowingly and wilfully authorizes or permits the omission of such entry shall incur a penalty not exceeding £50." That is the sole penalty which the statute imposes upon the failure of these persons to perform their statutory duty. If section 43 had been left out of the Act there would, in my opinion, have been no reasonable ground for holding that a director who had lent his money on a mortgage authorized by the memorandum and articles of association could not enforce his rights as mortgagee in a question with other creditors of the company. As I understand the decisions of the Court of Appeal, the foundation of the rule is the neglect of the director or other official to discharge his statutory duty, which raises, or is supposed to raise, in equity a personal disability which precludes him from enforcing his charge upon the property of the company in competition with any creditor who is not in the same position with himself.

I have come to the conclusion that the effect of the rule is to inflict upon persons who may fail to perform the duty imposed upon them by section 43 severe penal consequences which the Legislature has not enacted and cannot be held to have contemplated. The creation of such penalties, in addition to the pecuniary mulct which the Legislature has thought fit to attach to the wilful neglect of the statutory duty of registration, is, in my opinion, altogether beyond the functions of a court of equity. I do not think it necessary to explain in detail the reasons which have led me to that conclusion. They are all to be found in the judgment delivered by the late Master of the Rolls in In re Globe New Patent Steel and Iron Co., in which I entirely concur, subject to the observation that it appears to me to be, in some passages, expressed in terms more forcible than the occasion required.

Whether a creditor who, after careful inquiry into the indebtedness of the company, has been induced to give it credit by the concealment, through non-registration, of mortgage or debenture debts held by directors or other officials, may be entitled to plead their personal disability in competition with himself, is a matter in regard to which I express no opinion. No such question occurs here. By the orders appealed from a charge upon the assets of the company, which was validly constituted by the appellant's debentures, is made void, through a subsequent failure to register, as against persons who, so far as appears, became and continued creditors of the company without making any inquiry as to the charges on its property, or as to the existence of a statutory register.

I accordingly concur in the judgment which has been moved.

LORD FITZGERALD.—The debenture book of the company, on the counterfoils of which was kept a full list of the debentures issued by the company, and which probably contained adequate information for all reasonable purposes, was nevertheless not a register of mortgages, as it did not comply with all the requisites of the 43rd section of the Act of 1862; but it is not alleged that in this neglect to comply with the provisions of the section there was any fraudulent omission on the part of the company or its office bearers, or that there was any concealment or any intention to deceive or mislead, or that any debenture-holder or creditor was deceived or misled or injured thereby.

In one of the affidavits filed on behalf of the appellants, Mr. Joseph Wright states that "the debenture book from which all the debentures of the company were issued was supplied for the use of the said company as being a proper debenture book, and was always regarded by us as constituting a true and sufficient register of debentures, and we were unaware that any other book was essential for such purpose. The said debenture book contained 200 lithographed forms of debentures. Each of these forms was attached to a counterfoil, and contained a description of the property mortgaged or charged, the amount of, and the nature of, the charge created, and the name of the mortgagee or person entitled to such charge. The printed paper now produced and shown to us marked 'A' is one of the said counterfoils with form of debenture attached." It would seem, too, that the debenture-holders and creditors had within their reach means of information as full for all reasonable purposes as if a proper register existed. I allude to these matters to clear the front, and reduce the question to one of law on the construction of the 43rd section. The appellant Wright being a director of the company, Chitty, J., held that his debentures were, for want of due registry, invalid as against creditors, so far as they charged the property of the company. We now proceed on the admission that the appellant's debenture were not duly registered, and that he was all the time a director of the company.

Chitty, J., in his decision properly yielded to prior authority binding on him. The hearing in the Court of Appeal was formal only to enable the parties to come to this House for a final decision. The respondents have the considerable advantage of a series of decisions in their favour commencing with In re the Wynn Hall Coal Co.; but on the other hand a great judge, Jessel, M.R., whenever the opportunity fairly presented itself, never failed to express his dissent, and we can easily read in the judgment of Bramwell, L.J., in In re South Durham Iron Co. that he too was dissatisfied. In that case Baggallay, L.J., says: "They (that is Jessel, M.R., and Bramwell, L.J.) are both of opinion that the decisions in Ex parte Valpy and The Native Iron Ore Co. case, should have been different." Although section 43 imposes a mandatory obligation on the company to keep a register, and to enter in it certain particulars of each charge, it does not declare that the absence of registry, or a defective registry, shall either avoid the charge or in any respect invalidate it. There is no word in the 43rd section importing any such result. In the second branch of the section, imposing penalties for wilful omission "if any property of the company is mortgaged or charged without such entry," the statute seems to concede that the security is complete on the grant of the mortgage or charge and is not invalidated by non-registry. It was not denied that even if the mortgage or debenture had been originally granted to a director or officer of the company, and had been subsequently bonâ fide transferred to the third party, it was good in the hands of the transferees though it had never been registered. The statute imposes penalties on directors, managers, and officers of the company for knowingly and wilfully permitting the omission to enter on the register the particulars required by the 43rd section, and if it was intended in addition to invalidate the unregistered mortgage or charge, if in the hands of a director, manager, or officer to whom it had been granted, the statute has not said so.

It seems to me that the decision of Malins, V.C., in the case of The Wynn Hall Coal Co., so far as it purports to rest on the construction of the language of section 43, cannot be sustained. Mellish, L.J., says in The Native Iron Ore Co.'s case that the rule established by the preceding cases "is founded on a perfectly good equitable principle," but what that principle is I have been unable to discover. In the preceding part of his judgment in the same case he puts it thus: "It is an established rule that where a director or other officer of a limited company advances money on the security of a debenture or mortgage of the company and omits to register it in accordance with the Act, the consequence is he has no charge against the creditors." Is it, then, a personal equity against the director or officer? It may thus be put: If the director knowingly and wilfully omits to register he is subject to a penalty of £50, and if the omission relates to a security of his own, he in addition loses his security. If there is no wilful omission, if it is innocent as in the present instance, he nevertheless loses his security on some "perfectly good equitable principle."

Baggallay, L.J., took part in the decision of The Native Iron Ore Co.'s case; and in the subsequent case, In re South Durham Iron Co., in an elaborate judgment he states what he considers to be the principle of the prior cases thus: "If a director of a company advances money to the company, and takes as security for such advance a charge on the property of the company, and omits to register such charge, he is not at liberty to avail himself of such security against the other creditors of the company." But on what foundation does this forfeiture rest if not on the language of the statute? And there it is not to be found. It seems to me that the effect of these prior decisions has been to inflict a forfeiture which the statute does not impose in addition to the penalty which it does. I quite concur with my noble and learned friend that we cannot add to the weighty reasons of Sir George Jessel in the case of The Globe New Patent Steel and Iron Co., which with him I adopt. The prior decisions may have been wholesome, but they are not warranted by the statute, and I know of no equitable principle on which they can be sustained.

Sale of goods by sample—Latent defect—Implied warranty of merchantableness—Caveat emptor.

Cloth merchants ordered from cloth manufacturers worsted coatings, which were to be equal in quality and weight to certain samples previously sent by the manufacturers, who were aware that the goods were to be sold to tailors. The samples and the goods supplied were similar in every respect, and in both a latent defect existed which rendered the coatings unmerchantable for the purpose of making up into coats in the usual manner.

Held, that in such a contract there is an implied warranty that the goods shall not, by reason of the mode of manufacture, be unfit for use in the manner in which goods of the same quality of material and the same general character and designation ordinarily would be used.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Fry, L.J.) affirming certain findings of Day, J.

The facts and pleadings are set out in the speech delivered by the Earl of Selborne.

An order was made for the trial of certain issues of fact, and Day, J., sitting without a jury, found (inter alia) as follows:—That there was an implied warranty on the sale of the goods that the cloth should be merchantable generally as worsted coatings, and should be properly manufactured, and should be suitable to be made up into coats in the ordinary course of tailors' work."

The Court of Appeal affirmed these decisions, on the grounds that there was a conflict of evidence, and that the court ought not in such a case to overrule the findings.

The appellants appealed to the House of Lords.

Feb. 28; Mar. 1, 3, 4, 7, 8.—Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and R. O. B. Lane, for the appellants.

Waddy, Q.C., and E. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C. (Wilberforce with them), for the respondents.

April 1.—Earl of Selborne.—It does not appear to me to be necessary for the decision of this case to consider whether the ground on which the findings of Day, J., on the principal questions in it were affirmed by the Court of Appeal is one on which it would have been satisfactory to rest your lordships' judgment; because

(a.) Reported by C. G. Napier Trollope, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I believe that, after full argument, and after considering the effect of all the material parts of the evidence, your lordships are of opinion that those findings are substantially right.

The respondents, in July, 1883, ordered from the appellants, who are worsted cloth manufacturers at Bradford, certain goods described in the contracts as "mixt worsted coatings," which were to be in "quality and weight" equal to certain numbered samples which the appellants had previously furnished to the respondents. The goods were of a class well known in the trade under the denomination of "corkscrew twills." They were delivered to the respondents, whose object (known to the appellants) was to sell them to clothiers or tailors in the United States of America. All, or great part of them, were, in fact, disposed of to various customers of the respondents in the United States; but they were returned upon the respondents' hands as not being suitable for the purposes of that trade. They were afterwards sold by auction at a loss; and the counter-claim in this action was brought by the respondents to recover damages against the appellants on the ground that the goods were not merchantable, as they ought to have been.

The goods were, in point of fact, made exactly in the same manner as the samples; and the defect alleged to exist in them—viz., that of "slipperiness" (or want of such cohesion in the texture of the cloth between the warp and weft as was requisite to prevent them from giving way under the strain or ordinary wear when made up into coats in the usual manner) existed equally in those samples.

The defence was, in substance, that the goods were exactly what had been ordered; that there was no implied warranty that they should be merchantable for any purpose for which goods of such a make and texture would not be fit; that goods of that particular make and texture were not wholly unsaleable or incapable of being made up (if the tailor did his work in a manner suitable to their quality) into coats which might endure reasonable wear; that the defect, such as it was, was one of degree only, and was so far patent that, by such an examination of the sample as the manufacturer had a right, under the circumstances, to assume the merchant to have made, it might, and ought to have been, known.

As to so much of this defence to the counter-claim as turns on the question of fact, whether the alleged defect in the cloth existed or not (by which I mean existed as a defect, causing coats made of it in the manner usual among clothiers and tailors to give way under a strain which goods of the same class, such as were generally known and used in the trade, ought to resist), I think your lordships must, on the principle on which the Court of Appeal acted, take the existence of the defect, in a degree sufficient to render the cloth unmerchantable for the purposes for which goods of the same general class had previously been used in the trade, to have been sufficiently established. That question depended in part on practical demonstration by skilled witnesses in the presence of the court, followed up and further verified by the judge himself. Of all possible kinds of evidence this appears to me to be the most unfit for review by a court of appeal. So far, therefore, I think the fact must be assumed in the respondents' favour, on whom the burden of proof, upon that point, undoubtedly lay.

It remains to be considered whether this was a defect of quality against which there was an implied warranty by the appellants under all the circumstances of the case. That it was a defect of quality seems to me indisputable; and if it was known to the respondents when they gave the order, or if (as between themselves and the appellants) they ought to be taken as having discovered, or as having had means which they ought to have used of discovering it from the samples, I should hold that it was covered by the word "quality" as used in the contracts, and that there was no implied warranty against it; but if it was a latent defect, of which knowledge, or means of knowledge, which ought to have been used, could not, under the circumstances, be imputed to the respondents, then I think that the word "quality," as used in the contracts, ought to be restricted to those qualities which were patent, or discoverable from such examination and inspection of the samples as, under the circumstances, the respondents might reasonably be expected to make, and that it cannot be extended to defects in the texture of the samples, rendering the cloth so manufactured unmerchantable for the purposes for which the order was given, of which such examination and inspection would give the merchants, practically, no notice.

I do not think it necessary to go into any of the cases which have been decided upon questions of this kind. I think it sufficient to say that while the doctrine of implied warranty ought not to be unreasonably extended, so as to require manufacturers to be conversant with all the specialties of all trades and businesses which they do not carry on, but for the purposes of which goods may be ordered from them, yet I think it does extend to such a case as the present, if the goods, being of a class known and understood between merchant and manufacturer as in demand for a particular trade or business, and being ordered with a view to that market, are found to have in them, when supplied, a defect practically new, not disclosed by the samples, but depending on the method of manufacture, which renders them unfit for the market for which they were intended. If it would be unreasonable, on the one hand, to expect from the manufacturer a more exact knowledge than in the ordinary course of business would be likely to reach him of the processes and modes of treatment through which manufactured goods may pass, in the hands of the merchant or his customers, before being adapted to their ultimate uses, it would be not less unreasonable to expect from the merchant an exact knowledge, not only of the sort of article which he wants, but also of the processes by which it is to be manufactured. He has a right to presume that the manufacturer understands his own business, and will use such methods as may be proper to produce a good article of the kind ordered. The burden of ascertaining beforehand that this can be done, or how it is to be done, does not rest upon him.

In the present case the defect arose out of the want of sufficient connection or cohesion in the texture of the cloth between the warp and the weft. In all goods of the class called corkscrew twills the weft lies hidden inside, the surface on both sides being warp. Without the application of some kind of test, by pressure or otherwise, to discover whether the defect of "slipperiness" existed or not, or else unravelling the threads from the edges of the sample, there was nothing outwardly observable in the samples furnished by the appellants from which the defect could have been discovered. The appellants attempted, but in my opinion failed, to show that it was customary, as to this class of goods, and in such a business as that of the respondents, to apply a test or tests for the purpose of detecting slipperiness; or that the respondents, as reasonable men of business, ought to have done so. There was, in point of fact, nothing to put the respondents on their guard against any such defect; and they had, in my opinion, a right to assume that the appellants, accepting the order, could and would produce and deliver a good article, having the weight and all the other apparent qualities of the samples, which would be as merchantable for coatings as other articles of the same class previously known in the trade. The evidence leads me to the conclusion that this might have been done by the use of proper means. No such defect had been found before in any cloth of the same class previously manufactured; certainly not of such a kind and degree as to affect in the same or in any other practical way its merchantable character; and it appears that these particular samples, and the goods manufactured from them, were made with that particular arrangement and texture of warp and weft from which the defect arose, according to a design furnished by a very young man then in the employment of the appellants, who was at that time little more than a beginner fresh from his apprenticeship, who did not himself discover the defect, and who admitted that, at that time, he knew nothing of any such danger as that of the cloth slipping.

The respondents had previously dealt with the appellants for cloth of the same general class, and had been supplied by them with goods in which there was no similar defect. When they gave the orders embodied in those particular contracts it is apparent that they wanted, not a worse, but in some respects (particularly as to what is called "handle," which I understand to be a certain softness to the touch) a better article than they had before. All the communications which passed between the parties were addressed to that point, as the result to be produced in the samples and in the manufacture; not to the manner of texture, or of uniting and connecting the warp and the weft, by which it was to be produced. At one time a sample was sent with a thicker weft, which would have cost more money, and was probably for that reason rejected. The same defect existed in that sample also; and the result ultimately arrived at was that the desired softness of "handle" depended on the finish, and could be obtained in cloth of the thickness originally contemplated.

I do not think it necessary, in this state of circumstances, to express any opinion upon the question which might have arisen, if cloth with the requisite softness of "handle" could not have been manufactured without having the defect in question. This was part of the contention of the learned counsel for the appellants; but, if the findings of the learned judge at the trial depended upon the result of the evidence on that point, I am unable to differ from them.

As to colour, your lordships stopped the respondents' counsel, and I think it enough to say that the finding of the learned judge on that point also is, in my judgment, one which ought not to be disturbed.

I move your lordships to affirm the judgment of the court below, and to dismiss this appeal, with costs.

Lord HERSCHELL.—I think that the general principles of law which have to be applied to the facts of this case are well settled and beyond question. It was laid down in Jones v. Bright, 5 Bing. 533, that where goods are ordered of a manufacturer for a particular purpose, he impliedly warrants that the goods he supplies are fit for that purpose. This view of the law has been constantly acted upon from the time of that decision, and was not impeached by the learned counsel for the appellants. It is equally well settled that upon a sale of goods of a specified description which the purchaser has no opportunity of examining before the sale, the goods must not only answer that specific description, but must be merchantable under that description. This doctrine was laid down in Jones v. Just, 16 W. R. 646, L. R. 3 Q. B. 197, where all the previous authorities on the point were reviewed. In the case of Mody v. Gregson, 17 W. R. 176, L. R. 4 Ex. 49, in the Exchequer Chamber, the decision in Jones v. Just was approved of and acted upon, and it was further held that the implied warranty that the goods supplied are merchantable was not absolutely excluded by the fact that the goods were sold by sample, and that the bulk precisely corresponded with it, but was only excluded as regards those matters which the purchaser might, by due diligence in the use of all ordinary and usual means, have ascertained from an examination of the sample. I think that the law enunciated in these cases is sound and not open to doubt. I proceed to consider its application to the facts of the case before us.

The plaintiffs were manufacturers at Bradford; the defendants were merchants dealing in woollen and worsted cloths, carrying on business in Huddersfield and New York.

The order for the goods in respect of which the present litigation has arisen was given by the defendants to the plaintiffs in 1883. The goods ordered were described as "worsted coatings," and they were to correspond in quality and weight with patterns which had been supplied by the plaintiffs. They were of a description known in the trade as "corkscrew," having the warp on either side and the weft not exposed to view. The goods, when delivered, were shipped to the United States, and sold by the defendants to various purchasers there. It turned out, as I think the evidence establishes, that, owing to the mode of manufacture, there was a great tendency in the warp to slip, and this to so serious an extent that when made into garments in the ordinary manner the seams gave way with no more than ordinary tension, and the braid became detached from the cloth. In consequence of this defect many purchasers from the defendants returned the goods to them, or compelled them to make allowances, for which they sought compensation by counter-claim in the present action. It is important to observe that the contract for 1883 was not the first dealing between the parties. The defendants had purchased of the plaintiffs a quantity of "corkscrew" worsted coatings in the previous year, and I cannot see any evidence in the correspondence which passed or in the oral communications to show that it was intended by either of the parties to the contract of 1883 that the goods should be of a different character from those of the previous year in any particular material to the controversy which has to be determined in this action. It is true that the purchasers desired goods of a somewhat softer "handle"; but I think it is abundantly clear on the evidence that this was a matter of "finish," and that it was not the endeavour to give a softer "handle" which led to the defect of excessive slipping.

I have said that the goods were, by the order, to conform to certain patterns supplied by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and approved of by them. There is no doubt that the bulk of the goods corresponded in every particular with these patterns; and this, the plaintiffs allege, is a complete answer to the defendants' claim. The tendency to slip is not, they insist, properly to be called a defect, but a characteristic of the manufactured article which existed in the sample just as much as in the bulk of the goods. I do not think it is very material what name is given to it, but I confess it strikes me that a characteristic arising from a particular mode of manufacture which renders the manufactured article less useful for the purpose for which such an article is ordinarily used, without, so far as appears, any counterbalancing advantage, may well be called a defect.

I think it is proved by the evidence that this defect existed to such an extent that the worsted coatings could not be used for the purpose of being made into coats in the manner usual with goods of the same general description and quality, and that they could only be made into garments capable of resisting ordinary tension by the adoption of special precautions both in regard to breadth of seam and method of sewing. The question arises whether in these circumstances the plaintiffs have complied with their contract by delivering coatings precisely corresponding in quality and weight with the patterns, or whether they are liable to the defendants.

Let me consider first how the case would have stood if no samples had been supplied. Suppose the defendants had simply ordered worsted coatings similar to those they had purchased in the previous year, but with difference of colour, design, and handle, could the plaintiffs have justified supplying under such an or coatings such as those which have given rise to this litigation? It is true that the purpose for which the goods were required was not, as in Jones v. Bright, stated in express terms, but it was indicated by the very designation of the goods, "coatings." I think that upon such an order the merchant trusts to the skill of the manufacturer, and is entitled to trust to it, and that there is an implied warranty that the manufactured article shall not, by reason of the mode of manufacture, be unfit for use in the manner in which goods of the same quality of material, and the same general character and designation, ordinarily would be used. I think, too, that where the article does not comply with such a warranty it may properly be said to be unmerchantable in the sense in which that word is used in relation to transactions of this nature.

It was urged for the appellants by the Attorney-General, in his able argument at the bar, that it would be unreasonable to require that a manufacturer should be cognizant of all the purposes to which the article he manufactures might be applied, and that he should be acquainted with all the trades in which it may be used. I agree. Where the article may be used as one of the elements in a variety of other manufactures, I think it may be too much to impute to the maker of this common article a knowledge of the details of every manufacture into which it may enter in combination with other materials. But no such question arises here. There seems nothing unreasonable in expecting that the maker of "coatings" should know that they are to be turned into coats and other garments, and that he should further know what coatings will and what will not be capable of use for this purpose in the ordinary methods.

It seems to me not open to doubt that in the case which I have supposed the manufacturer would be liable. Does it, then, make any difference that the plaintiffs furnished patterns which were approved of by the defendants, and that the goods delivered were in complete conformity with their patterns? Except upon the assumption (with which I will deal presently) that the patterns ought to have conveyed to the defendants knowledge of the defect of which they complain, I cannot think that it does.

When a purchaser states generally the nature of the article he requires, and asks the manufacturer to supply specimens of the mode in which he proposes to carry out the order, he trusts to the skill of the manufacturer just as much as if he asked for no such specimens. And I think he has a right to rely on the samples supplied representing a manufactured article which will be fit for the purposes for which such an article is ordinarily used, just as much as he has a right to rely on manufactured goods supplied on an order without samples complying with such a warranty.

I adopt what was said by Willes, J., in Mody v. Gregson: "The object and use of such inspection of bulk or sample alike are to give information disclosing directly through the senses what any amount of circumlocution might fail to express. It seems difficult, therefore, to attribute any greater effect to a sample in excluding implication than would be ascribed to express words in the contract giving, as far as words could give, the same amount of information; and as to such words, the doctrine that an express provision excludes implication does not affect cases in which the express provision appears on the true construction of the contract to have been superadded for the benefit of the buyer."

There is no doubt that the implied warranty will be excluded as regards any defects which the sample would disclose to a buyer of ordinary diligence and experience. The inquiry therefore arises whether the defendants by "due diligence in the use of all ordinary and usual means" would have detected in the patterns the defects of which they now complain. I think not. What is "due diligence" must depend upon the circumstances. Having regard to the order given in the previous year, and the mode in which that order was fulfilled, I think that when the defendants made the contract there was nothing which could reasonably lead them to anticipate that the patterns represented goods possessing the defect which was, in fact, inherent in them. And I am satisfied upon the evidence that the defendants, who undoubtedly did not discern the defect, did not fail to do so from neglecting to use the means usually adopted by buyers under like circumstances.

I have, therefore, arrived at the conclusion that the learned judge who tried the case took a correct view of the facts on this part of it, and that his decision was properly affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

As regards the other complaint—viz., that the goods were not woaded according to contract—I have nothing to add to what has been said by the noble earl on the woolsack. It depended entirely upon disputed questions of fact, and I am not satisfied that they have been erroneously determined.

I therefore concur in the motion that has been made

Lord Macnaghten.—I venture to think that the case under review may well be decided on the broad principle that a manufacturer who agrees to supply goods to order, knowing the purpose for which they are required, thereby impliedly undertakes to supply goods fit for the purpose in view.

The real question, as it seems to me, is whether there is anything in the special circumstances of this case to exclude or qualify that implied undertaking.

The goods in question belong to a class of wearing material known in the trade as "corkscrews." They are described in the order as "worsted coatings." Messrs. Van Ingen ordered these coatings for the purpose of sale in the course of their business as woollen merchants. This much, at any rate, was known to Messrs. Drummond. Knowing this, they accepted the order, and supplied the goods. It turns out that the goods, when made up in the ordinary way, give a result which was not foreseen or suspected by either party. Where the cloth is cut, and stitched in the direction of the warp, the warp readily slips over the weft, and under a moderate strain the clothes part at the seams, and where braiding is used the braid peels off the edges.

It was said that this peculiarity is to be found in all corkscrews of a low or medium quality. Defect was not the proper word. It was a "characteristic" of these corkscrews; a somewhat bold euphemism when we know that the actual result was as much a surprise to Messrs. Drummond, who made the cloth, as it was to Messrs. Van Ingen, who bought it. It was said that this characteristic would need extra care in making up, but nothing beyond the resources of the tailors' art. The evidence on this point was not altogether satisfactory, and I am not convinced that with a material of this sort even an ingenious tailor could produce a coat that might be safely worn in public, except, perhaps, by a very careful person. But be that as it may, still the objection remains that no woollen merchant could venture to distribute patterns of such a material, or to recommend it to his customers, without at the same time giving special directions which would amount to a warning against its use. I cannot think that a material which requires such exceptional treatment is reasonably fit for sale by a woollen merchant in the course of his business.

It was argued that, after all, the goods delivered were coatings of a sort and saleable at a price. Indeed, one of the witnesses for the appellants said that at the date of the order, with the defect known, they would have been readily saleable at the price actually given for them. But the question is not were they saleable, but were they fit for the purpose for which they were known to have been ordered. And I observe that this very, witness says that he "would not sell them to a person in the position of Mr. Van Ingen," and that he "should have known that Mr. Van Ingen could not use this class of stuff satisfactorily to himself."

Then it was argued, defect or no defect, the sale was a sale by sample. The goods delivered correspond with the sample, and there is an end to the matter. The seller has fulfilled his bargain. I think the sale was strictly a sale by sample. Certainly, the goods corresponded with the sample only too well. But does this exact correspondence, when it is found to involve an unforeseen and unsuspected defect, relieve the seller from his obligation to supply goods fit for the purpose for which they were intended? After all, the office of a sample is to present to the eye the real meaning and intention of the parties with regard to the subject-matter of the contract which, owing to the imperfection of language, it may be difficult or impossible to express in words. The sample speaks for itself. But it cannot be treated as saying more than such a sample would tell a merchant of the class to which the buyer belongs, using due care and diligence, and appealing to it in the ordinary way and with the knowledge possessed by merchants of that class at the time. No doubt the sample might be made to say a great deal more. Pulled to pieces and examined by unusual tests which curiosity or suspicion might suggest, it would doubtless reveal every secret of its construction. But that is not the way in which business is done in this country. Some confidence there must be between merchant and manufacturer. In matters exclusively within the province of the manufacturer the merchant relies on the manufacturer's skill, and he does so all the more readily when, as in this case, he has had the benefit of that skill before.

Now I think it is plain upon the evidence that at the date of the transaction in question merchants possessed of ordinary skill would not have thought of the existence of the particular defect which has given rise to this action, and would not have discovered its existence from the sample. It appears to me, therefore, that the sample must be treated as wholly silent in regard to this defect, and I come to the conclusion that if every scrap of information which the sample can fairly be taken to have disclosed were written out at length, and embodied in writing in the order itself, nothing would be found there which could relieve the manufacturer from the obligation implied by the transaction.

I prefer to rest my view on this broad principle. But it seems to me that the obligation of the manufacturer may be put in another way with the same result. When a manufacturer proposes to carry out the ideas of his customer, and furnishes a sample to show what he can do, surely in effect he says, "This is the sort of thing you want, the rest is my business, you may depend upon it that there is no defect in the manufacture which would prevent goods made according to that sample from answering the purpose for which they are required." As against the manufacturer, I think it must be taken that the sample is free from all hidden defects of manufacture which would interfere with the proper use of the manufactured article. If the manufacturer supplies goods corresponding with the sample, but free from all such defects, he fulfils his bargain. If that is beyond his power, he must be responsible for undertaking more than he is able to perform.

There was one argument used on behalf of the appellants which it is difficult to state with perfect gravity. It was contended that somehow the merchants were themselves to blame. They gave their "ideas" as it was called to the manufacturers, and they put a limit on the price. They wanted something cheap, with the look of a high-priced article. They ought to be satisfied. Their limit was not exceeded. Their ideas were carried out to the letter. As for the result, however disastrous that may be, it was the natural consequence of aiming too high and paying too low. It was conceded that it would have been the duty of the manufacturers to warn the merchants if they had only known what the result would be. But as they did not know it they claim to shelter themselves under their ignorance—ignorance, be it observed, of their own business—and to throw the blame on the merchants who relied on their skill. It would be just as reasonable for an architect who is employed to build a house, and who builds one unsafe for habitation, to turn round on his employer and say: "You must remember you pressed your ideas upon me; you wanted this and you wanted that; you were all for show, and you objected to expense; you have got exactly what you told me you wanted; and if you had been a little more liberal I should have made provision for a more solid foundation. Of course, I should have told you if I had known the house would be likely to tumble down, but, really, I did not think about it, and so I am not answerable for the instability of the structure."

Your lordships were told that if you uphold the decision of the courts below you will be going further than any decided case has gone. I am not so sure of that. True, no case was cited in which the facts are precisely similar. There is no fraud here as there was in Heilbutt v. Hickson, 20 W. R. 1035, L. R. 7 C. P. 438. If adulteration be something different from fraud, there is no case of adulteration, as there was in Mody v. Gregson. But the governing principle in all the cases is the same. And, indeed, so far as I can see, there is no substantial distinction between the facts in the present case and the facts in Jones v. Bright. There the defendants were manufacturers of copper. The plaintiff wanted copper to sheath a vessel. The defendant knew for what purpose he wanted it. The plaintiff's shipwright went to the defendant's warehouse and selected what he thought would suit, and he sheathed the vessel with the copper he selected himself. The sheathing was found to be decayed at the end of four or five months while it ought to have lasted four or five years. The plaintiff sued for damages. The jury found that the decay of the sheathing was occasioned by some intrinsic defect in the copper, but they could not tell what the cause of that defect was. There was no trace of fraud there. The defect was unknown and unsuspected. The Chief Justice stated that the conduct of the defendants was "most upright." But still he held them liable, and though some members of the court took a narrower ground, he based his judgment on the broad principle that manufacturers were bound to supply an article fit for the purpose for which they knew it was required. I can see no distinction between a sale by sample where the sample gives incomplete and, consequently, misleading information, and a case where the purchaser selects the goods in bulk and those goods have an intrinsic defect not discoverable on inspection.

Your lordships were warned that if the appeal should be dismissed the effect would be to hamper trade, and to cast on manufacturers a burden which has not been cast on them hitherto. That is the stock argument in all these cases. It was urged and rejected in Mody v. Gregson. It met the same fate in Jones v. Bright. It has never yet availed to relieve manufacturers from the liability which they assume by inviting customers to rely on their skill, or to excuse persons from fulfilling their contracts according to the real intention and true meaning of the bargain.

For these reasons I concur in the motion which has been proposed.

LOWE v. FOX. (a.)

Lunatic—Order for reception—Statement of particulars—Alteration of statement—16 & 17 Vict. c. 96, s. 4—Order for discharge—8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, s. 72.

By section 4 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96 the statement of particulars required to be given with an order for the reception of a lunatic is made part of the order, and if the order, properly understood by a reasonable mind, gives all the particulars which it is required that a medical man should have upon receiving the order, it is in accordance with the statute.

The alteration of such an order in a material particular, at all events if made with the privity of the person who relies upon it, will make it invalid, and preclude him from legally relying upon it; but it is not so where the alteration is immaterial.

A letter directing the keeper of an asylum to discharge a patient "as soon as you may think it advisable" is not an order of discharge within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, s. 72.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (34 W. R. 144, 15 Q. B. D. 667), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen, L.J.), reported 34 W. R. 144, 15 Q. B. D. 667.

The appellant brought an action against the respondent, who was the licensee of a private lunatic asylum near Bristol, for false imprisonment. The defendant relied on 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, ss. 99, 105, and 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 3.

The plaintiff, who was the wife of the vicar of Up Ottery, Devon, was admitted as a patient into the defendant's house in September, 1870, under an order signed by her husband and certificates signed by two medical men. The statement accompanying the order in the form given in schedule A. (No. 1) of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96, was, so far as is material, as follows:—"Age of the patient, fifty." "Whether first attack"; "For the last twenty years has been subject to what is termed hysteria." "Age (if known) on first attack"; "Thirty." "When and where previously under care and treatment"; "During this period of twenty years has been constantly under treatment." This order was, on the 1st of October, altered by the plaintiff's husband, who added to the last answer the words, "for hysteria by Dr. Conolly, Hanwell; Dr. Macintosh, Torquay; Dr. Manier, Geneva, etc." This addition was not sanctioned by the Commissioners in Lunacy, as required by section 11 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96.

On the 19th of January, 1871, the plaintiff's husband received a letter from the commissioners stating that the plaintiff ought to be discharged. On the 20th of January the plaintiff's husband wrote to the defendant enclosing a copy of the letter from the commissioners, and saying, "After the commissioners' letter I suppose I must consent to Mrs. Lowe's discharge, and beg you will carry out their suggestion as soon as you may think advisable. Mrs. Lowe will require £10 to take her to London. I enclose a cheque, and should feel greatly obliged by your cashing it for her." The plaintiff was, however, detained at the asylum till February.

Pollock, B., at the trial directed a verdict for the defendant. The Divisional Court (Grove and Denman, JJ.), being of opinion that the case ought to have gone to the jury, directed a new trial. The Court of Appeal restored the judgment of Pollock, B., and the appellant appealed to the House of Lords.

Dec. 3, 6; Jan. 31.—The appellant in person.—The case ought to have been left to the jury, and there should be a fresh trial. First, the answers in the statement are ambiguous, and not categorical. Secondly, the instrument could not be set up as a defence as it had been altered, and was consequently invalid: Pigot's case, 11 Rep. 26: Master v. Miller, 1 Sm. Lead. Cas., 9th ed., 825; Powell v. Divett, 15 East, 29; Davidson v. Cooper, 13 M. & W. 343; Croockewit v. Fletcher, 5 W. R. 348, 1 H. & N. 893; Suffell v. Bank of England, 30 W. R. 932, 9 Q. B. D. 555. Thirdly, the letter of the 20th of January, 1871, was a letter of discharge. These points should all have been left to the jury as evidence of malice.

She also cited Hall v. Semple, 3 F. & F. 337, and Reg. v. Pinder, 24 L. J. Q. B. 148, 3 W. R. C. L. Dig. 184.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and R. O. B. Lane, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Lord HALSBURY, C.—In this case the plaintiff has argued her appeal not only with great ability but with great propriety, and I think has established beyond all question that, whatever the state of her mind was in the year 1871, she is, at all events, now in full possession of her faculties.

In order to detain the plaintiff in the asylum, the gentleman who received her there was bound to receive with her an order justifying that detention, and I think it would be a misfortune if any doubt could be thrown upon the question whether or not that order comprehended not only the mandatory part to keep her under detention, but the particulars which the statute requires as an essential part of the order. So much the plaintiff has established. But the question here is whether in truth (I speak of it now in its original condition, I will deal with the question of its alteration presently) the order was not a compliance with the statute, and I think it is impossible to deal with this order, or indeed with any other written instrument, in the way in which the plaintiff has sought to deal with it—namely, to dissociate it from its contents, and to dissect it into its parts and to read each of those parts as if it had no relation to or dependence upon the rest. The order must be treated as a whole. The question here is whether this order, properly understood by a reasonable mind, does not give all the particulars which it was required that a medical man should have upon receiving the order. Each part of the order has reference to the rest, and after giving the name and the age and the condition, whether married or single, and the condition of life and the religious persuasion, the first statement is that her previous residence was "Vicarage, Up Ottery." I think one cannot dissociate even that statement from the fact that the person signing the order and responsible for its accuracy is a person who lived there also—namely, her husband, and the question which arises upon the following answer would appear to arise upon a hypothesis which I for one do not accept, that each question in this form is intended to be answered "Yes," or "No." No doubt when one requires a categorical reply, the answer "Yes" or "No" is the appropriate answer; but I can conceive cases (and I think this case itself affords an illustration) of a condition of things in which an answer "Yes" or "No" would not give full information and would be liable to mislead.

As the appellant herself has very appropriately observed, we have nothing to do with the truth or falsehood of the statements herein. The certificates of the doctors and the allegations made are made upon their respective responsibilities; but all that which the keeper of the asylum has to regard is whether the statements which are made in the form are such as to justify him in exercising the powers given him under the statute of detaining in confinement the person committed to his charge; and he is made acquainted with these facts by the statement of the husband of the lady, whose previous place of abode had been the vicarage of Up Ottery, where this lady lived. The husband is asked "whether first attack." I agree with the appellant's argument that if you are to take that question by itself and the answer to it by itself, and not associate it with the context, "first attack" must mean the first attack with reference to that which alone the keeper of the house has to consider—namely, the state of her mind. Under ordinary circumstances the answer would be either "Yes" or "No"; but supposing the person is endeavouring to give information and is endeavouring to inform the medical man of the true state of the facts, would it be an adequate answer to say, "Yes, the first attack," without further explanation? If he had said, "Yes, it is the first attack of that which I consider to be absolute insanity, but the fact is that for the last twenty years the lady has been in the borderland between insanity and hysteria," no one can doubt that, besides giving the answer he was bound to give, he would have given valuable and important information. What does he say? He says, "For the last twenty years has been subject to what is termed hysteria." Upon the most ordinary construction of language, surely the person who is pledging his veracity to that statement means, "She has not been suffering from anything I am entitled to call insanity, but I tell you as a fact that for twenty years I have had experience of this, that she has been suffering from what is termed hysteria." No one can doubt that that will not make the information given as part of the order inaccurate, or the order itself invalid. But what is contended apparently is that this is an implied allegation that for twenty years this lady has been insane. It seems to me no rational person could come to such a conclusion. The obvious and natural meaning of it is that she has not been for that time insane, but has for twenty years suffered from hysteria.

That being the language of the original answer to this question, the next is, "Age (if known) on first attack," and the answer is, "Thirty." Here, again, I agree that the hypothesis of the question is first attack of insanity; and if that had stood alone and without being associated with the answers and questions with which it is associated I think the natural conclusion from it would have been that it meant the first attack of insanity. But (and that has been the fallacy of the appellant's argument throughout) you cannot dissociate that answer from the others with which it is associated; and when one sees that the person has been suffering for twenty years from what is described as hysteria, the previous part of the order having shown that the lady's age was now fifty, I should have thought no one could have doubted that the "Age on first attack," "Thirty," pointed to the fact that the first attack was an attack of that from which she had been suffering for twenty years—namely, hysteria. Twenty from fifty leaves thirty; and that is the accurate description of her age at the time of the first attack.

Then there comes "When and where previously under care and treatment?" It is necessary to observe here the form of the question, because it is clear that what that form of question means is that if a person has been previously insane and previously under care as an insane patient, the when and where should be stated. It is to be observed that in the answer the word "care" is designedly omitted, because that would be applicable to patients under the care of persons who would restrain their liberty. Accordingly, that is not answered; but the answer is, "During this period of twenty years has been constantly under treatment;" "care and treatment" being respectively, as I think, intended to point to where under care, and what periods of treatment. The answer upon the facts as we now know them appears to be perfectly accurate. She never was under any care as an insane person, but the writer of this document says:—"As I have already told you in effect that for twenty years she has been suffering from hysteria, so in answer to this question I tell you that during that period of twenty years she has been constantly under treatment. Under treatment for what? Why for that which I have been previously describing in this document." The next question is, "Duration of existing attack," and the answer is "About a fortnight since." Then follow questions and answers which are immaterial for this purpose.

It seems to me that no one with a knowledge of the facts as we are now possessed of them could have answered those questions with a more apparent scrupulous regard to giving the whole state of the facts. I construe this document, and I think the keeper of the house would construe this document, to mean that there has been no previous insanity, that there has been no previous detention under "care." That is how, I think, the keeper of this asylum construed this document. If so, it appears to me that the whole foundation of the argument fails; because it is not a question of a mistake or an irregularity which might be cured so far as the liability of the person is concerned by a bonâ fide belief in the statement and an intention to carry out the provisions of the statute; but, in the view which I take of this case, the statute has been obeyed, for it nowhere requires that the language of this instrument shall be categorical in its character, but requires that it shall truly, on the face of it, give answers to the questions propounded as part of the order which is to justify the detention.

I pass on to the question whether or not the alteration which was made in this order deprives it of any validity; and upon that question I wish to guard myself. I should entirely concur with the appellant that in an order of this description, which, as she truly says, is the foundation upon which the person keeping the asylum is entitled to detain persons, and restrain them from the liberty to which they otherwise have a right, if a material part of it was altered, so that the document no longer spoke the language which it did speak when it was originally received, and upon which the detention was authorized, that vitiated the document. And I think it would be in that case a very calamitous view of the state of the law if any doubt could be entertained as to whether such a misuse of the authority given by the statute could be made with impunity. It is as well, I think, that it should be generally known and understood that any tampering with a document of that sort would impair its validity, and deprive any person professing to act under it of any protection from it. But in all the cases which the appellant has quoted, and in accordance with the principles upon which those cases were decided, it may be clearly perceived that in each and every one of them materiality was an essential condition to make the instrument void.

Now, what is the addition which is said to make this document invalid? "During this period of twenty years has been constantly under treatment"; that was how the document originally stood. Then come the words, "for hysteria." It is to be observed that in the last preceding answer but one the allegation as to the twenty years was that she was subject to hysteria for that time; so that the hysteria, the supposed complaint, which is so far the only thing added, is a mere addition of something which has already appeared upon the face of the instrument. Then comes a statement of various persons by whom the lady has been treated, and it is stated that she has been treated by "Dr. Conolly," or "Hanwell." I introduce the word "of" because it seems to me that that is the necessary and obvious interpretation of the language. The words actually are, "Dr. Conolly, Hanwell; Dr. Macintosh, Torquay; Dr. Monier, Geneva," &c. I do not think that any rational person reading those words would entertain the smallest doubt that the allegation intended to be made by them was that the lady had been under treatment by those various doctors, identifying them by their different residences, and that she had been under treatment by those doctors for the hysteria which had been previously stated to be the complaint under which she had been suffering for the last twenty years.

I now come to the last point, which turns upon the language of the statute; and it is not unimportant to observe what the statute provides (8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, s. 72):—"If and when any person who signed the order on which any patient was received into any licensed house shall, by writing under his hand, direct" (I am leaving out the words which are not appropriate to the present purpose) "that such patient shall be discharged or removed, then and in such case such patient shall forthwith be discharged or removed as the person who signed the order for his reception shall direct." The question is whether the letter of the 20th of January complied with the conditions of that statute. That point appears to me to be beyond all doubt. No doubt the appellant is right in saying that the person who signed the order had no right to appeal to the discretion of the keeper of the asylum. I think she has made out that it is a question of acting under the authority of the statute, and that the person who had her under lawful detention already was bound, if he received an order, not to exercise a discretion, but to comply with the order if it was such as is prescribed in the language of the section. But the question for your lordships is whether it was an order; and when it is relied upon as an order or authority one must see what is the language of the instrument itself, so as to ascertain whether there was an order, a peremptory order, to discharge absolutely, giving no authority or discretion to the person who had the lady under detention not to act upon it. It is impossible to read the language of the instrument and not to see (indeed, the lady herself seems to be conscious of the fact) that the person sending that letter shrank from the responsibility of giving an absolute order, and intended to leave it to the discretion of the person who was to receive that which she describes as an order. The question, then, is whether the person who acted in pursuance of that direction and fulfilled strictly the authority which he got—namely, to exercise a discretion to retain the lady for the period of a fortnight, disobeyed an "order" within the language of the statute. It seems to me that it is impossible to maintain for one moment that he did; and I am therefore of opinion, and so move your lordships, that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed, and that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Watson.—I am of the same opinion. I am quite satisfied with the reasons which have been assigned by the Lord Chancellor, and I also agree with the reasons which have been given in the Court of Appeal. It appears to me that, so far as concerns the order of admission, the Divisional Court erred in reading each of these answers separately in connection with the question to which they are severally appended, without taking into account the plain connection, both in grammar and in substance, which subsists between them all.

Lord Fitzgerald.—I also concur in the judgment which has been delivered by the Lord Chancellor, affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeal and adopting its reasons.

Lord Herschell.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I only desire to add that I entirely concur with what my noble and learned friend has said as to the alteration of such a document as this. I think it is important that it should be understood that the judgment we are delivering rests upon the fact that the alteration was an alteration wholly immaterial, and that it is not intended to cast any doubt upon the proposition that the alteration of a document of this description in a material particular, if made, at all events, with the privity and knowledge of the person who is relying upon it, would make it invalid, and would preclude him from legally relying upon it. I say that because certain expressions have been cited which would seem to indicate that in some cases, at all events, of a somewhat similar description, a document is invalidated even if the alteration be made against the will and in fraud of the person who has charge of it and who has to rely upon it. For my own part, I desire entirely to reserve my opinion upon that point until it arises, because I do not feel at present prepared to say that in every case an alteration which would invalidate the document when made with the privity and knowledge of the person having th custody of it and relying upon it would invalidate made in fraud of him and against his will.

Lord Macnaghten.—I am of the same opinion.

Order appealed from affirmed; and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lunacy.

May 2.

In re Harwood. (a.)

Practice—Lunacy—Lunatic mortgagee—Power of sale—Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 70), ss. 116, 136—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), s. 3.

Where a mortgagee becomes lunatic it is doubtful whether the court has jurisdiction, under section 136 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, by one order to authorize the committee to sell and also to convey the mortgaged estate.

The usual practice, which is to direct the property to be sold, and then by a subsequent order to vest it in the purchaser under section 3 of the Trustee Act, 1850, should be adhered to.

The question raised in this case was whether the court had jurisdiction, under section 136 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, by one order to direct the committee to sell and also to convey the property of a lunatic.

The property of the lunatic in the present case consisted (inter alia) of a legal mortgage by underlease of four freehold houses, and contained the usual power of sale. The interest on the mortgage being heavily in arrear, the committee was desirous of selling the property under the power.

The usual practice in such cases was for the court to give leave to sell, and then, on a subsequent occasion, to make a vesting order under section 3 of the Trustee Act, 1850.

On the 7th of April, 1886, the committee took out a summons for liberty to "forthwith put up for sale the property" comprised in the mortgage, pursuant to the power of sale therein contained, "and to convey such property when sold to the purchaser thereof, or as he shall direct."

The Master in Lunacy, by his certificate dated the 24th of March, 1887, certified that he approved of the sale, and stated that, having regard to the doubts which had been expressed before him as to whether such a sale of mortgaged premises could be duly carried into effect under the provisions of section 136 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, in conjunction with section 3 of the Trustee Act, 1850, or whether such sale could be effected under one or other of such sections alone, and which of them, or in what other mode such sale should be made, and the requisite conveyance or assignment to a purchaser executed, he submitted the matter to the consideration of the Lords Justices.

H. M. Humphry, in support of the application, submitted that the court had jurisdiction, either under section 136 or section 116, to make the order asked for.

COTTON, L.J.—The question is whether, when a mortgage is vested in a lunatic as part of his estate, the directions to sell and also to convey may be made in one and the same order. It is said that we can do this under section 136 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, and the question turns on the equivocal use which is made of the word "power." The object is to transfer the legal estate from the committee to the purchaser, and in my opinion there is not a power within the meaning of section 136. A power of sale in a mortgage is simply this. Having the legal estate, the mortgagee may convey the absolute interest to the purchaser, the power only giving him the ability to cut off the equitable interest of the mortgagor in the property. The power sought to be exercised is a power which the lunatic, if he had been sane, could have exercised by assignment of the legal estate, thereby barring the equitable. It is more doubtful whether what is asked for could be done under section 116; but it would be dangerous to introduce a new practice, and the fact that some small expense would be saved is not sufficient to induce us to do something which may be a ground for somebody taking an objection to the title.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we ought not to try an experiment the effect of which may hereafter be that someone may hereafter object that we had no power to do what we are now asked to do. I think we had better keep to the old practice, which probably the doubts suggested. The order will only authorize a sale.

Application refused.

Practice—Transfer of actions to county court for trial—Action for slander—County Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), s. 10—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 67.

Section 67 of the Judicature Act, 1873, does not limit section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867, and the High Court has power to send down an action of slander to be tried in the county court.

Appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court (Field and Manisty, JJ.) affirming an order made in chambers that in the event of the plaintiff failing to give security for costs the action should be remitted to trial before a county court, under section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867.

(a.) Reported by A. H. TODD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 67, section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867, is to apply to all actions commenced or pending in the High Court of Justice in which any relief is sought which can be given in a county court.

By the County Courts Act, 1867, s. 10, power is given to the court or a judge in the superior court in actions for "malicious prosecution . . . slander . . . or other actions of tort," when the plaintiff has no visible means of paying costs, to make an order that unless the plaintiff give security for costs or show that he has a cause of action fit to be tried in the superior courts, the cause be sent down for trial before a county court.

By the County Courts Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 58, the county court is not to have cognizance of actions for slander.

Cock, Q.C., and Ellis, for the plaintiff.—Section 67 of the Judicature Act, 1873, limits section 10 of the County Courts Act, 1867, as regards such an action as an action for slander, in which relief could not be given by the county court: Garnett v. Bradley, 26 W. R. 698, 3 App. Cas. 944.

Rose-Innes, for the defendant, was not heard.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that the decision in Garnett v. Bradley has nothing to do with the present case. That was a question of costs, and depended on whether certain powers given by the Judicature Acts were inconsistent with other Acts as to costs. It was there held that the new legislation was inconsistent with the earlier enactments, and that these had been repealed. Everybody is agreed as to the principle involved in that decision, but it has nothing to do with a case where two different enactments are involved. I think that Lord Blackburn, in Garnett v. Bradley, was dealing with the question whether an action for slander could be "entertained" by a county court—that is, whether an action for slander can be brought as a county court action in a county court. The only question here is whether two enactments—section 10 of the Act of 1867 and section 67 of the Act of 1873—are so inconsistent that the earlier must be held to be repealed by the later. Section 10 of the Act of 1867 dealt with certain definite cases, and gave power to the superior courts to use the judge of the county court as their instrument—that is to say, to send a case to the county courts to be tried. When that had been done the judgment would be carried out as a judgment of the superior court. The provisions of section 67 of the Judicature Act do not contain an enumeration of cases, but give power to the High Court to send all actions pending in the High Court to the county court to be tried, with this limitation to the word "all"—viz., actions "in which any relief is sought which can be given in a county court." Section 10 is intended to remain in force with regard to all the cases mentioned in it, and additional power is given to the superior court to deal with other cases in which any relief is sought which can be given in the county court. The two sections are not inconsistent, and stand together.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It would be astonishing if it were now to be discovered that this Act of 1873, which has now been for so many years in operation, had been misunderstood by judges of the High Court as to their power to remit actions to the county court. Section 67 of the Judicature Act applies to all actions in the High Court. When that court was created there was a doubt felt whether section 10 of the earlier enactment would work at all. Therefore, this section was introduced, and it is very wide in its terms. The words in section 67 which have been commented on restrict the meaning of the word "all," and do not apply to the classes of actions mentioned in section 10.

Section 67 was intended to extend the power conferred by the earlier statute.

Ship—Dock rates—"Trading inwards"—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), s. 230.

By section 230 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, "all vessels entering into or leaving the docks shall be liable, according to the tonnage burthen thereof, to pay dock tonnage rates according to the respective class of voyages—that is to say, vessels trading inwards shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports from which such vessels shall have traded to Liverpool; vessels arriving in ballast, but trading outwards, and also vessels built within the port of Liverpool, or trading outwards, shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards. . . . One arrival with one departure shall be considered as one voyage, whether such vessel shall have traded both inwards and outwards, without regard to any intermediate ports to which she may have traded, but such vessel shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which such vessel shall have traded."

Certain vessels of the plaintiffs carrying cargo from Glasgow to Bombay, called at Liverpool to load cargo, but did not unload any cargo until they reached Bombay. On the return voyage part of the cargo was unloaded at Liverpool, but no fresh cargo was taken in, and the vessels proceeded to Glasgow. Dock rates having been charged by the defendants on the basis of their being vessels trading outwards to Bombay and trading inwards from Bombay,

Mathew, J., held that the voyage from Liverpool to Glasgow and back constituted one voyage, on which proportionate dock rates could be charged, and that the voyage from Liverpool to Bombay and back also constituted one voyage, on which proportionate dock rates could be charged.

Held (by Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), that the dock rates should be charged on the vessels as trading inwards from Glasgow to Liverpool on the voyage out to Bombay, and as trading inwards from Bombay to Liverpool on the voyage home to Glasgow; and that the arrival from Glasgow and departure for Bombay and the arrival from Bombay and departure for Glasgow each constituted one voyage.

Appeal from the decision of Mathew, J.

The plaintiffs were shipowners at Glasgow, whose vessels were in the habit of starting from Glasgow with cargo, calling at Liverpool to fill up with cargo, and then proceeding to Bombay and unloading there. No cargo was unloaded at Liverpool. On the return voyage from Bombay to Glasgow the vessel sometimes called at Liverpool to land cargo there, and sometimes proceeded direct to Glasgow without calling at Liverpool at all.

By the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, s. 230, "all vessels entering into or leaving the docks shall be liable, according to the tonnage burden thereof, to pay to the board the rates called dock tonnage rates according to the respective classes of voyages—that is, vessels trading inwards shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports from which such vessel shall have traded to Liverpool; vessels arriving in ballast but trading outwards, and also vessels built within the port of Liverpool, or trading outwards, shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards; vessels arriving in ballast at and departing in ballast from the said port shall be liable to one moiety only of the rates payable to the most distant of all the ports for which such vessels shall clear out or depart; one arrival with one departure of a vessel shall be considered as one voyage, whether such vessel shall have traded both inwards and outwards, or arrived and departed in ballast and without regard to any intermediate ports to which she may have traded while absent from Liverpool, but such vessel shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which such vessel shall have traded. Vessels arriving in ballast, and trading outwards, and having paid the rates payable on such trading outwards shall afterwards, on trading inwards, be liable to the rates payable on vessels trading inwards."

The rates were specified in a table of rates, and varied according to the distance of the place to or from which the vessel traded.

Vessels trading between Liverpool and any Scotch port were charged at the rate of 4½d. per ton. Vessels trading to any port in Asia were charged at the rate of 1s. 5d. per ton. The defendants charged the plaintiffs 1s. 5d. per ton on vessels entering and departing from Liverpool on the voyage from Glasgow to Bombay, and also 1s. 5d. per ton on vessels entering and departing from Liverpool on the voyage from Bombay to Glasgow. The plaintiffs paid these rates under protest, and brought this action to recover the sums overcharged.

Mathew, J., held that the defendants were entitled to charge at the rate of 4½d. per ton in respect of the voyage from Glasgow to Liverpool and back (counting that as one voyage), and 1s. 5d. per ton in respect of the voyage from Liverpool to Bombay and back (counting that as one voyage), and gave judgment for the plaintiffs on this basis.

The defendants appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 21.—The following judgment was read by Lord ESHER, M.R.—The Liverpool Dock Acts are a long series of statutes dealing with a complicated and technical business, a business which has been developing enormously from period to period. The statutes are therefore necessarily complicated, probably wanting in consistency, and therefore obscure, certainly full of terms and phrases usual in the business and unusual in ordinary colloquial language. The great canon of construction of such documents is to learn the business, and the language of the business with regard to which they are written, and then to construe the documents by applying them to that business and to that language. The business in the present case is that of a great sea-port and harbour with docks, the whole adapted, constructed, and managed for the importation and exportation of goods by sea. In order to carry on such a business the principal elements are deep channels, beacons, buoys, lights, quays, dock entrances, docks, and warehouses. The staff of persons employed must be various, including pilots, harbour masters, dock masters, labourers, police, clerks, &c. The income necessary to maintain so vast a business must be collected from those who use the harbour and docks. They are used by ships which come to and use them for the purpose of carrying goods. In such a seaport both ships and goods must be subject to the Customs. The terms and phrases used in the statutes and documents applied to such a business will therefore be those commonly used by merchants and shipowners in regard to ships and to the import and export of goods, and by Revenue officers with regard to the business of the Customs relating to ships and goods. The income in such cases is collected by a system of rates, and the chief rates are almost necessarily, from the nature of things, harbour rates, light dues, pilotage dues, dock rates, crane and quay rates. "The harbour rates" and "light and pilotage dues" are applicable to ships coming into and going out of the port or harbour; they are payments for facilities given to the ships, which facilities are equally necessary for the ships, whether they are loaded or unloaded, whether they do or do not enter the docks. The "dock rates" are the payments for the use of the docks as distinguished from the rest of the port or harbour. The docks give facilities to trading ships with regard to their trade, which is the trade of carrying imported and exported goods, and to the goods with regard to the trade of importing and exporting them as articles of commerce. This case deals more with the docks and the dock rates than with the harbour and the harbour rates. It is right, therefore, to consider with the greater attention the course of business as to the docks. There is considerable skill and labour in moving a ship in a dock to or from the dock gates; but no one who has not seen it can realize the skill and labour exercised by the servants of the dock-board in the conduct and superintendence of the entry or exit of a large ship through the gates of a Liverpool dock from or into the fierce tideway of the Mersey. So far as the ship is concerned, the chief anxiety and labour with regard to the use by her of the docks is the anxiety and labour of her entry and exit. The use of the docks for the goods imported and exported is a use of warehouses, quays, cranes, and the labour of putting the goods into or taking them out of the ship.

There is, of course, a payment, as of rent, for the time during which ships and goods are in the dock, and there is an immense expense incurred in providing for the safety of ships and goods whilst in the docks. It is obvious that the mode of imposing payment for the various services and facilities thus described required ingenuity, and it was certain to be, and it is the case, that in order to understand correctly the schemes of those who have imposed the different rates one must understand the business with which they were dealing. The light and pilotage dues, and other harbour dues payable for ships, are easily understood. They are payable in respect of the use of the entrances to the Mersey and of the use of the Mersey. They are, therefore, obviously payable equally by ships which do, and ships which do not, enter the docks. The dock rates are necessarily extra to these, and are, moreover, the higher rates. It is clear, therefore, that no ship will enter a dock unless for repairs or for carrying on its trade—namely, the trade of carrying goods to or from the port of Liverpool. The scheme of payment for the use of the docks by the ship and by the goods, a scheme of payment according to the distance of a port to or from which a ship trades to Liverpool, is based, no doubt, upon good business principles; but it is not easy, and it is unnecessary, to explain the grounds of it. Inasmuch as the dock is, as a matter of fact, used only by a ship carrying on its trade (except in the case of repairs), the payment for the ship would be sure to be confined to a trading ship. The trading of a ship consists in her business of carrying goods. The goods which she is thus carrying, as part of her trade, are at Liverpool goods which she carries to or from Liverpool as a terminus of carriage. The business phrases for the business of the ship in carrying goods to or from such an import and export port as Liverpool are, in Customs phraseology, "vessels clearing inwards or outwards," in mercantile or business phraseology, "vessels trading inwards or outwards." They are corresponding phrases used to describe the same transaction. Ships which do not carry goods into Liverpool to be there delivered are not by the Customs "cleared inwards" to Liverpool, or in business said to be ships "trading inwards" to Liverpool. No business man would, in my opinion, think of saying that a ship which came into Liverpool with a declared intention of not delivering any goods there, and which delivered no goods there, was a ship "trading inwards." They are, in Customs and business phraseology, said to be ships "entering into Liverpool." Ships which do not carry goods by taking them in at Liverpool to be carried elsewhere are not by the Customs "cleared outwards" from Liverpool, or in business said to be ships "trading outwards" from Liverpool. They are, in Customs and business phraseology, said to be "ships sailing," or "outward bound." The "clearing inwards" is the authority from the Customs to "trade inwards," the "clearance outwards" is the authority of the Customs to "trade outwards." So far as the use of the docks is concerned, the trading of the ships means taking goods on board in a dock to be carried elsewhere, or bringing goods into a dock to be delivered to the consignees from that dock. Either of these transactions may happen under different circumstances. First, a ship may come into the dock empty in order to take goods on board and leave the dock loaded; or, secondly, she may come into dock loaded in order to discharge her goods there and to leave the dock empty; or, thirdly, she may come into dock loaded in order to discharge her goods there, and then to load another cargo and leave the dock loaded. There was, I will venture to say, no other state of circumstances (unless she was to come or stay in for repairs) in which, as matter of business and fact, it was, when the original Liverpool Dock Acts were passed, contemplated that a ship would be in a Liverpool dock. The exceptional mode of dealing adopted by the plaintiffs must have arisen at a later period. The statutes should be first construed according to the usual business which existed when they were enacted; then it will be necessary to determine how they apply to the exceptional and more novel work.

The main point is to see whether the statutes have adopted, as to old existing business, the business phraseology. If they have, we must apply that phraseology to the case under discussion. Having read all the statutes brought before us, it appears that all of them deal with the different rates in, as nearly as possible, the same terms. Attention and examination may, therefore, be confined to the Statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii., passed in 1858. The title divides the subject as I have stated that business must divide it—namely, into a dealing with the docks and a dealing with the port and harbour. The rates are, in the first part of the Act, described to be dock rates, tonnage rates, graving dock rates, harbour rates, wharf rates, warehouse rents, town dues, anchorage dues. The fourth part deals with the management of the docks and quays, and with the absolute control given to the harbour masters and dock masters over the entry and exit of ships into and from the docks.

The fifth part deals with the management of the port and harbour. The sixth part deals with the pilotage. The pilotage rates are dealt with in section 133, and are imposed in respect of piloting "a vessel to the port" or "out of the port." No limitation of the vessel being a trading ship, no mention of going into dock. They are payable by every vessel "coming to" or "going out" of the port. The seventh part deals with transit-sheds, warehouses, and goods. The eleventh part deals with rates and duties. This part divides "the tonnage rates," which is a general nomenclature, into "dock tonnage rates" and "harbour rates," following the business division. By section 238 "all" vessels "coming into" or "going out of" "the port" of Liverpool, and not entering the docks, shall be liable to the tonnage rates, hereinafter called "harbour rates," &c. It must be observed that these are to be paid by all vessels, and they are said to be vessels "coming into" and "going out" of, not trading into or trading out of the port. By section 239 "The objects for which such harbour rates shall be levied, &c., are," maintenance of the lighthouses, lightships, buoys, beacons, seamarks, landmarks, telegraphs, lifeboats, &c., and the improvement of the port and harbour in any other respect than in the construction and maintenance of the docks, &c. The division, the natural division, as a matter of business, is exactly followed in the statute, and the statute imposes the incidence of payment exactly as business would. Bearing this in mind, we must endeavour to construe section 230. In it vessels are described as, first, vessels "trading inwards"; secondly, vessels arriving in ballast, but "trading outwards"; thirdly, the statement is "vessels built within the port of Liverpool or trading outwards"—these, it is said, "shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards." The section continues: "One arrival with one departure of a vessel shall be considered as one voyage, whether such vessel shall have traded both inwards and outwards, or arrived or departed in ballast, &c., but such vessel shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which such vessel shall have traded." The first of these divisions corresponds with the second of the business divisions above set forth; the second of these corresponds with the ordinary mode of conducting the first business division. The third division in the statute certainly corresponds with the third business division. The question is whether the third division in the statute does not also describe that which I have called the exceptional mode of conducting the first business division.

It is urged that it does not, because it is said that, in order to make a grammatical conclusion to the phrase "and also vessels built within the port of Liverpool," you must read "and" instead of "or" as the following word, and that then the exceptional mode is not described. But let us dissect the sentence, and it may be read thus: Vessels arriving in ballast, but trading outwards, shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards. Vessels built within the port of Liverpool shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards. Vessels trading outwards shall be liable to the rates payable in respect of the most distant of all the ports to which they shall trade outwards. If the section be so read, it covers all modes of trading outwards. If it is true to say that, in order to make good grammar, "or" must be read "and," it follows that the circumstances of the trade described as exceptional are not found by the statute at all. In such a case the ship most clearly, in my opinion, does not "trade inwards"; she "enters into" the dock, but does not "trade" inwards. If she is not within the description of a vessel "trading outwards," although, in fact, she does trade outwards, and uses the dock solely for the purpose of trading outwards, she will pay nothing in Liverpool at that time for the use of the docks. If she should not return to Liverpool, she would have used the Liverpool Docks, and would never pay anything for the use of the docks. I cannot think that it is a real business view, and, therefore, I think it is not the legal interpretation to say that for the sake of grammar the word "or" should be changed into "and" so as thereby to produce so unbusinesslike a result. The court cannot properly read one word for another used in a statute, unless it is clear beyond doubt that there is a mere error in the record of the word. If there is any reasonable doubt, the word actually used must remain.

It seems to me that a ship that goes into a Liverpool dock solely for the purpose of taking goods on board to carry them away from Liverpool is a vessel "trading outwards" within the words of the statute, and must, under and by the virtue of the statute, pay the rates as on a vessel "trading outwards," and is not a vessel "trading inwards."

Another part of the contention between the parties raised the question of the construction of the latter part of section 230 as to one arrival and one departure to be considered as one voyage. Here, again, let us examine the business in order to see whether it will not teach us the true construction of the statute. If a ship goes into a dock to unload, does unload, and then loads a new cargo before she goes out, she is moved through the dock twice, comes into the gates once, and goes out once. If a ship comes into the dock, and unloads, and goes out empty, and afterwards comes in empty, and loads, and goes out, she is moved through the dock four times, comes into the gates twice, and goes out twice. One would expect that the payment in the first case would be less than in the second, considering the difference, before explained, of the skill, labour, and anxiety necessarily bestowed on the two operations.

To which, then, of the two cases does the enactment in the statute apply? As matter of business to the first, stipulating for one payment for the performance of one operation. It would seem to be bad business to stipulate for the same payment for the performance of two operations as is charged if one only of the two operations is performed. The words of the section are rather more adapted to the first view than to the second. The words are "one arrival with one departure"; they are not "one arrival and one departure"; not "one departure and one arrival." If the words are ambiguous, the business view should prevail.

It was suggested, in answer to this reasoning and the view, that ships enter a dock and discharge in it, and are then moved to another dock, and there load. If that is so, which is not proved, the removal is made by order of the Dock Board for its convenience, the removal giving no advantage to the ship, and the board has, in the later Acts, taken that burden without additional payment rather than alter the incidents of rating, which have been preserved intact through all the Acts. When the mode of rating was first established there were not many docks in Liverpool, and this suggested removal from one place to another in all probability did not take place. I am of opinion that the statute deals with the first case in the limitation it confers, and not with the second. In applying these views to the present case we must notice the contentions raised between the parties. The contention on behalf of the plaintiffs, raised in the correspondence, was that their ships traded inwards into Liverpool from India, and afterwards traded outwards from Liverpool to India, and that these two voyages made one arrival and one departure to be considered as one voyage. It must be observed that, in order to make this point, the Glasgow ship was represented as commencing her carrying business in India to Glasgow instead of as commencing in Glasgow to carry to India. The reason is obvious; without so doing the Indian trade would not commence by an arrival at Liverpool but by a departure from Liverpool. And in this contention the voyages from Glasgow to Liverpool and from Liverpool to Glasgow were dropped out. The view of the learned judge, as I understand it, is that the entry into the docks from Glasgow is a trading inwards, leastwise by the ship, and she must pay rates accordingly; that the ship there trades outwards to India, and afterwards trades inwards from India, these two making one arrival and one departure to be considered as one voyage; and that the voyage to Glasgow is also a part of the voyage from India. As to these views I cannot agree that, as a matter of fact, the ship trades inwards from Glasgow, or that she is to be considered as doing so within the meaning of the statute. Neither, for the reasons I have given, can I agree that the two Indian voyages are one arrival and one departure to be considered as one voyage within the meaning of the statute. I do not agree that the voyage from Liverpool to Glasgow, whether carrying cargo or not, is to be considered as one voyage with the voyage to India. I have read all the ship's papers furnished to us at our request. The ships are not "cleared out" from Glasgow to Liverpool, but from "Glasgow to India, viâ Liverpool." The ships, on arrival at Liverpool from Glasgow, are not "cleared inwards." They are not treated as trading coastwise under a "transire" or under a "special coasting order." The captain's report shows that the Glasgow goods are exported to India, and are not to be landed at Liverpool.

The ships are at Liverpool "cleared outwards" for India. On their return they are "cleared inwards" from India. All this mode of dealing with the ships by the Customs seems to me to tend to the same conclusion. I am of opinion that the ships, on arrival from Glasgow, do not trade "inwards to Liverpool." A ship cannot, therefore, in respect of that entry, when she goes into a dock, be liable to "dock dues." By her entry into the Mersey she has "entered into the port of Liverpool," and is liable to "harbour dues." When the ship enters into the docks and loads therein for India she is "trading outwards to Liverpoal from India" and must pay the dock dues on such a trading outwards. When she returns to Liverpool, and enters the docks to discharge, she is "trading inwards to Liverpool from India," and must pay the dock dues accordingly. This voyage cannot, within the statute, be considered as one with the voyage out to India. The voyage to Glasgow is to be considered as one with the voyage from India. I am, therefore, of opinion that the charges imposed by the defendants were correct, and that the judgment should be entered for them. The appeal, in my opinion, should be allowed.

FRY, L.J.—The judgment which I am about to read is the judgment of my brother Bowen and myself.

The question in the present case turns entirely on the true construction of the 230th section of the Liverpool Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, which imposes dock tonnage rates in the port of Liverpool. These rates, it may be at once observed, apply to all vessels entering into or leaving the docks, whilst the harbour rates apply to all vessels coming into or going out of the port and not entering into the docks.

The plaintiffs are the owners of a line of steamers, and the course of business is that each of these vessels starts from Glasgow with a part of her cargo, then goes to Liverpool, enters the docks, unloads no part of her cargo, takes in more cargo, sails for India, and thence returns sometimes to Liverpool, and thence to Glasgow, and sometimes to Glasgow direct.

When one of these steamers reaches Liverpool from Glasgow and enters the docks, is she trading inwards within the meaning of that expression as used in the section in question?

No evidence was adduced as to the meaning of the phrase, if it be a technical one which admits of such evidence. The course of business pursued by the plaintiffs' steamers was, at the passing of the Act, less common than it is now, but it is not shown to us either by evidence or admission whether such a course of business was existing or non-existing at that time.

We are therefore constrained to ascertain the meaning of the words in question from our knowledge of the English language, aided by the light which the section of the statute throws on them, and by the course of business which we know to be pursued in ports and docks.

The words "trading inwards" would, we think, most naturally, and, therefore, primarily apply to the case of a vessel entering the docks for the purpose of discharging her cargo; but we think that the words may, without violence, describe also any vessel laden with goods in the course of trade entering the docks for the purposes of her trade, whether loading or unloading; and this includes one of the plaintiffs' vessels arriving from Glasgow, for she is a vessel on a trading voyage—she is a trader, and she enters inwards.

Are the words used in the statute in the first of these significations only or in both?

The section is far from clear, but a study of it convinces us that the following propositions may be evolved from it:—

(1.) That all vessels entering into the docks, as well as all vessels leaving the docks, are made liable.

(2.) That vessels entering the docks are sub-divided into two classes, and two classes only—namely, those described as trading inwards, and those described as arriving in ballast.

(3.) That vessels leaving the docks are capable of sub-division into six classes—

1. Those trading inwards and trading outwards;
2. Those trading inwards and leaving in ballast;
3. Those arriving in ballast and trading outwards;
4. Those arriving in ballast and leaving in ballast;
5. Those built within the port and trading outwards;
6. Those built within the port and going out in ballast;

And that all these classes except the last are referred to in the section and are the subject of express charges.

(4.) That no vessel is to pay both inward and outward rates.

(5.) That inward rates are to be paid preferentially, as is shown, amongst other things, by the provision that one arrival followed by one departure is treated as one voyage, and not one departure followed by one arrival; and further, by the enactment of section 247, that the rates in question shall be paid on the arrival of the vessel.

We have thus stated the conclusions at which we have arrived from a study of the section in question. It is not easy to explain every word in it in accordance with any one of the interpretations suggested to us; nor should we usefully occupy time in a minute criticism of every expression of a somewhat clumsily-drawn clause. It may, however, be well to observe that a strong argument was raised on the word "or" in the expression "vessels built within the port of Liverpool or trading outwards" in the third paragraph of the section in question. But in our opinion the word "or" must be read "and," for the general drift of the clause requires this, and in the description of what must be the same class of vessels at the end of the clause, and is therefore, strictly speaking, a parallel passage, we find the word "and" substituted for "or," and the class of vessels described as "vessels built in the port of Liverpool and trading outwards."

If the view of the section above stated be correct, the plaintiffs' steamer, when she enters the dock, must be either (1) a vessel in ballast, or (2) a vessel trading inwards, or (3) her case is omitted. But she is plainly not a vessel in ballast, for her contents are goods, not ballast; no casus omissus can be admitted where the section declares that all vessels entering the port are charged; therefore she is a vessel trading inwards.

This conclusion, to which we are driven by the section itself, appears to us, for the reasons already given, to do no violence to the words trading inwards, and to be in accordance with the general scheme of the enactment, which prefers in every case an entering to a leaving charge.

It was contended that the dock company are at liberty to charge the plaintiffs' vessels as if the course began in India, and as if one departure with one subsequent arrival constituted one voyage. In our opinion this contention cannot prevail, for in fact each of the vessels has first arrived from Glasgow and not from India, and she is required to pay on that arrival; and, secondly, the statute declares one arrival with (i.e., followed by) one departure to be one voyage, but contains no declaration in favour of one departure with, or followed by, one arrival.

In our opinion the declaration of the learned judge should be varied by declaring that the defendants are entitled to charge in respect of every ship of the plaintiffs' arriving from Glasgow and sailing for India as mentioned in paragraph 2 of the statement of claim, the dock tonnage rate as on a ship trading inwards from Glasgow, or in respect of every ship of the plaintiffs' arriving from India and sailing for Glasgow, as also mentioned in the said paragraph of the statement of claim, the dock tonnage rate as on a ship trading inwards from India.

In our opinion this variation in the judgment ought not to affect the costs of the appeal, which should be borne by the appellants.

WOOD v. WOOD. (a.)

Separation deed—Covenant not to molest—Allowance under deed—Subsequent adultery—Alimony pendente lite.

By a separation deed the husband covenanted to make an allowance to the wife, determinable upon her molesting him. The husband subsequently discontinued the allowance, on the ground that the wife had broken her covenant not to molest him.

The wife afterwards instituted a suit for judicial separation, and applied for an allowance of alimony pendente lite.

Held, that she was entitled to such allowance.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., sitting as Vacation Judge.

Mr. and Mrs. Wood executed a separation deed, dated the 3rd of December, 1886, which (inter alia) contained clauses providing (clause 8) that Mr. Wood should pay a sum of £9 per month for the maintenance of Mrs. Wood, and (clause 9) that Mrs. Wood should maintain herself out of that sum.

Clause 12 was as follows:—

"The said M. A. Wood will from henceforth live separate from the said E. Wood, and shall not and will not seek for restitution of conjugal rights, or in any way, either directly or indirectly, molest, annoy, or interfere with the said E. Wood, and in particular shall and will not visit the said E. Wood, or hold any communication with him other than by letter."

The payments under this deed had recently been discontinued by Mr. Wood on the ground, as he alleged, that Mrs. Wood had broken the above covenant not to molest him.

On the 18th of July, 1887, Mrs. Wood presented a petition for judicial separation on the ground of Mr. Wood's adultery before and after the execution of the deed.

On the 28th of July, 1887, Mrs. Wood presented a petition for alimony pendente lite, and on the 25th of August, 1887, the Registrar of the Divorce Division made an order allotting her a sum of £9 per month.

On the 31st of August, 1887, an application was made to Kekewich, J., to rescind the order of the registrar, but this was refused.

From this refusal Mr. Wood appealed.

By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 17, "Application for restitution of conjugal rights or for judicial separation on any one of the grounds aforesaid may be made by either husband or wife by petition to the court . . . and where the application is by the wife [the court or judge] may make any order for alimony which shall be deemed just."

Middleton and Bargrave Deane, for the appellant.—The order of the registrar was wrong. No order for alimony ought to have been made under the circumstances. As the order stands, the husband may have to pay the sum of £9 a month twice over—under the deed and under the order. In ordinary cases it makes no difference to a husband whether he makes the payments under a deed or under an order of the court. But in the present case the husband alleges that the wife has broken her covenant not to molest him, and he contends that his obligation to make these payments has therefore ceased.

Barnard, for the respondent, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J. [after stating the facts and reading clauses 8, 9, and 12 of the separation deed and section 17 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, continued:—].—The question we have to consider is whether the order made by the registrar is just. In my opinion it is. In the first place it is to be observed that the court is not in any way enforcing or acting contrary to the deed. If it had been suggested, and the evidence showed, that the lady was in receipt of £9 a month, the court would have come to the conclusion that she was not entitled to further alimony; but it is quite obvious that it has been stopped, whether upon good or bad ground, upon the ground that she has broken her covenant not to molest her husband. The husband has chosen to put his own construction on the deed. Is it not just that this allowance should be made? It is said that he might be bound to pay twice over. Practically that is not so. The court has control over its own order and he is not practically in such danger. On the other hand, if the alimony is not given the wife will practically get nothing. In my opinion there is really nothing in this point. In all the cases cited—Powell v. Powell, Gandy v. Gandy, Rose v. Rose, Rowley v. Rowley, and George v. George—the alimony was being paid under the deed.

In the present case we are not deciding whether the suit can be sustained, and I purposely abstain from saying whether the institution of the suit is a breach of the covenant not to molest. In my opinion the order was quite right and must be upheld.

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LOPES, L.J.—It appears to me that unless counsel for the appellant are able to maintain that the separation deed would be a good answer to a suit for judicial separation they fail. They were compelled to admit that the separation deed would not be a good answer to the suit which the wife is now instituting. It follows, therefore, that she is taking proceedings which she has a right to take, and in respect of which there is nothing in the separation deed to prevent. If that be so, is she not entitled to all the incidents which belong to such suit? One of those incidents is that the wife is entitled to alimony pendente lite; and, except for the separation deed, it could not for a moment be contended that this was not an order of course. It is said that the order ought not to have been made because of the existence of this deed. I can quite understand that, if the payment under the deed was being made, the court would say that £9 was sufficient. But the court has to proceed upon certain words contained in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. [His lordship referred to section 17 of the Act of 1857, and continued :—] Therefore, bearing in mind that, while taking these proceedings, she was doing what she was entitled to do, the only question is whether it is just that this alimony should be ordered to be paid. The £9 a month covenanted to be paid was not, and was not intended to be, paid; therefore the wife is deprived of all means of subsistence. Under these circumstances it is impossible to say that it is just to leave the wife unprovided for. I think all the cases cited before us obviously distinct, because under those cases the alimony provided for by the deed was being paid. I think, therefore, that the order was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

In re WILLIAMS.
JONES v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Administration—Insolvent estate—Officer of savings bank—Debt due to bank—Priority of bank—Transfer of proceedings to Bankruptcy Court—Savings Bank Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 87), s. 14—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 10—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 40, 125.

The provision of section 14 of the Savings Bank Act, 1863, by which a savings bank is enabled to obtain payment of a debt due to it from an officer of the bank in preference to the other creditors of the officer, is repealed by section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, so far as regards administration in bankruptcy, but not as regards the administration of an estate in the Chancery Division; and section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, does not incorporate the provisions of section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, into the rules of administration of an estate in the Chancery Division so as to take away such right of preference of a savings bank.

Therefore, in the administration in the Chancery Division of the insolvent estate of an officer of a savings bank, the bank is entitled to payment of a debt due to it in preference to the other creditors. But the court may, under the 125*th section of the Bankruptcy Act,* 1883, on the application of a creditor, order a transfer of the proceedings to the Court of Bankruptcy.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out by David Jones and Peter Davis, two of the trustees of the Cardiff Savings Bank, on behalf of themselves and all other the trustees of the bank as plaintiffs, against Joseph Lloyd Williams, the legal personal representative of James Emerson Williams, deceased, as defendant, asking for a decree for administration of the estate of James Emerson Williams, and for a declaration that, by virtue of the 14th section of the Savings Bank Act, 1863, the plaintiffs were entitled to a first charge on the estate of J. E. Williams, to the amount of all moneys due to the bank by J. E. Williams and received by him by virtue of his employment.

James Emerson Williams was actuary to the Cardiff Savings Bank, and misappropriated moneys belonging to the bank to the amount of £30,000 received by him as officer of the bank.

He died intestate, leaving assets of the value of about £300, and having debts amounting to about £200 in addition to the sum due to the bank.

The question to be decided was whether, by virtue of section 14 of the Savings Bank Act, 1863, the bank was entitled to priority over the other creditors in respect of the sum due to it.

Upjohn, for the trustees of the savings bank.—The bank is entitled to priority in respect of the debt due to it by virtue of section 14 of the Savings Bank Act, 1863. That section is not repealed by section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The provision of the special Act is not repealed by the general Act without express words or some strong indication of intention: The London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. The Board of Works for the Limehouse District, 5 W. R. 64, 3 K. & J. 123; Fitzgerald v. Champneys, 9 W. R. 850, 2 J. & H. 31. [NORTH, J., referred to Ex parte Bailey, In re Barrell, 2 W. R. 401, 5 De G. M. & G. 380.] That was decided upon the wording of the Bankruptcy Act, 1849: Conservators of the River Thames v. Hall, L. R. 3 C. P. 415; Garnett v. Bradley, 26 W. R. 698, 3 App. Cas. 944. Section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, only deals with bankruptcy, and the present proceedings are not in bankruptcy. The 10th section of the Judicature Act, 1875, does not import into administration proceedings the provisions of section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. [NORTH, J., referred to In re Maggi, Winehouse v. Winehouse, 30 W. R. 729, 20 Ch. D. 545.]

Vernon Smith, for Joseph Lloyd Williams.—The priority of the bank under section 14 of the Savings Bank Act is taken away by section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. That section expressly excepts from its operation section 5 of Bovill's Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 86) and the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60). This raises a presumption that section 14 of the Savings Bank Act is repealed. The 10th section of the Judicature Act, 1875, imports section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, into administration proceedings. If not, the rights of the creditors of a deceased insolvent would depend upon the accidental circumstance whether his estate is being administered in the Chancery Division or in the Court of Bankruptcy under the 125th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, 31 W. R. 80, 32 Ib. 989, 9 Q. B. D. 648, 9 App. Cas. 434. The case of Ex parte Bailey, In re Barrell, is in my favour.

Upjohn replied.

NORTH, J.—This application is based on section 14 of the Savings Bank Act, 1863, which enacts:—"If any person already appointed, or who may hereafter be appointed, to any office in a savings bank, and being intrusted with the keeping of the accounts, or having in his hands or possession, by virtue of his office or employment, any moneys or effects belonging to such savings bank, or any deeds or securities relating to the same, shall die, or become bankrupt or insolvent, or have any execution or attachment or other process issued against his lands, goods, chattels, or effects, or make any assignment thereof for the benefit of his creditors, his executors, administrators, or assignees, or other persons having legal right, or the sheriff or other officer executing such process, shall, within forty days after demand made by two of the trustees of the said savings bank as aforesaid, deliver and pay over all moneys and other things belonging to such savings bank to such person as the said trustees shall appoint." That is the part of the section which relates to the property of the savings bank. Then it proceeds:—"And shall pay out of the estates, assets, or effects of such person all sums of money remaining due which such person received by virtue of his said office or employment, before any other of his debts are paid or satisfied, or before the money directed to be levied by such process as aforesaid is paid over to the party issuing such process, and all such assets, lands, goods, chattels, estates, and effects shall be bound to the payment and discharge thereof accordingly." Now that section contemplates the handing over to the savings bank of what is their property, or, what, as it may be called, becomes their property by an attachment having issued against it, and, more than that, the payment out of the assets of the officer of the amount of the debt to the savings bank; and then there is a provision that the assets shall be bound to the payment.

Now, no Act has been referred to which repeals that section, which is the law at the present day; but the question raised is whether there is not subsequent legislation which has rendered that section inapplicable to cases where the estate of the officer is being distributed in bankruptcy or is being administered by the High Court of Justice in a suit to administer the estate.

The cases which were referred to as to the effect of a subsequent statute in repealing the provisions of an earlier statute, although not exactly in pari materia, are not entirely inapplicable. It is sufficient for the present purpose to refer to the observations of Lord Hatherley in Garnett v. Bradley. He says:—"When an Act of Parliament repeals a preceding Act which relates to a certain definite subject-matter distinctly laid down for the guidance of those who are to be operated upon by the Act of Parliament in that special matter, as to a particular class of persons who are to be either protected, or, it may be, affected adversely by a particular clause of the enactment, then the Legislature is presumed to have had that very special subject-matter and that very special class of persons in contemplation when the subsequent statute was passed; and if there was a general Act subsequently passed, the generality of which was large enough, as far as words go, to comprehend the particular matter dealt with in the previous enactment, it will be considered whether or not, as regards the persons who are to be affected or protected by the Act, persons who are not in any way mentioned or specified by the subsequent general Act are to be injuriously affected by an adverse enactment, or deprived of a benefit they are entitled to under a previous enactment. And in that case the court, in construing the subsequent general Act of Parliament, would expect to find something or other pointing out that the attention of the Legislature had been turned towards the former special enactment, and, in passing the general Act, that it had made the new enactment with the view of embracing every case (including that special case) embraced within the provisions of the previous Act. Now, my lords, considering the question in that point of view, let us see, in the first place, what the special Act of James did. That Act can hardly be said to have contemplated a special class of persons; it only says that anybody bringing an action of slander who does not recover more damages than forty shillings shall not recover more costs than damages. It can hardly be said that persons disposed to bring actions for damages for slander can be held to be a class of persons who are to be struck at on the one hand, or, on the other hand, to be regarded, and who must be held as not to be within the generality of another Act which would embrace all classes of persons whatsoever. It is simply a general Act striking generally at all persons who bring this class of action, but they do not form any particular class of the community who are entitled to any special observance, care, or regard in the framing of a subsequent Act." That is to say, it does not necessarily follow that the previous Act is to remain standing, notwithstanding the general provisions of the subsequent Act, unless it is to be considered on the consideration of the Act or Acts that it is the intention of the Legislature.

Now it is clear that the provisions of an earlier Act may be revoked or they may be abrogated in particular cases by a subsequent Act, either from the express language used being addressed to that particular point or from implication or inference from the language used. In the case of the Conservators of the Thames v. Hall, Byles, J., speaking of the two Acts then before the court, puts it in this way, "There is no express repeal of that provision" (that is the provision in the earlier Act) "by the Thames Conservancy Act, 1857," (which was the later one); "but we are asked to imply a repeal of it. The court must be satisfied that the two enactments are inconsistent before they can, from the language of the later, imply a repeal of an express prior enactment." Now I have already said that I do not think that the section which I have read is repealed, and, therefore, that language is too extensive for this particular case, but the principle is the same in considering whether you can imply a repeal of a prior enactment, or whether you can imply that the earlier enactment is not to be applicable to the particular case dealt with by the subsequent Act. Then Keating, J., says:—"It is said that the 388th section of that Act is impliedly repealed by the 96th section of the Thames Conservancy Act, 1857. I entirely agree with my brother Byles that before we come to that conclusion we are bound to satisfy ourselves that it is a necessary implication," and Montague Smith, J., says:—"Upon the whole it seems to me that a pilot does not come within the words of the 96th section of the Thames Conservancy Act, and that that section does not, by implication, repeal the 388th section of the Merchant's Shipping Act, 1854," which is the earlier Act.

Now, in the present case, what is the operation of the Bankruptcy Act on the 14th section of the Savings Bank Act? The intent of the Bankruptcy Act is to deal with the estates of bankrupts only, but the object is to provide a fair division of the assets of the bankrupt between the creditors. Section 37 of the Act describes the debts provable in bankruptcy. Then section 40 deals with the property of the bankrupt, and provides:—"In the distribution of the property of a bankrupt, these shall be paid in priority to all other debts," and certain debts are mentioned in sub-section 1, including rates, taxes, wages of clerks or servants, and of workmen for a limited period, and then it provides by sub-section 2, "the foregoing debts shall rank equally between themselves, and shall be paid in full, unless the property of the bankrupt is insufficient to meet them, in which case they shall abate in equal proportions between themselves." Then sub-section 3 prescribes the mode of application of joint and separate estates respectively, and then sub-section 4 enacts:—"Subject to the provisions of this Act, all debts proved in the bankruptcy shall be paid pari passu." It seems to me that this is the repeal of the former Bankruptcy Acts, the consolidation of those Acts so far as they are consolidated, and the enactment of a new code by which the administration in bankruptcy is to be regulated from that time forward, and which provides that all debts proved in the bankruptcy are to be paid pari passu. Then sub-section 5 provides that if there is any surplus after paying the debts, interest may be paid, and then sub-section 6 enacts:—"Nothing in this section shall alter the effect of section 5 of the Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 86) 'to amend the Law of Partnership,' or shall prejudice the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875."

The Act referred to as having been passed to amend the law of partnership is known as Bovill's Act, and this is a case in which a preference is not being given to a particular person, but that particular person is being postponed. That Act provides that a loan to a trader, upon a contract in writing that the lender shall share in the profits, is not in itself sufficient to render the lender a partner, but the 5th section provides that, in the case of the bankruptcy of the trader, a person who has lent money on those terms is not to be entitled to be paid in the bankruptcy until all the creditors have been paid. Therefore, it is in that case a postponement of the particular creditor. Then the other exception referred to is the provision of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, and that is a provision which corresponds almost verbatim and substantially with the first portion of the clause I have read from the Savings Bank Act, and which enables friendly societies to recover the money belonging to them in the hands of an officer or his representative, or money on which they have got a charge by having an execution issued against it, but which does not contain any provision like that contained in the second portion of the clause of the Savings Bank Act, that not only shall any money in the hands of the officer belonging to the society be paid over, but that the society shall have a preferential charge over all his assets for the amount due. Why this preference is given to the Friendly Societies Act I do not know, but I find it here; and, finding it here, effect must be given to it. But it seems to me that, subject to the two exceptions mentioned in the 6th sub-section of section 40 of the Bankruptcy Act, the general scheme for the administration of an estate in bankruptcy laid down in that section is the law, and excludes the right of any other person not included in the two exceptions to be paid in preference to the other creditors.

Then the case of Ex parte Bailey, In re Barrell, seems to me very much in point. There the trustees of a building society sought to recover from the bankrupt moneys received by him as treasurer of the society. The Friendly Societies Amendment Act (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 40), s. 12, contained a provision very similar to section 14 of the Savings Bank Act, and relates to friendly societies, and not building societies. Then the Building Societies Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32), s. 4, incorporated the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act in terms which should make the 12th section of the Friendly Societies Act apply to the case of building societies. Then came the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), which was the Act in operation at the time this case was decided. The 1st section of that Act provided that "from and after the commencement of this Act the several Acts and parts of Acts set forth in the schedule (A.) to this Act annexed, to the extent to which such Acts and parts of Acts are by such schedule expressed to be repealed, and every other Act or Acts, and such parts of every other Act or Acts, as shall be inconsistent with this Act shall be repealed except so far as" they repeal former Acts.

Then the 167th section of the same Act introduced a new provision relating to officers of friendly societies, and giving a certain preference with respect to friendly societies; and then the 187th section provided for the general distribution of the bankrupt's estate between the creditors in proportion to their debts. The case being one relating to building societies, the benefit of the 167th section of the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, which only applies to friendly societies, did not apply to building societies; and the clause which applied to building societies, if any, was section 12 of the previous Friendly Societies Act; and the question was whether that applied to this case. Lord Justice Knight Bruce held that it did not, and Lord Justice Turner says this: "I am of opinion, however, that the petitioners are not entitled under any of these enactments to the relief which they ask. The 167th section of the Consolidation Act is in terms confined to societies established under the Acts relating to friendly societies, and this society is established, not under any of those Acts, but under the Benefit Building Societies Act. The Legislature, when it passed the Consolidation Act, must be presumed to have had, and no doubt had, under its view the provisions both of the Acts relating to friendly societies and of those relating to benefit building societies. It has thought proper to limit the particular relief granted by this section to societies of the former description, and the courts have no power to extend that relief to other societies. If, therefore, the petitioners have any claim to this relief their right must be founded upon the combined operation of the other Acts; but the Consolidation Act has, by the first section, repealed not only the particular Acts which are specified, but all other Acts and parts of Acts which are inconsistent with that Act; and it has by its other provisions appropriated the whole of the estate of the bankrupt to the payment of certain descriptions of creditors, who, according to that Act, are entitled to be paid in full, and, subject thereto, to the payment of other creditors in proportion to their respective debts; and it would clearly be inconsistent with those provisions that payment in full should be made to any creditor whose debt is not by the Act directed to be so paid. I am of opinion, therefore, that the fourth section of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32" (that is, the Building Societies Act) "is repealed by the Consolidation Act; and consequently this petition must be dismissed."

These observations seem to me to apply exactly to the present case. In the Bankruptcy Act the court has thought fit to introduce an express reservation of rights arising out of the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875. The provisions of that Act and the provisions of the 14th section of the Savings Bank Act are in pari materia; and I cannot at all understand why the one should be specially reserved and the other not mentioned. It seems to me there are only two reasons which can account for it. Either it was deliberately left out because it was not intended to be kept in operation in case of bankruptcy, or the Savings Bank Act was overlooked when the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 was passed. But I cannot deal with it on any such footing as that the Act was forgotten. If it would have been put in if thought of, but has been left out because it was forgotten, the persons who claim under it cannot get any benefit under it. I cannot proceed on any such theory as that it has been passed over per incuriam, or that the whole matter was not before the Legislature when they passed the 40th section of the Act of 1883, and only excepted out of the operation of that section the Friendly Societies Act. It seems to me, therefore, that if this were a case of administration of an estate in bankruptcy the preference created in favour of savings banks by the 14th section of the Savings Banks Act would not apply in cases of bankruptcy; and to that extent the section is avoided, so far as bankruptcy is concerned, by the express provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which are entirely inconsistent with that section. But then it is said that this is not a case of bankruptcy, but of administration of the estate of a deceased debtor in the Chancery Division, and therefore the 40th section of the Bankruptcy Act does not apply, unless it is made to apply by the 10th section of the Judicature Act, 1875, which provides that, "In the administration by the court of the assets of any deceased person who may die after the commencement of this Act, and whose estate may prove to be insufficient for the payment in full of his debts and liabilities, . . . the same rules shall prevail and be observed as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors, and as to debts and liabilities provable, and as to the valuation of annuities and future and contingent liabilities respectively, as may be in force for the time being with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt. Now the law of bankruptcy at the time being in force is, of course, the Act of 1883. But it does not say that in such cases all the provisions of the law of bankruptcy shall apply, but only that the same rules shall prevail and be observed as to particular things.

Now the question is whether the priority of the creditors inter se is one of those things which is reserved. In my opinion that point is settled by the decision of Fry, L.J., in the case of Winehouse v. Winehouse, 30 W. R. 729, 20 Ch. D. 545, where it seems to have been fully argued before him. The various cases relating to the construction of that section were cited, and he says: "The question is whether, by force of section 10, the provision of section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, that, with the exceptions mentioned in it, all debts shall be paid pari passu is imported into the administration of insolvent estates of deceased persons." That is the very point which I have to deal with. He refers to the cases and he comes to the conclusion that that is not one of the matters in which the administration in chancery is assimilated to that in the Court of Bankruptcy, and, therefore, in the administration of the estate here, the rule in the Court of Bankruptcy does not apply.

The result will be this, the plaintiffs are creditors of their actuary and cashier's estate for upwards of £30,000. The other debts amount to something like £200, and the assets, I think, were somewhere about £200 or £300—something, at all events, very small. The result will be that, in any case, the claim of the creditors must exhaust the assets, but it seems to me that, in the present case, the right of priority of the savings bank is not to be excluded.

There is one argument which I ought to notice, and that is that in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, new provisions altogether are contained in the 125th section. That enables the Court of Bankruptcy to deal with the estate of a person who has not become bankrupt, but who, without having been adjudicated bankrupt, dies insolvent, and it is provided by sub-section 1 "That any creditor of a deceased debtor whose debt would have been sufficient to support a bankruptcy petition against such debtor had he been alive, may present to the court a petition in the prescribed form, praying for an order for the administration of the estate of the deceased debtor according to the law of bankruptcy." Then the 2nd sub-section provides that, on proof of the debt the court may, unless it is satisfied that there is a reasonable probability that there will be sufficient to pay all the debts in full, which is clearly not the case here, make an order for the administration in bankruptcy of the deceased debtor's estate, or may, upon cause shown, dismiss such petition with or without costs. Then the 5th sub-section provides that "upon an order being made for the administration of the deceased debtor's estate, the property of the debtor shall vest in the official receiver of the court as trustee thereof, and he shall forthwith proceed to realize and distribute the same in accordance with the provisions of this Act"—that is to say, the estate of the deceased debtor is to be administered in the same way as if he had become bankrupt, and the argument was that unless the Bankruptcy Act is imported into the administration of the estates of insolvents in the Chancery Division this result would follow, that the interests of the creditors are to depend entirely upon the question whether proceedings are commenced in bankruptcy or in the Chancery Division; because if commenced in bankruptcy there is no priority in favour of the savings bank, but if commenced in the Chancery Division such priority will exist.

It seems to me that there is such inconsistency, but that the way of getting over it is this—the 4th sub-section of the 125th section of the Act provides:—"A petition for administration under this section shall not be presented to the court after the proceedings have been commenced in any court of justice for the administration of the deceased debtor's estate, but such court may" (that is, the court where the administration is commenced), "in such case on the application of any creditor, and on proof that the estate is insufficient to pay its debts, transfer the proceedings to the court exercising jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and thereupon such last mentioned court may, in the prescribed manner, make an order for the administration of the estate of the deceased debtor, and the like consequences shall ensue as under an administration order made on the petition of a creditor." Therefore, in the case of a deceased debtor whose estate is insolvent, any creditor may apply to the court which is asked to administer the estate not in bankruptcy, to direct a transfer to bankruptcy where the assets will be divided equally between them. It seems to me, therefore, that although there is an inconsistency in the provisions of the two Acts as to the mode in which the assets are to be divided, the way out of that difficulty is provided by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, by which the administration of the assets, according to the law of bankruptcy, is secured to the creditors who desire it.

Under those circumstances I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to the decree they ask. I have expressed my opinion on this point because, in case any appplication is made to the court for such a transfer, the mode in which the estate would be dealt with would be according to the view I have indicated, but there are other creditors interested in the matter, and it is not the practice, on the hearing of a summons for administration at the instance of creditors, to decide behind the backs of those creditors that the plaintiff has a right in priority to them. Therefore I cannot insert the declaration which I am asked to do in the decree, because it seems to me that such a declaration at the present time would prejudicially affect the rights of absent parties, and, therefore, ought not to be inserted in that form.

Williamson v. Farwell. (a.)

Power of appointment—Delegation of power—Validity of appointment in default of exercise of delegated power.

The donee of a power of appointment among his own children appointed to his son for life, with remainder to his son's children as he should appoint, and, in default of such appointment, to the son absolutely. The son died without having exercised the power of appointment delegated to him.

Held, that the ultimate limitation to the son was valid and took effect.

(a.) Reported by G. E. Jeffery, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

By a post-nuptial settlement, dated the 25th of May, 1816, certain real and personal estate was vested in a trustee upon trust to pay the rents and annual produce thereof to Richard Lane and his assigns for his life, and after his decease upon trust for all and every or such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the child or children of Richard Lane by Sarah Louisa, his wife, then born or to be born in his lifetime or in due time after his death, or of the issue of any of the same child or children who should depart this life in the lifetime of Richard Lane leaving issue then living at such age or respective ages, and, if more than one, in such shares and proportions as Richard Lane by deed or will should direct and appoint; and, for want of such direction or appointment, in trust for all and every the children and child of Richard Lane by Sarah Louisa, his wife, who, being sons, should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain twenty-one or marry under that age.

Richard Lane, by his will dated the 22nd of August, 1828, after stating that he was desirous of exercising the power of appointment contained in the settlement, directed and appointed that the trustees thereof should stand possessed of the rents, issues, and profits of the premises in the settlement mentioned upon trust to pay the same unto, between, and amongst his four daughters —Ellen, Louisa, Catherine, and Fanny—in equal shares as tenants in common for their respective lives, and, after the decease of any or either of his four daughters leaving lawful issue, upon trust for such issue in such shares and proportions as such daughter or daughters so dying and leaving issue as aforesaid shall by deed or will appoint; and, for want of such appointment, in trust for such issue respectively, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for ever. But, in case of the death of any or either of his said daughters without issue, or such issue should not live to attain twenty-one, then that the share or shares of her or them so dying as aforesaid should go and be paid to the survivor or survivors of his said daughters for the term of their respective lives in equal shares as tenants in common, and, if only one such daughter, then to such daughter for her life; and, after the death of the survivor of his said four daughters or such of them as should die without issue as aforesaid, upon trust to pay as well the accruing as the original shares of such daughters to his son R. K. Lane for his life, and after his decease in trust for the child and children of R. K. Lane as he should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of such appointment, to the use of R. K. Lane, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns.

Richard Lane died in 1838, having had by his wife Sarah Louisa six children—viz., the five children named in the will and a son Charles, who died in 1823 intestate and without having been married. All the children were living at the date of the settlement, and they all attained twenty-one years. The daughters, Louisa, Catherine, and Fanny respectively married; the daughter Ellen did not. Louisa and Fanny both died without issue, the latter in September, 1885. Catherine married a Mr. Williamson, and died in December, 1862, leaving issue.

In June, 1855, R. K. Lane was adjudicated a bankrupt, and obtained his certificate in June, 1857. He died on the 26th of March, 1862, having by his will given all his property to his son. He did not attempt to exercise the power of appointment given him by the will of his father Robert Lane.

In May, 1846, a suit was commenced by Mrs. Williamson against the trustees of the settlement for an account of the trust estate received by the trustees and for other relief.

This petition was presented in the suit by some of the children of Mrs. Williamson to obtain the decision of the court as to the persons entitled to the trust estate.

Giffard, Q.C., and Follett, for the petitioners.—The limitation of Catherine's share to her issue is invalid, because they are not objects of the power, and therefore the subsequent limitation over is invalid, although the gift over is in favour of an object of the power. If the donee of a power appoints to persons who are not objects of the power, and, subject to such appointment, appoints to persons who are objects of the power, the limitations in favour of the persons who are objects of the power will fail, because it was only intended to take effect after the prior invalid limitation should be exhausted: Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., pp. 508—511; Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Ves. sen. 640; Robinson v. Hardcastle, 2 T. R. 241; Reid v. Reid, 25 Beav. 469, 7 W. R. Ch. Dig. 104; Brudenell v. Elwes, 1 East, 442. In Ingram v. Ingram, 2 Atk. 88, the delegated power was to appoint to persons who were objects of the original power. That makes all the difference, and this was clearly the opinion of Lord St. Leonards: Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 515. Webb v. Sadler, 21 W. R. 394, L. R. 8 Ch. 419, may be cited against us, but there the delegated power was given only in name, not in substance and in fact.

Humber, for persons in the same interest.

Cookson, Q.C., and Kingdon, for the assignee in bankruptcy of R. K. Lane.—The ultimate limitation to R. K. Lane absolutely is good, and can take effect as to the shares of the daughters who have died without leaving issue. The words "without issue" in the gift over in the will mean "without leaving issue": Thickness v. Liege, 3 Bro. P. C. 365. Ingram v. Ingram applies. The principle of the decisions, that an appointment in remainder, after an appointment to strangers to the power is void, is that it is the intention of the donee that the ultimate limitation shall not take effect until after the prior limitation has been exhausted by failure of the persons in whose favour it has been created. The delegated power being swept away, there is no reason why the ultimate limitation to an object of the power should not take effect: Crozier v. Crozier, 3 D. & War. 353; Crompe v. Barrow, 4 Ves. 681; Webb v. Sadler; Carr v. Atkinson, 20 W. R. 620, L. R. 14 Eq. 397; In re Warren's Trusts, 32 W. R. 641, 26 Ch. D. 208.

Giffard replied.

NORTH, J. (after stating the provisions of the settlement of 1816, and the appointment made by the will of Richard Lane in favour of his daughters and their issue), continued:—The appointment in favour of the daughters is good, but the appointment in favour of their issue is not. Then there are limitations over of the income in case of the death of any of the daughters without issue, or in case such issue should not live to attain twenty-one. The word "issue" there clearly refers to issue to whom a gift has already been made, issue living at the deaths of the daughters respectively. Then the testator goes on to direct that after the death of the survivor of the daughters, or such of them as should die without issue as aforesaid (that, again, must mean without issue who take under the previous limitations, an event which happened in the case of three of the daughters), the property is to be held on trust to pay the income to his son R. K. Lane for his life. That limitation is perfectly good under the power. But the testator goes on to direct that after the death of the son the property is to be in trust for his children as he shall by deed or will appoint, and, in default of such appointment, to the use of the son absolutely. That attempt to delegate to the son a power to appoint to his children was in excess of the power given to the testator by the settlement, and therefore it is bad. But the appointment to the son himself is perfectly good, unless it is made bad by reason of the introduction of the delegated power to the son. In my opinion the ultimate limitation to the son is good, and I think this is perfectly clear upon the authorities.

I will first refer to Crompe v. Barrow, in which there was an invalid appointment, not a delegation of the power. In that case, by a settlement made upon the second marriage of a widow, a power was given to her to appoint the settled property by will among her children by her former husband and her children by her then intended husband. At the time of her second marriage she had six children living by her first husband, but only two of them—Charles Barrow and Frances James, the wife of Robert James—were living when she made her will in February, 1796. She had no children by her second marriage, and she died in June, 1798. By her will she directed that a moiety of the settled property should be held in trust for her daughter Frances James, and that the other moiety should be held in trust to permit the income to be received by her son Charles for his life, and, after his death, upon trust for such wife and children or child of the said Charles Barrow as he might leave behind him, in such shares as he should by deed or will appoint; and, for want of such appointment, in trust to assign, transfer, and pay the same unto such wife and children equally, if more than one; and, if but one of them should be then living, then to assign the whole to such only one; but, in case the said Charles Barrow should die without leaving a wife or child him surviving, then, after his decease, in trust to assign the same unto the daughter absolutely. The wife and children of the son were clearly outside the power, and the Master of the Rolls decided that, "as to so much of the property as is not distributed among the objects of the power, it is to be considered as unappointed." The question was then raised whether the ultimate limitation to the daughter depended upon the preceding estates given to the wife and children of Charles, and must fall with them; and it was said that the will must receive its general construction from the death of the testatrix. The Master of the Rolls said: "I do construe the will at the death of testatrix, and I think the ultimate appointment is good. If there is no wife or child of Charles Barrow, the manner in which she has affected to execute the power never takes effect at all. I have determined in Routledge v. Dorril, 2 Ves. jun. 357, according to Robinson v. Hardcastle, that, if you give for life to a child who is an object of the power, and then to the children of that child, and, in failure of issue, to a person who is an object of the power, that is void. But the distinction of this case from that is, that this limitation over to Frances James is if Charles Barrow should die without leaving a wife or child surviving. It fails as far as it affects to give interests to the children; but is there any occasion to make it fail upon the other point, the gift over to a person who is an object of the power? Why am I to exclude the person taking over, who has a right to take? There are two alternatives. If Charles Barrow leaves no wife or children at his death, then the limitation over, being to a good object, shall take effect: if he does leave a wife or children, then it cannot take effect." There are several other cases to the same effect, but I only wish to refer to one of them, Long v. Ovenden, 29 W. R. 709, 16 Ch. D. 691. In that case, by a settlement made upon the second marriage of a widow, a fund was vested in a trustee upon trust, after the deaths of herself and her second husband, for her three children (by name) by her first marriage and the children of the intended marriage, in such shares as she should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of such appointment, in trust for the said three children, and also the children of the intended marriage, in equal shares. There was no issue of the second marriage. The wife survived her second husband and died in 1878. By her will, made in 1876, she appointed that the trustee of the settlement should stand possessed of one third part of the trust funds upon trust to pay the income to her son Charles Long during his life, and after his death upon trust to pay the said one third part to Arthur Long, the son of her son Charles, as and when he should attain twenty-one, and, in case he should die before he should attain twenty-one, upon trust to pay the said third part to her daughter, the defendant, Sarah Ovenden. Jessel, M.R., said:—"Of course the appointment to the grandson is void, he not being an object of the power; but the appointment, if he dies under twenty-one, in favour of an object of the power will take effect as being within the limits of the rule as to remoteness." That is, it was an executory gift, not a gift in remainder, and, as it was to take effect within the proper period of time, it was valid.

But it is said that in the present case there is a distinction, because it is not a limitation to persons not objects of the power, but a delegated power to appoint to such persons, which is bad, and it is said that certain observations of Lord St. Leonards in his book on Powers, are in favour of the petitioners. The important passage is in plac. 36, p. 515, of the 8th ed., and I confess that I have felt a good deal of difficulty in understanding precisely what that passage means, but I think I do understand it at last.

In plac. 34, the learned author (referring to limitations as distinguished from powers) says: "where no question of perpetuity arises, and the power authorizes a gift in remainder, a devise under a power to a stranger for life, with remainder to an object of the power, is void only as to the life estate, and valid as to the remainder, and the estate during the life of the stranger will go as in default of appointment."

Then, in plac. 35, he says: "So where actual estates are not attempted to be given, but a mere power is limited to a stranger to appoint the fund, and in default of appointment the fund is given amongst proper objects, the power being merely void on the ground that delegatus non potest delegare, the ultimate limitation will take effect in possession. This was decided by Lord Hardwicke in Ingram v. Ingram, where, however, the delegated power was to appoint the fund amongst the objects of the original power, and in default of appointment the fund was given to the same objects." He then proceeds to point out that to the general rule previously stated there may be exceptions, and that, although that rule may apply to such a case as Ingram v. Ingram, there are other cases to which it does not apply. He says in plac. 36: "It should seem that the rule would not prevail (that rule being, as I understand it, that the ultimate limitation would take effect in possession where the donee of the original power had attempted to create a power of appointment which was void merely on the ground that the power could not be delegated) "where a power is affected to be given to appoint the fund amongst strangers." That is the proposition. What is the reason for it? "Because in that case it would be the intention of the donee of the original power that the object should not take unless in default of execution of the delegated power in favour of the strangers. The intention of the donee of the power is the express ground upon which limitations over to good objects, after limitations to strangers, are held to be void; and the principle applies as forcibly to a power to appoint to strangers as to a direct gift to them."

Now one of the passages in which Lord St. Leonards points out the reason why the intention of the donee of the power is the ruling principle in the case of limitations will be found in plac. 22 of the same chapter:—"Although a limitation be void, as not authorised by the power, yet it is not considered absolutely void, so as to accelerate the remainders dependent on it, which, if given immediately, would have been good; but, notwithstanding that it be void itself, yet it prevents the limitations over from taking effect; for, as Lord Alvanley observed, it would be monstrous to contend that though it was appointed to the remainderman in failure of the existence of persons incapable of taking, yet notwithstanding they exist he should take it as if it was well appointed to them and they had failed. It is given upon a contingency upon which there is no right to give it." He points out, then, that the intention of the person who is exercising the power is to be attended to; and in plac. 36 he points out that the reason why the ultimate limitation does not take effect in possession where a power is affected to be given to appoint the fund amongst strangers is because that would be contrary to the intention of the donee of the original power. He says, to read the passage again, "because in that case it would be the intention of the donee of the original power that the object should not take unless in default of execution of the delegated power in favour of the strangers." The reason why the ultimate limitation is not good is because the intention of the donee could not take effect if it were. But his intention can take effect in case of default of exercise of the delegated power, and Lord St. Leonards is only dealing with a case in which the donee's intention cannot take effect; that is, where there has not been default in the exercise of the delegated power. When the donee of a power delegates it his intention is that the persons who are to take in default of an exercise of the power shall only take subject to the preference previously given to other persons, and that they shall take only if there are no preferred persons who can take, and that state of things cannot arise when the delegated power has been actually exercised in favour of persons who are only unable to take because not within the power. I think the subsequent part of plac. 36, which is not very easy to understand, really comes to the same thing: "Nor would the rule, for the same reason, apply to a case where the delegated power is to appoint to some of the objects, and the fund in default of appointment is given to others, although objects of the original power." To make that clear let me take the objects to be A., B., C., and D., and read the sentence again, putting it with reference to them: "Nor would the rule, for the same reason, apply to a case where the delegated power is to appoint to A. and B., and the fund in default of appointment is given to C. and D., although C. and D. were objects of the original power." Why? "For the same reason"—viz., that the intention of the donee would be defeated, because he intended that A. and B. should be preferred to C. and D., and it would be going entirely contrary to his intention to give the fund, in default of exercise of the power, to C. and D. while A. and B. are in existence, whom he intended to prefer. Lord St. Leonards goes on to say: "But in this last case it might be otherwise if, in default of appointment under the delegated power" (to A. and B.), "the fund was given amongst all the objects," A., B., C., and D. And for this reason, that, though it would be clear in that case that there was an intention, if possible, to prefer A. and B., it would not at all follow that the donee's secondary intention in favour of A., B., C., and D. should be disappointed, if they all could take and A. and B. alone could not. There would be the remaining intention in favour of all the objects, and it would not be preferring persons who were intended to be postponed in favour of those who were designated, but it would be merely saying that, if the preferred objects could not take, all the persons who were to take, in default of an exercise of the delegated power, should take. This, to my mind, explains the whole passage, and shows that the learned author is dealing with a case where the delegated power of appointment, although invalid, has been exercised, and cannot, therefore, be ignored, and in such a case the gift in default of appointment cannot take effect, because it was intended by the donee that the persons to take in default should take only if the persons whom he intended to prefer did not exist, and therefore could not take.

I have thought it right to make these remarks on the observations of Lord St. Leonards in that passage, but the matter seems to me to be really settled by the authority of two cases decided since the last edition of his book was published. The first of these cases is Carr v. Atkinson. In that case George Smith, by his will, devised land to trustees, in trust for his niece, Hannah Carr, during her life, and after her death in trust for her children or remoter issue as she should appoint, and, in default of such appointment, in trust for her children equally. Hannah Carr, by her will, in exercise of the power, appointed that the trustees of George Smith's will should stand seised of the land upon trust to convey the same to trustees therein named, upon trust as to one-fifth part thereof for her daughter, Mary Hartley Atkinson, during her life, for her separate use, and after her death upon such trusts for the benefit of any surviving husband of Mary Hartley Atkinson, for the term of his life, or for any shorter period, as she should by will appoint, and, subject thereto, in trust for such child or children of Mary Hartley Atkinson as had attained or should thereafter attain twenty-one, or die under that age leaving issue, and, if more than one, in equal shares. Mary Hartley Atkinson was alive at the date of the will of George Smith, as appears from the date of her marriage, which is stated in the report. The question was raised whether the appointment of the one-fifth in favour of Mary Hartley Atkinson, her husband and children, was not wholly void except as to the life estate appointed to her. Lord Romilly, M.R., said:—"The share is given in trust for Mary Hartley Atkinson, for her life, which is a good appointment, as she is an object of the power, and for such of her children as should attain twenty-one, who are also objects of the power; but then there is interposed, not a gift to a person who is not an object of the power, but a power for Mary Hartley Atkinson to appoint by will in favour of a person who is not an object of the power. It is important to look at the exact words, 'In trust for Mary Hartley Atkinson during her life, and after her decease upon such trusts for the benefit of any surviving husband of the said Mary Hartley Atkinson, for the term of his life, or for any shorter period, as she should, notwithstanding coverture, by her will appoint, and, subject thereto, in trust for' her child or children as in the will mentioned. This is an attempt to create a new power, which cannot be created, in a person who was merely an object of the power. This is a case arising in respect of real property. Supposing it had been given upon such trusts and in favour of such charities as Mary Hartley Atkinson should by will appoint, and, subject thereto, to her children, could it be said that the gifts to the children were destroyed because of the insertion of a power which the court would not allow to be exercised? The result is that the power to appoint in favour of the husband fails, being a delegated power which could not be given by the person who was entitled to exercise the first power, and the will is to be read as if the words which relate to it formed no part of the will, and the construction of the rest of the will is not affected by it."

The other case is Webb v. Sadler. In that case a husband and wife having, under their marriage settlement, a joint power of appointment over personalty in favour of the children of the marriage, of whom there were three survivors, appointed one-third of the fund to trustees upon such trusts as Henry Robert Sadler (one of the sons) by deed, executed with the consent of the father during his life, and after his death with the consent of the acting trustees or trustee of his will, or by will should appoint, and in default of such appointment upon trust for Henry Robert Sadler for life or until bankruptcy or assignment (such bankruptcy or assignment being limited to twenty-one years after the death of his surviving parent); and after the death of Henry Robert Sadler upon trust for his executors or administrators, as part of his personal estate, but if his interest should have previously determined, then upon other trusts. The Court of Appeal held that the appointment to such uses as Henry Robert Sadler should appoint with the consent of the trustees was void, but that the limitation over in default of appointment by him was valid. Lord Selborne, C., said:—"Here it appears to us quite clear that no power of appointment whatever is given to Henry Robert Sadler by the first clause of the deed poll and the corresponding clause in the other instrument, excepting the power to be exercised, with the consent in writing, after the death of the parents, of the acting trustees or trustee, who were persons to whom no such authority could be delegated, independently of any question of remoteness. If, therefore, that is an inseparable condition of the exercise of the power, the power altogether fails. We all think it is an inseparable condition of the exercise of the power. There is no analogy between the effect of such a clause and the cases where there is a separate and superadded condition after the gift of an estate. Here there is no power except with consent. Then the next question is, whether the subsequent appointments, 'in default of and subject to any such limitation or appointment,' containing dispositions in favour of the son, are so connected with the void power that, the void power failing, they fail also. It seems to me that such a construction would be expressly contrary to the declared intention. The declared intention is, that unless estates that would displace this gift to the son are created in favour of other persons by means of the power, then the son is to take under this part of the instrument, and, if the power is void, then no such estate could be created, and the event never could arise which alone was meant to prevent the gift in favour of the son taking effect."

Applying those observations to the present case, the declared intention of the testator is that, unless his son, R. K. Lane, exercises the power of appointment given to him in favour of his children, the trust in default of appointment is to take effect, and, inasmuch as the son could not validly exercise the power, no such limitation in favour of his children could be created, and, therefore, the ultimate trust in favour of the son takes effect. It is said that in the cases to which I have referred the objects contemplated by the delegated power were within the original power; whereas in Carr v. Harrison the husband of the daughter was not an object of the original power. But it seems to me that the result must be the same, whether the invalidity of the power depends upon the person by whom, or the objects in whose favour, it is to be exercised.

Locke v. Dunlop. (a.)

Will—Construction—"Other sons or son"—Eldest son not included—Procreatis and procreandis.

Real estate was limited by will to the use of a testator's second son for life; remainder to the use of his sons successively in tail male; remainder in similar terms to the use of the testator's third son for life and his sons in tail male; remainder to the use of the testator's fourth, fifth, and all and every other his son and sons. The testator left three sons, of whom the second and third had died without issue.

Held, upon the construction of the will, that the eldest son was not entitled to take under the words "other son."

The rule that procreatis and procreandis are to be construed in the same way will yield to the expression of a contrary intention on the part of the testator.

Wadham Locke, by his will, dated the 8th of October, 1829, devised his mansion house, called Rowdeford, with the appurtenances and other the lands and hereditaments therein mentioned, to two trustees and their heirs to the use of his wife during her widowhood, and after her decease or second marriage to the use of his second son, Francis Alexander Sydenham Locke, and his assigns for his life without impeachment of waste, with remainder to the use of the trustees to preserve contingent remainders, and after the death of his said son Francis to the use of the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and all and every other the son and sons of the body of his said son in tail male, with remainder to similar uses in favour of the testator's third son, John Locke, for his life and after his death to his first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder in the words following:—"To the use of my fourth, fifth, and all and every other the son and sons of my body on the body of my said wife to be begotten, born, or en ventre sa mère at the time of my decease severally, successively, and in remainder one after another as they and every of them shall be in seniority of age and priority of birth and of the several and respective heirs male of the body and bodies of all and every such son and sons lawfully issuing, the elder of such son and sons and the heirs male of his body to be always preferred and to take before the younger of such son and sons and the heirs male of his and their body and bodies issuing." Then followed a remainder to the use of the testator's daughter and daughters "begotten or to be begotten born or en ventre sa mère" at the time of his decease equally as tenants in common in tail, and if any of them should die without issue, then, as to her share or shares, to the use of the survivors or survivor in equal shares as tenants in common in tail, and there was an ultimate remainder to the use of the testator's right heirs. And the will contained a specific devise of certain freehold and leasehold hereditaments to the testator's said son Francis absolutely. And the testator devised all other his lands and hereditaments not thereinbefore devised to his trustees and their heirs to the use of certain other trustees therein named for a term of 500 years, and subject thereto to the like uses in favour of his son Francis for life, and after his death his first and other sons successively in tail male, and in default of such issue upon the same uses as were thereinbefore declared concerning the mansion house of Rowdeford and the lands devised therewith. And the trusts of the term of 500 years were to raise such sums as, with the residue of the testator's personal estate, would be sufficient to pay each of his children, whether born or en ventre sa mère at his decease other than and except his eldest son, Wadham Locke, and his other sons, Francis and John, whom the testator stated to be all otherwise provided for, the sum of £6,000 apiece, to be paid to such of them as should be sons (should he have any other son thereafter born, he having at present only the three sons above excepted) at twenty-three and to such of them as should be daughters at twenty-one.

And after divers provisions, including a specific bequest to his said son John, the testator bequeathed his residuary personal estate to his trustees upon trust for conversion and payment of debts and legacies, and then upon the same trusts as the moneys thereinbefore directed to be raised under the term of 500 years.

The testator died on the 21st of October, 1835, and his will was proved on the 4th of December, 1835, by the executors therein named. The testator's wife, Anna Maria Selina Locke, survived him.

There were eight children of the testator by his said wife, three sons—namely, Wadham Locke, the eldest (the plaintiff in this action), the said Francis Alexander Sydenham Locke, and John Locke, and five daughters, all of whom were living at the date of the will, and all of whom survived the testator.

The testator's widow died on the 6th of July, 1838.

Francis Alexander Sydenham Locke died on the 7th of January, 1885, without issue male, and John Locke died on the 13th of February, 1886, also without issue male.

Two of the daughters had died, one of them leaving issue, who were surviving. The other three daughters of the testator were still living.

The writ in this action was issued on the 23rd of March, 1886, and the plaintiff, by his statement of claim, claimed a declaration that he was entitled for an estate in tail male in possession to the said mansion house at Rowdeford and other the hereditaments directed by the will to be held therewith. The defendants were the persons claiming under the testator's daughters.

Pearson, Q.C., and Waggett, for the plaintiff, contended that the plaintiff was entitled to take under the limitation to other sons, and that the words "to be begotten" did not import futurity, the rule being that procreatis and procreandis were to be construed in the same way.

They cited Langston v. Langston, 2 Cl. & Fin. 194; Galley v. Barrington, 2 Bing. 387; Doe v. Taylor, 10 Q. B. 718; Doe v. Hallett, 1 M. & S. 124; Almack v. Horn, 11 W. R. 765; Anon., 3 Leon. 87.

Hastings, Q.C., and Vernon R. Smith, for the defendants, argued that the only question was as to the construction of the will.

They referred to Clements v. Paske, cited 1 M. & S., at p. 130.

Pearson, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J.—The question in this case is whether the plaintiff, who was the eldest son of Wadham Locke, is entitled under the limitations contained in his father's will to certain real estate thereby devised, or whether, in the events which have happened, the defendants are so entitled. [His lordship then stated the will and the facts above set forth, and proceeded:—] I confess that if, without regard to the authorities, I had simply to construe this will as a document in the English language, I should say that its meaning was tolerably plain. The testator takes notice of the state of his family. In speaking of the children for whom he provides by the 500 years' term, he states expressly that he had then only three sons, who were otherwise provided for, and he contemplated the possibility of future sons. The language in which he there speaks of his sons is unmistakably language importing futurity. Then, when we turn to the limitations in question, we find that the words "to be begotten," when used in the limitations to the sons of Francis and John, are not used inconsistently, at least, with their importing futurity, for Francis and John were then unmarried. We find also that in the case of daughters the testator limits the estate "to the use of all and every my daughter and daughters on the body of my said wife begotten or to be begotten." But in the case of the fourth, fifth, and other sons we find the words "to be begotten" only. It seems to me, therefore, that upon the will itself, without regard to the authorities, one must come to the conclusion that the words "to be begotten" in the limitation to the fourth and fifth and all and every other sons of the body import futurity, and that the testator meant, under that limitation, to limit to future sons only, and not to include the eldest son at all.

It is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the words "to be begotten" have a strict legal signification, and that, as it is put in the old books, the words procreatis and procreandis mean the same thing—that the plaintiff is another son of the testator, and therefore entitled under the limitation.

That construction appears to me to be open to this observation. The limitation which I have read is followed by this direction: "The elder of such son and sons and the heirs male of his body to be always preferred and to take before the younger of such son and sons and the heirs male of his and their body." So that if, under the limitation in favour of all and every other son, the eldest son comes in, it seems to me that the logical consequence is that he and his issue must come in before the fourth. The fourth son, if there were one, would, under the will, be provided for in the same way as the third son is; and he is unquestionably preferred to the eldest. There is no intelligible reason why the eldest son should be brought in between the third and the fourth. Upon that ground also I should say that, if the law permits, the construction which would give the estate to the plaintiff is less natural and intelligible than that which would give it to the defendants.

But, of course, I cannot deal with the case apart from authority, more especially as I am treating limitations of real estate, and to them I must now turn. But before I deal with the cases which were cited I should like to refer to a rule laid down by Lord Cranworth in Abbott v. Middleton, 7 H. L. Cas., at p. 89, and repeated by Lord Cairns in Bathurst v. Errington, 25 W. R., at p. 909, 2 App. Cas., at p. 709—"When, by acting on one interpretation of the words used, we are driven to the conclusion that the person using them is acting capriciously, without any intelligible motive, contrary to the ordinary mode in which men in general act in similar cases, then, if the language admits of two constructions, we may reasonably and properly adopt that which avoids these anomalies, even though the construction adopted is not the most obvious or the most grammatically accurate. But, if the words used are unambiguous, they cannot be departed from merely because they lead to consequences which we consider capricious, or even harsh and unreasonable." The rule of the court is therefore this: If we find language in a will capable of being used in what I may call a primary and a secondary sense, and the primary meaning would give a construction which would lead to the conclusion that the person using it is acting capriciously and contrary to the way in which men generally act in similar cases, then we may adopt the secondary meaning. And, à fortiori, it is the duty of the court to adhere to the primary meaning if it gives a construction which is intelligible and devoid of caprice.

The first case cited, and the one most relied on, was Langston v. Langston. In that case there was a limitation to the second, third, fourth, fifth, and all and every other sons in tail male. There was no remainder in terms to the use of the first son, but it was held that he took under the limitation to other sons. The Lord Chancellor, in giving judgment, said, "'Other' then ex vi termini includes the first, because the first is literally the one who answers the description of something other than the second, third, and fourth." The Lord Chancellor certainly found in other parts of the will grounds for saying that there was an intention that the eldest son should take, still the case is undoubtedly a strong authority in the plaintiff's favour, for the Lord Chancellor, although he did not decide, I think rather implied, that, if there was nothing in the will to the contrary, the same would be the result. I think, also, the conclusion to be drawn from the cases of In re Blake and Tavernor v. Grindley, which were cited, is that the rule is that if you find the words "other son" used, the eldest son, not being previously mentioned, may take under that description if you find nothing in the will to the contrary. But it is nowhere laid down that the court must give that meaning to the word "other" if you find a contrary intention indicated in the will.

In Clements v. Paske, given in a note, 2 Cl. & F., at p. 230, the court held that, under the words, "every other son," the eldest son took an estate tail. There, too, there were indications in other parts of the will that such was the intention of the testator. These are all the cases which directly bear on the force to be given to the word "other."

[His lordship then dealt with the cases of Galley v. Barrington and Doe v. Taylor, and continued:—] I now come to the cases dealing with the rule of law with reference to the meaning of the words "to be begotten." The rule is stated in Coke upon Littleton: "As procreatis shall extend to the issues begotten afterwards, so procreandis shall extend to the issue begotten before." In the note of the editor it is said:—"But it is held that where the words were in posterum procreandis, sons born before shall be excluded on account of the peculiar force of in posterum," and reference is made to an anonymous case in 2 Leonard, which is commented upon in a case in the Queen's Bench, to which I shall presently refer. In Hibblethwaite v. Cartwright it was held that the words "hereafter to be begotten" were not confined to issue born after, but would take in those born before, "the words procreatis and procreandis being of the same import." Hewet v. Ireland was a case of a similar kind. But Doe v. Hallett is the leading authority. There there was a devise "to the use of A., only surviving son of J. S., for life, and to his first and other sons, &c., and for default of such issue to the use of the first, second, and of all and every other son and sons of J. S. lawfully to be begotten, and the heirs male of the body of such first and other sons." In that case there was an error in the will, A. not being the only surviving son, and the court held, in order to avoid a capricious disposition, that the second son was entitled to take. Lord Ellenborough, in giving judgment, discusses the case in 3 Leon. He says:—"There the feoffor made a feoffment to the use of his younger son in tail, and after to the use of the heirs of his body in posterum procreandis. The case, therefore, did not turn entirely upon the effect of the words 'in posterum,' for the feoffor's passing by the eldest son in the first instance was a very important circumstance to indicate an intention to exclude that son altogether." It was the fact that in the case from Leon. the eldest son was passed by in the first instance, which, in the opinion of Lord Ellenborough, distinguished that case from Hibblethwaite v. Cartwright. It is obvious, therefore, that it was Lord Ellenborough's opinion that the rule as to procreatis and procreandis was not so absolute but that it would give way upon indication of intention to be found in other parts of the will. Similar opinions were expressed by Le Blanc and Bayley, JJ. In Almack v. Lord Wood, V.C., came to the conclusion that the will contained nothing which required him to depart from the settled legal meaning of the words "to be begotten." He, however, cited Doe v. Hallett, and did not express dissent from the doctrine laid down that what may be called the primary legal meaning of the words "to be begotten" will not be adopted if there are indications of a contrary intention to be gathered from other parts of the testator's will.

Now, in this case, looking at the whole will, and observing that the plaintiff, the eldest son, is passed by in the limitation of these estates, I think there is enough to justify me in coming to the conclusion that the testator meant to use the words "to be begotten" as importing futurity.

Then last of all, if it is necessary—I do not think it is—I should say that the words "to be begotten" are capable of a primary legal and a secondary legal signification; that if they are used in a secondary sense we find a plain and intelligible disposition made by the testator, whereas, if they are used in the primary sense, the will is, to a certain extent, capricious and unintelligible as regards the provision for the third and future fourth son.

Therefore it appears to me that I am justified in adhering to the construction which, upon a simple perusal of the will, I should have given to it, and I hold that the plaintiff is not entitled, but that the persons claiming under the daughters are entitled. The action must therefore be dismissed.

Darenth Valley Sewerage Board v. Dartford Union. (a.)

Local government—Expenses of joint board—Apportionment—"Special expenses"—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss 230, 283, 284.

A provisional order of the Local Government Board, confirmed by a local Act, provided that the expenses incurred by a district joint board were to be defrayed out of a common fund contributed by the component districts, as provided by section 283 of the Public Health Act, 1875; and that certain districts should contribute as if they were required to meet "special expenses" within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Held, that the board was bound to apportion the amount of the expenses among the different districts in proportion to the rateable value of the properties in those districts, to be ascertained according to the valuation list.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the court under order 34.

The special case set forth the following facts:—

1. The plaintiffs were constituted a joint board within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, by the Local Government Board's Provisional Order Confirmation (Darenth Valley) Act, 1878, for the Darenth Valley main sewerage district with the powers and authority therein mentioned.

2. The expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in carrying out their duties are required to be defrayed out of a common fund, to be contributed by the component districts of the said Darenth Valley main sewerage district in the manner provided by article 16 of the said provisional order and section 283 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and no part of the said districts has been exempted from assessment under section 7 of the above-mentioned Confirmation Act of 1878.

3. In pursuance of section 284 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for the purpose of obtaining payment from the said component districts of the sums to be contributed by them towards the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, the plaintiffs have from time to time issued their precept to the respective local authorities of such component district requiring payment of the sums therein mentioned, and such sums have been paid accordingly with the exception of certain sums required to be paid by the defendants.

5. In apportioning the amount of the said expenses of the plaintiffs among the said component districts for the purpose of issuing a precept, the rateable values of the properties in such districts were not all taken upon the same basis, and in no case was the full rateable value of all the property in the district, as appearing in the valuation list for the time being, taken as a rateable value for the purpose aforesaid.

6. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the plaintiffs, in apportioning the amounts of their said expenses among the said component districts, should do so according to the rateable value of the properties in such districts, such values to be ascertained according to the valuation list in force for the time being, or whether the rateable value of tithes, tithe commutation rent charges, and lands used as arable meadow or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, market gardens, or nursery grounds, or covered with water or used as a canal or towing path for the same, or as a railway constructed under any Act of Parliament, should be taken at one-fourth of the rateable values thereof appearing in the said valuation lists, or in what other way and upon what other basis should the said apportionment be made?

7. It was agreed that, upon the judgment of the court being given, a sum of money, to be ascertained as the court should direct, should be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs.

By section 16 of the provisional order set forth in the schedule to 41 & 42 Vict. c. ccxi., being the Darenth Valley Provisional Order Confirmation Act, 1878, it is provided that "the expenses incurred by the joint board in carrying out the duties prescribed by this order, including all establishment charges, . . . shall be defrayed out of a common fund, to be contributed by the urban sanitary district and the several contributory places mentioned in the schedule hereto in manner provided by section 283 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and for the purposes of this order any person appointed by the joint board may inspect, take copies of, or make extracts from, any valuation list or rate for the relief of the poor within the united district, or any part thereof, or any book relating to the same."

By section 17 of the provisional order it is provided that "the contributions of the rural sanitary authorities of the Dartford and Sevenoaks Unions respectively towards the common fund of the united district shall be contributed and raised in the same manner in every respect as if such contributions were required to defray 'special expenses' within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875."

Channell, Q.C., and H. F. Dickens, for the defendants.

MATHEW, J.—It appears to me in this case that the board is bound to apportion the amount of the expenses among the different districts and to do so in proportion to the rateable value of the properties in those districts. The values are to be ascertained according to the valuation list. It seems to me that when we look at the provisional order and the Public Health Act the matter is perfectly clear. Under section 16 of the provisional order it is directed as follows:—[His lordship read it]. Section 283 of the Public Health Act provides that any expenses incurred by a joint board shall be defrayed out of a common fund to be contributed to by the component districts in proportion to the rateable value of the property in each district. What does that mean? It appears to me that the meaning is made perfectly plain by the words that follow "such value to be ascertained according to the valuation list in force for the time being," and section 16 of the provisional order gives power to examine the valuation lists. What the valuation list contains, as a general rule, we know. The meaning of section 283 is rendered clear by section 230; but in this case there does not appear to me to be any room for doubt. The next clause of the provisional order directs how the contributions are to be provided. The clause of the Public Health Act as to special expenses therein referred to directs that the deductions shall be made which are referred to in the case.

It appears to me, therefore, that the contention of Mr. White fails, and that our judgment must be for the defendants.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was contended that the construction we are putting upon the clauses of the provisional order might lead to a different rate being levied upon one portion of the district from that levied upon another. If, of course, the provisional order, instead of dealing with one single joint board, were dealing with a great number, there would be a great deal to be said for that contention, and we should have to struggle against any construction which might lead to what would apparently be so unfair; but the provisional order does not deal with any board except the particular Darenth Valley Board. That being so, it was open, of course, to consideration what was the best mode of ascertaining the proportion which each of the three contributory bodies should bring into the common fund. We have heard nothing to show that the construction which we have adopted will lead to any injustice whatever, and it may be, having regard to the peculiar nature of this district, all of it being more or less of a suburban character, there may be really no such disproportion as would make it worth while to go to the trouble of distinguishing, for the purposes of the proportion which each is to pay, between the land which ultimately will be assessed at one-fourth of its rateable value and the land which will be assessed at the full rateable value. I agree with my brother Mathew in the construction he has put upon the Act.

Appeal from a review by the master of the taxation by the county court judge of Essex of the sheriff's charges as returning officer in respect of a Parliamentary election for the South-Eastern Division of that county. A member of the firm of Messrs. Geppe & Son acted as under-sheriff, the high sheriff being the returning officer.

The items in question were:—

1. For preparing and publishing the notice of election, £2 2s.

The county court judge allowed only 17s. of this charge, on the ground that vouchers had not been produced in respect of the balance.

2. For preparing and supplying the nomination papers, £1 1s.

On the same ground 2s. only of this charge had been allowed.

5. Storage for ballot boxes, £1 10s.

Disallowed on the ground that it was not a claim authorized in the schedule to the Act of 1875.

12. For the preparation and publication of notices (other than the notice of election), £26.

Disallowed on the ground that there had been no transmission to the returning officer by the under-sheriff as the person claiming for work, labour, &c., against the returning officer of the detailed particulars in writing of this claim within 14 days in compliance with the terms of section 5 of the Act.

13. For professional and other assistance in and about the conduct of the election, £46.

Disallowed; the county court judge holding that it fell within the same class of claims as No. 12, and that it was governed by section 5 of the Act.

68. For time and expenses in bringing, &c., ballot boxes, stamping instruments, and papers from Southend to Chelmsford after the election, £4 4s.

Disallowed as not coming within the schedule to the Act.

76. (Classed under the head "all other expenses.") Shaw & Son's bill for forms and printing, £25 1s.

Of this charge only £2 16s. 11d. had been allowed, on the ground that otherwise £18 which was the maximum for "all other expenses" given in the schedule would have to be exceeded.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 26.—The judgment of the court (Denman and Mathew, JJ.) was delivered by Denman, J.—This was an appeal, under 49 & 50 Vict. c. 57, s. 7, from the master's review of the taxation by the county court judge of Essex of the sheriff's charges as returning officer in respect of a Parliamentary election for the South-Eastern Division of Essex.

The sheriff objects to the disallowance of certain charges.

The two candidates insist upon the correctness of the master's decision, which confirmed the taxation of the county court judge in all respects, but did not go into any details or give any reasons.

The county court judge delivered a judgment in which he gave his reasons for the various disallowances complained of. It is not necessary to enter into these in detail. The principal ground of his decision appears to have been that several of the items charged in the returning officer's account sent to the candidates were charges for services rendered by the under-sheriff for the sheriff, the returning officer, and not vouched in detail or dissected in the account sent in, so as to enable the candidates or their election agents, by inspection of the accounts and subsequently of the vouchers, to see whether the charges were reasonable or otherwise. The total amount charged to the candidates—viz. £547 6s. 8d.—was within the limit allowed by the statute, but from this amount the sum of £240 14s. 2d. was disallowed by the county court judge, part, as was admitted, rightly; part, as was contended, improperly. Before dealing with the particular items in dispute it will be desirable to refer to the enactments bearing on the case.

The duties of the returning officer are now prescribed in various clauses of the Ballot Act, 1872. Among other things he is, by section 8, to provide nomination papers, polling stations (with the right, by section 6, of using schoolrooms, &c., making good any damage or expense on account of their being so used), ballot-boxes, ballot-papers, &c., and to pay such officers and do such other things as may be necessary for effectually conducting the election. By the same section it is provided that all expenses properly incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of that Act should be payable in the same manner as expenses incurred in the erection of polling booths were then by law payable (that is to say, ultimately by the candidates in equal proportions), and a power is given to the sheriff to appoint in writing a deputy (which was not done in this case), and it is provided that every such deputy and also any under-sheriff shall, in so far as he acts as a returning officer, be deemed to be included in the term "returning officer." In the present case there was no appointment of under-sheriff in writing so as to make him a deputy-sheriff, but he did a great part of the work for which the sheriff charges the candidate in the account sent in. In the rules contained in the schedule to the Ballot Act the duties of the returning officer are prescribed in considerable detail. He is by rule 1 to give notice of the time and place of proceeding to the election; he is also to give notice of the poll by rule 9; by rule 11 he is to placard the building in which the election is to take place with the names of those nominated; by rule 15 he is to provide polling stations; by rule 16 to furnish them with a certain number of compartments; and by rule 19 to give public notice of the situation of the polling stations and the description of the voters who are to vote at each and of the mode in which they are to vote. The above enumeration is sufficient to illustrate the nature of those duties of the returning officer which necessarily involve some expenditure on his part beyond the merely personal duties which he is called upon to perform by himself or others. By rule 46 it is provided that where he is required by the Act to give any public notice he may do so by advertisements, or placards, or handbills, or such other means as he thinks best calculated to afford information to the electors. These being the duties of the returning officer since 1872, the Legislature in 1875 passed the Act upon which the questions discussed before us mainly depend. It is the 38 & 39 Vict. c. 84, and is called in the preamble "An Act to regulate the expenses and control the charges of returning officers at Parliamentary elections."

By section 2 it provides that the returning officer shall be entitled to his reasonable charges, not exceeding the sums mentioned in the first schedule to the Act, in respect of services and expenses of the several kinds mentioned in the schedule which have been properly rendered or incurred by him for the purposes of the election. This section does not limit the right of the returning officer to be paid to such charges only as have been vouched under section 4 or section 5, afterwards referred to. The section further enacts that "a returning officer shall not be entitled to payment for any other services or expenses, or at any greater rates than as in the schedule mentioned." The schedule which follows contains twenty-two different headings, with the maximum charge to be allowed for each. Among these are the following, which bear upon the charges now in dispute:—For constructing a polling station, with its fittings and compartments, £7 7s.; for each ballot box required to be purchased, £1 1s.; for the use of each ballot box when hired, 5s. Then follows certain specified maximum charges for stationery at the polling stations, for printing and providing ballot papers per thousand, for stamping instruments (to make the official mark on the ballot papers), and for copies of the register. Then follow the two headings in which the two most important items in question in this case are described as follows:—First, for the preparation and publication of notices other than the notice of election (for which last-mentioned notice two guineas had already been allowed in the schedule as the maximum charge), not exceeding for the whole of such notices £20, and £1 for every additional 1,000 electors above 3,000; secondly, for professional and other assistance in and about the conduct of the election, in a contested election, not exceeding £25, and an additional £3 for every 1,000 electors above 3,000, &c. The last item in the schedule is "for all other expenses, in a contested election, not exceeding £10, and an additional £1 for every 1,000 electors above 1,000," and in an uncontested election, nil. A perusal of the above enactments leads to the conclusion that whereas, on the one hand, the Legislature intended to protect candidates from unreasonable demands of returning officers, on the other hand, it had a regard to the increased duties which the Ballot Act had thrown upon these officers, and intended that for all actual expenditure reasonably necessary for the conduct of the election (to be ascertained in case of objection by taxation) the returning officer should be indemnified, subject only to this—that a maximum charge was specified in the schedule beyond which the candidates should not be liable, even though such maximum charge might not be sufficient to reimburse the returning officer for his expenses in respect of the particular class of expenditure in respect of which the maximum charge was specified in the schedule. For example, supposing the returning officer, however reasonably, owing to the difficulty of deciding questions of law raised during the election, were to render himself liable to hundreds of pounds beyond the sum mentioned in the schedule as the maximum for "professional and other assistance in and about the conduct of the election," he would be limited to the maximum in any claim he would have against the candidates, and each candidate would only be liable to his aliquot portion of the maximum charge. But as long as the returning officer only makes his claim for such kinds of services and expenses as are of the kinds enumerated in the schedule, and are also both reasonable and within the maximum, and have been properly rendered or incurred by him for the purposes of the election, he is, by the very terms of section 2 of the Act of 1875, entitled to such charges, to be paid by the candidates in equal shares. He is "not entitled to payment for any other services or expenses, or at any greater rates than as in the schedule mentioned." That is to say, he is not entitled to any unreasonable charge or to any charge in respect of services or expenses different in kind from those mentioned in the schedule; nor for services or expenses which have not been properly rendered or incurred for the purposes of the election. We do not think that the Legislature intended to enact that no possible service or expense rendered or incurred by the sheriff should be payable by the candidates merely because it does not come verbatim et literatim within the several descriptions in the schedule, provided it be a service or expense of one of the kinds mentioned. This appears to us to be sufficient to show that, at least as regards one of the disputed items, the county court judge was wrong in disallowing the charge. The facts relating to that item were these. In order to save expense at future elections in purchasing new ballot boxes or hiring them for the election (for which the maximum charges in the schedule are respectively one guinea and five shillings), the under-sheriff, who is a solicitor, charged the sheriff a much less sum for keeping the old ballot boxes from one election to another. The amount was disallowed on the ground that the item was one not contained in the schedule. It is not so eo nomine, but we think it was a service or expense of the kind for which a reasonable sum might have been allowed; and that the master, having the above facts before him—assuming them to be made out to his satisfaction—ought to have allowed the claim. But much more serious claims or charges, as regards the amounts, were disallowed on the ground that, though claimed in the very words of the schedule, they were not payable by the candidates, because no detailed account of the items composing them had been sent in to the returning officer within fourteen days of the return according to the 5th section of the Act of 1875. These were items 12 and 13 in the account.

The first of these was described, as in the schedule, "preparation and publication of notices (other than the notice of election), £26." The other was "professional and other assistance in and about the conduct of the election, £46." It was not disputed that both these sums were sums for which the sheriff was or might be responsible to the under-sheriff, who was a solicitor. But no account had been sent in to the sheriff by the under-sheriff within the fourteen days for either sum. Whether any specific claim had been sent in to the returning officer within the twenty-one days specified or not does not very clearly appear from the judgment of the county court judge, but it is clear from the judgment of the county court judge that he decided on a ground which makes it impossible to ascertain this, because in his judgment he gave the exact ground upon which he disallowed the charges, as follows:—"As to item 12, I decide that there having been no transmission to the returning officer of the detailed particulars in writing of this claim within the fourteen days specified (i.e., in section 5), by Messrs. Gepp & Sons, as the persons claiming for work and labour, &c., against the returning officer, in compliance with the terms of section 5 of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 84, this item must be disallowed." It may be assumed for the present purpose in the absence of anything to the contrary in the learned judge's decision, that this £26 may have been actually paid by the under-sheriff to the several persons entitled, and that it may have been an expenditure within the maximum allowed for the purposes to which it relates, and that the under-sheriff, having paid that amount on behalf of the sheriff, had in his possession vouchers for all the bills going to make up the £26. Still we understand the learned judge's decision to be that the returning officer must himself have received detailed particulars from the under-sheriff charging him in detail within the fourteen days, and in default must lose any resort as against the candidate, though he might have paid the amount to the under-sheriff before sending in his claim against the candidates. We do not so read section 5 of the Act, nor do we think that the joint effect of sections 4 and 5 is such. Section 5 is primâ facie for the protection of the returning officer. It is no doubt also for the protection of the candidates, for the returning officer is not liable to pay for any work, labour, services, or expenses in respect of any contract not duly stated in such detailed particulars. But if detailed particulars have been sent in to the under-sheriff, and paid by him for the sheriff within the fourteen days, or even afterwards within the twenty-one days, we find nothing to prevent this from being a compliance with section 5, inasmuch as the under-sheriff is notoriously the agent of the sheriff for such matters bills for services rendered that a sending the particulars to him must be looked upon, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, as being a sending of them to the sheriff. Therefore we do not think that the objection on which the learned judge acted is by any means conclusive against the sheriff's right to recover the £26 question.

It was said that if the sheriff does not himself receive particulars in detail under section 5, he cannot, under section 4, transmit the account to the candidates in the shape required by that section. We do not assent to this. The words in section 4 differ from those in section 5. The latter requires every person having a claim in respect of work, &c., to send in detailed particulars of such claim (i.e., an account with dates and items and sub-divisions of different kinds of work); the latter speaks only of "a detailed account showing the items of all the charges claimed" (a very different statement, and one not necessarily required to be in the minute detail than by separately charging the various kinds of services and expenses contained under separate headings in the schedule to the Act). This account is to have annexed to it a notice of the place where the vouchers may be seen. We think that it would be a perfect compliance with these two sections if the under-sheriff were to pay on behalf of the sheriff all the bills in a detailed account, with particulars, sent in to him within the fourteen days for the matters included in item 12 of the account now in question, and a perfect compliance with the requirements of section 4 if the sheriff within the twenty-one days, having paid the under-sheriff £26 for all such items in the lump, were to charge that £26 in the lump to the candidates under the proper head, informing them that the vouchers might be inspected at the under-sheriff's office or elsewhere.

We are therefore of opinion that the master ought to inquire into the facts relating to the charge, receiving evidence, if necessary, under section 1 of 49 & 50 Vict. c. 57.

With regard to the other item, 13, the learned county court judge appears to have decided it entirely on the ground that there could be no claim by the sheriff or the candidates for any payment made by or to the under-sheriff, unless within fourteen days a detailed account were sent in to the sheriff himself. We have not enough before us to enable us to say to what, if any, extent the charge of £46 is allowable; but we think that the master ought to inquire further into the matter, and if there is any further appeal from his decision, that it ought to come before the court in the usual form, with the objections and the master's reasons stated, as in an ordinary taxation of costs, and not as now brought before us, with a mere affirmance of the county court judge's decision and a copy of his notes.

Other objections were raised before the county court and allowed by him which were, in our opinion, based upon a too rigid construction of the requirements of the Act. He appears to have considered that, if a particular amount is charged under a wrong head, it was beyond his power to allow it, even if it might be clearly shown that it was a legitimate charge and duly vouched, and within the maximum to be added to the charges for similar expenditure under the proper heading. For instance, there is question whether under the heading "for constructing polling stations, with fittings, compartments," the sum of £25 was properly charged for furnishing a polling station with the necessary placards and other articles required by the Act to be provided at each polling station. The county court judge's note does not enable us to see clearly what these articles are, but the ground of his decision appears to have been that they were improperly classed as "fittings" in the account. Assuming that they ought to have been classed otherwise, we do not think that it necessarily follows that they are to be disallowed. If within the description of expenses to be allowed as given in the schedule, and if the whole supply of expenses of the kind was within the maximum, and not unreasonable, we think it was within the competency of the county court judge to allow them, even though they were claimed under a wrong heading, and we think the master ought now to look into the account on this footing, allowing only so much for each kind of expense or service as is both within the maximum and reasonable, but not disallowing any particular item if the total of such items is within those limits merely because it may have been misdescribed and so appear under a different head. On these principles we think that the taxation must be reviewed.

Revenue — Excise — Dilution of beer by publican — Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 51), s. 8.

A publican had in his cellar a cask of strong beer and also a cask of much weaker beer. He drew off a certain quantity of the stronger beer and filled the cask again with some of the weaker beer, thereby reducing the specific gravity of the cask of stronger beer from 10 to 8.

Held, that he was liable to conviction for diluting the stronger beer, under section 8, sub-section 2, of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885.

Case stated by one of the police magistrates for the metropolis.

The facts set forth in the special case were as follows:—

The appellant, a licensed occupier of a public-house and retailer of beer, was summoned to answer an information exhibited by the respondent, an officer of Inland Revenue, for diluting beer contrary to 48 & 49 Vict. c. 51, s. 8.

On the 16th of February he had in his cellar a puncheon of beer purchased of Messrs. Barclay & Co., brewers, containing seventy-two gallons of beer. He had also in his cellar thirty-six gallons of small beer, purchased of Mr. Bishop, a dealer in beer. The beer purchased of Messrs. Barclay was of the density of 1013·00 and of the original gravity of 1056·27, and contained 10·30 of proof spirit. The beer purchased of Bishop was of the density of 1002·52 and of the original gravity of 1021·79, and contained 4·62 of proof spirit. The difference in gravity is equivalent to four gallons of water.

On the 16th of February the appellant took about nineteen and a-half gallons of Messrs. Barclay's beer out of the 72-gallon cask, and took eighteen gallons out of a cask of Bishop's beer, and poured the latter into the cask of Messrs. Barclay's beer, and added thereto one gallon of finings. The two beers showed on analysis a density of 1010·42 and an original gravity of 1045·84 and proof spirit 8·56.

(a.) Reported by A. H. Todd, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Neither water nor any other matter except the finings was added to the beer, and the effect of mixing the two beers was to lower the strength of Messrs. Barclay's beer to the extent above mentioned.

The magistrate, being of opinion that the word "dilute" being defined in the Imperial Dictionary as "to weaken or reduce the strength of," the stronger beer had been diluted by adding the weaker beer, and convicted the appellant.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether such mixing of the beers was a dilution within the meaning of the statute.

By the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 51), s. 8, it is enacted as follows :—

(2.) A dealer in or retailer of beer shall not adulterate or dilute beer or add any matter or thing thereto (except finings for the purpose of clarification), and any beer found to be adulterated or diluted or mixed with any other matter or thing (except finings) in the possession of a dealer in or retailer of beer, shall be forfeited, and he shall incur a fine of fifty pounds."

By section 4, "The term beer in the Inland Revenue Act, 1880, shall be construed to extend to any liquor which is made or sold as a description of beer or as a substitute for beer, and which on analysis of a sample thereof at any time shall be found to contain more than two per centum of proof spirit."

Reid, Q.C., and Bodkin, for the appellant.—The Customs and Revenue Act, 1885, is a revenue Act, and intended only to prevent the publican from increasing the quantity of beer by adding matters which had not paid duty. In this case both beers had paid duty. Mixing cannot be dilution or adulteration.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and R. S. Wright, for the respondent.—The Act was intended to protect the public against fraud, and the effect in this case of the mixing was the same as if water had been poured in.

Reid, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 8.—GROVE, J.—I have come to the conclusion that the conviction was right. The question turns mainly on section 8 of the Act. The two sub-sections there are different. The first sub-section deals with the brewer who is not to "adulterate or add anything" to the beer except finings. The second sub-section deals with the publican or retailer who is forbidden to "adulterate, dilute, or add anything" to the beer. Brewers who brew beer of different strengths may always dilute it either by adding water to or mixing weaker beer with stronger beer, provided they do it so as not to cheat the Excise or their customers. The retailer, on the other hand, sells the beer as it is furnished to him, and the intention of the Act is that after he has purchased it for retailing it shall remain undiluted so that the purchaser may know what he is drinking. Here the defendant undoubtedly did dilute the beer, for he mixed weaker beer with stronger so as to reduce its specific gravity from 10 to 8, and that certainly seems to me to be dilution within the meaning of the Act. Counsel for the appellant argued that the Act meant to prohibit only a dilution with water, but if that argument were correct the retailer might pour into stronger beer weak beer which was only a very little stronger than water provided he did not reduce the strength of the mixture below two per cent.

It is said that this Act is only a revenue Act, and therefore was not meant to protect customers of publicans; but there is no doubt that the revenue would suffer if publicans were allowed as much freedom as has been contended for them in mixing beers provided by the brewers. But that does not affect the question, for the words of the Act are clear, and we must give the ordinary interpretation to the language of the Act which is before us, whether it is what is called a "money Bi or not. It has been suggested that this decision prevent a publican from selling what is called "half-a half" to his customers, but the retailer might furn the two kinds of beer for his customer to mix, or, e if he mixed them for him, provided it was done with consent and in the presence of the customer, the publi would be the customer's agent, and would be entitle do so. But even if the Act had that effect, the ar ment to be drawn from the inconvenience of the ena ment could not be allowed to prevail, and the pl language of the statute would have to be followed.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion, thoug had some doubts during the progress of the argume I thought at first that, as this was only a revenue no loss could befall the Excise by the publican mix two kinds of beer that had paid duty. But though object of the enactment may be in the first place to p tect the Excise, the words are plain, and we cannot en into the question whether they deal with, or do not d with, the primary object of the statute. Further, I now satisfied that the Act does not prevent the sale the publican to a customer of a glass of what is cal "half-and-half"; it is intended to prevent the mix of large quantities of beer in the publican's cellar, not of small quantities at the desire of the custom and in his presence. There can be no doubt that t ordinary meaning of "dilute" is to "weaken, reduce strength of," and that this was done in the present ca is clear.

TONSLEY v. HEFFER. (a.)

Practice—Notice of trial—Application for trial by ju —Ord. 36, rr. 6, 16.

A notice of trial of an action being no longer in fo by reason of the cause not having been entered for tr by either party within the time required by ord. 36 16, the plaintiff gave a second notice of trial and appl for a trial by jury.

Held, by Field, J. (Manisty, J., dissenting), th application, not having been made within ten days first notice of trial, was too late under ord. 36, r. 6.

Appeal from an order of A. L. Smith, J., at cham refusing a trial with a jury under ord. 36, r. 6.

Action brought for the balance of purchase-mon

The plaintiff gave notice of trial on April 21, but the cause was not entered for trial within the fo ing six days, as required by ord. 36, r. 16, whe place of trial is London or Middlesex. The pla gave a second notice of trial on May 14, and applie a trial by jury on May 19. The application was re by the master and by A. L. Smith, J., at chambers.

R. Wallace, for the plaintiff.—The first notice o is no longer in force. The application is, therefo time if made within ten days of the second noti e.

Blake Odgers, for the defendant.—The parties h longer an absolute right to a trial by jury aft expiration of ten days after notice of trial has given. A second notice of trial is nowhere contem by the rules.

(a.) Reported by G. K. PALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-

FIELD, J.—I think the order appealed from was right. There could be no doubt, if rule 6 stood alone, that notice of trial having been given on April 21 and ten days having expired at the date of the application for a jury, it was out of time under rule 6. I think it safer to isolate rule 6 and construe it by itself according to its plain and literal meaning. I give no opinion as to the effect of rule 16.

MANNIFY, J.—I am unable to adopt this view. Unless the effect of the two rules is absolutely to prohibit the plaintiff from having the case tried by a jury, he ought not, in my opinion, to lose his rights. It cannot have been intended that if notice of trial is given one day and countermanded the next for the purposes of an attempt at settlement, the effect of the notice being "no longer in force" (rule 16) shall be to prevent the parties from obtaining a trial by jury in the simple manner provided by rule 6. As neither party set down the case for trial under the first notice given, that notice became, in my opinion, countermanded by consent, and thereupon the plaintiff acquired a right to give, and did give, a second notice of trial, which was perfectly valid. Having entered the case within six days and applied for a jury within ten days of a valid notice of trial the plaintiff has complied with both rule 6 and rule 16, and is, in my opinion, entitled as of right to a jury. But as the court is divided in opinion the order of my brother Smith will be confirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

Any default, even without fraud, made by a trustee in payment of any sum in his possession or under his control, which he has been ordered to pay, is sufficient to justify the court in making an order for attachment.*

Crowther v. Elgood, 35 W. R. 369, 34 Ch. D. 691, followed.

Order of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J., sitting as Vacation Judge. In 1859 the defendant, the present appellant, was indebted to his brother, and the brother afterwards assigned the debt to the trustee of a voluntary settlement for the benefit of his wife and children. Actions were subsequently brought against the defendant both by the trustee of the voluntary settlement and the brother to recover the debt. On the 7th of June, 1878, Hall, V.C., made an order sanctioning the compromise of these actions (some of the parties being infants). The order recited an admission by the defendant that "the principal sum in his hands claimed by the plaintiffs in the first action amounts to £4,147 6s. 1d.," and went on to direct that the defendant should, out of the sum "so in his hands," pay certain costs and "should stand possessed of one moiety of the residue upon trust to pay interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum" to the brother's wife for life, with remainder as to the corpus for the brother's children; and it was further ordered that the tenant for life or the children should have liberty to apply to the court for payment of the principal and interest of their moiety in case default was made in payment of the interest. Default was made in payment of the interest of this moiety, and on the 8th of July, 1887, Stirling, J., made an order directing the defendant, within one month, to pay the principal of the moiety into court. The defendant failed to comply with this order, and on the 24th of August Kekewich, J., on the application of the tenant for life, gave leave to issue a writ of attachment against the defendant, but directed that the order giving leave to issue the writ should not be drawn up for a fortnight.

The order of Kekewich, J., stated that it appeared to the satisfaction of the court that the defendant had made default in payment of the sum directed to be paid into court by the order of the 8th of July, 1887, and that such default was made by the defendant as trustee or person acting in a fiduciary capacity within the meaning of sub-section (3), section 4, of the Debtors Act, 1869.

The defendant appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Lyttelton Chubb, for the appellant.—This money was never in the hands or under the control of the appellant as trustee. It came into his hands and was held by him as an ordinary debtor, and when the order of the 7th of June, 1878, was made he had not the money in his possession or under his control at all. The admission recited in that order was merely an admission of the amount of the debt he owed. Section 4, sub-section (3), of the Debtors Act therefore does not apply: Ferguson v. Ferguson, L. R. 10 Ch. 661, 24 W. R. Dig. 184. The appellant has not been guilty of any fraudulent act, and section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, only applies to fraudulent debtors: Middleton v. Chichester, 19 W. R. 369, L. R. 6 Ch. 152. The order of the 7th of June, 1878, expressly authorized the appellant to retain this money. Even if the case comes within sub-section (3) of section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, the court has discretion, under the Debtors Act, 1878, to refuse to commit the debtor. [COTTON, L.J.—If the case is within sub-section (3) of section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and the judge below has exercised his discretion under the Act of 1878, we ought not to interfere: Crowther v. Elgood, 35 W. R. 369, 34 Ch. D. 691.] We say the judge below did not exercise any discretion under the Act of 1878, but has proceeded merely under the Act of 1869.

E. Cutler, Q.C., and Whiteway, for the respondent.—This case comes within both the letter and the spirit of sub-section (3) of section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869. Middleton v. Chichester does not support the contention that fraud or moral delinquency must be shown in order to bring the debtor within sub-section (3) of section 4. Marris v. Ingram, 28 W. R. 434, 13 Ch. D. 338, is an authority against that contention. The affidavit filed by the debtor himself shows that he had sufficient money in his hands to meet this sum at the time the order of

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

June 7, 1878, was made, and there is a distinct admission contained in the order to that effect.

They referred to Evans v. Bear, 23 W. R. 67, L. R. 10 Ch. 76; Re Strong, 34 W. R. 614, 32 Ch. D. 342.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal from Kekewich, J., who made an order to commit to prison the appellant. It is contended on behalf of the appellant that, even if the case is within section 4, sub-section (3), of the Debtors Act, 1869, we ought not, in the exercise of our discretion, to send him to prison. But we cannot enter into that now, as, in my opinion, Kekewich, J., in making the order, exercised his discretion under the Act of 1878—though, no doubt, he exercised it unfavourably to the appellant—and we cannot interfere. The only question we have to consider is, does the Act of 1869 apply? [The Lord Justice then stated the facts, and continued:—] No doubt the existence of the ordinary relation of debtor and creditor does not bring the case within the exception contained in the Act. But was this particular sum a sum at the time under the appellant's control as trustee? for that, I think, must be shown in order to bring it within sub-section (3) of section 4 of the Act of 1869. Now was this so? In my opinion we must hold that it was. The order of June 7, 1878, was a special order sanctioning the compromise of the actions brought against the debtor, and was made upon an admission of the debtor, recited in the order, that "he has in his hands" this sum of money, and the order directed that he should stand possessed of it upon certain trusts; there was also a direction that if he made default in payment any of the parties might apply to the court for payment. At the time the order was made the debtor (the present appellant) was a trustee; but it is said that at the time the order was made he had not, in fact, this money in his hands or under his control as trustee. I am of opinion that the court would never have made this order sanctioning a compromise unless there was some evidence to satisfy the court that he had at the time in his possession property or means sufficient to satisfy this sum, and if so, then he had this sum under his control as trustee. I do not find it stated in the appellant's affidavit that he had not the means of paying this sum, either at the time the order was made or afterwards, and therefore we must take it that he had the means to satisfy this sum of money under his control at the time the order was made constituting him a trustee with respect to it.

Then it was said that the appellant was allowed to retain this sum of money by the court; but that was only on his representation that he could make it good, and until the court should otherwise order. He failed to pay the interest, and the court has otherwise ordered. Therefore we cannot consider this as a sum of money in his power and control which the court authorizes him to retain. I am of opinion, therefore, the appellant is a debtor within the scope of sub-section (3) of section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869. It is not necessary in order to commit a debtor under that section that there should be any fraud proved against him. No doubt the preamble of the Act describes it as an "Act for the abolition of imprisonment for debt and for the punishment of fraudulent debtors"; but the words of the exception contained in sub-section (3) of section 4 are "default by a trustee . . . ordered to pay any sum in his possession or under his control," and therefore any default, even without fraud, made by a trustee in payment of any sum in his possession or under his control which he is ordered to pay is sufficient to justify the court in making an order to commit.

Lopes, L.J.—The question we have to consider is whether this case comes within sub-section (3), section 4, of the Debtors Act, 1869. As to sub-section (3) I think it clear that it operates only as between trustee and cestui que trust, and not as between mere debtor and creditor. Has the appellant at any time had this money impressed with a trust in his hands? That depends on the evidence. The order of the court, already referred to, contains a distinct admission that he had this sum in his hands. To my view, the whole basis of the order and compromise was that there was that money or its equivalent in the hands of the appellant at the time the order was made which declared the trusts with respect to it, and that the appellant had then the means to satisfy it. Sub-section (3) of section 4 therefore applies. A discretion to commit is given to the judge under the Act of 1878; the judge has exercised his discretion, and therefore this court will not interfere. I agree with Cotton, L.J., in holding that it is not necessary to show fraud; mere default in payment by a trustee of money in his possession or under his control as trustee is sufficient to bring the case within sub-section (3) of section 4.

Holmes v. Twickenham Local Board. (a.)

Local government—Sewering—Change of system—Liability of frontagers—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 13, 15, 18, 150, 207.

A piece of land having been laid out for building purposes, a system of sewerage was laid down. A local board for the district was subsequently formed, and, sixteen years after its formation, an alteration in the sewerage system having become necessary, the board sought to charge the frontagers with the expense of such alteration under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Held (affirming the decision of the Divisional Court, 35 W. R. 578, 18 Q. B. D. 577), that the powers given by section 150 could only be exercised once for all within a reasonable time after the vesting of the sewer in the local board under section 13, and that, therefore, the alteration had been made under section 18, and was chargeable on the general rates under section 207, and not on the frontagers.

Appeals by the Twickenham Local Board from the decision of a divisional court (Huddleston, B., and A. L. Smith, J.) upon a special case, reported 35 W. R. 578, 18 Q. B. D. 577.

Bonella and Holmes were the respective owners of two pieces of land fronting and adjoining and abutting upon a road called The Avenue upon the St. Margaret's Estate at Twickenham. This estate was purchased and laid out for building purposes by the Conservative Land Society prior to the year 1868, and a system of sewerage, with an outlet into the Thames, was laid down by them. At that time no local board existed at Twickenham, but in 1868 the Twickenham Local Board was constituted as the urban sanitary authority for that district.

In 1884 the Thames Conservators gave notice to the local board to discontinue the flow or passage of any sewage into the Thames within their district, and the board accordingly gave notice to these frontagers, among others, to alter the sewer, and, on their refusal to do so, themselves executed the works, and charged the respective proportions of the expenses upon the frontagers. Bonella and Holmes appealed, and the Divisional Court held that the alterations could not be charged upon the frontagers, but must be defrayed out of the general district rate.

By the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 13, "All existing and future sewers within the district of a local authority, together with all buildings, works, materials, and things belonging thereto, except sewers made by any person for his own profit or by any company for the profit of the shareholders . . . shall vest in and be under the control of such local authority."

By section 15, "Every local authority shall keep in repair all sewers belonging to them, and shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act."

Section 18 gives power to any local authority to alter, enlarge, improve, or close any sewer belonging to them.

By section 150, if a street is not sewered to their satisfaction, they may give notice to the owners or occupiers of premises adjoining or abutting on the street to sewer it, and if such notice is disregarded, the local authority may themselves execute the works and recover the expenses from the frontagers.

By section 207, "All expenses incurred or payable by an urban authority in the execution of this Act, and not otherwise provided for, shall be charged on, and defrayed out of, the district fund and general rate leviable by them under this Act."

Lumley Smith, Q.C. (J. P. Grain with him), for the local board.—The sewer was made by the Conservative Land Co. for profit, and therefore falls within the exception in section 13, and did not vest in the local board. They are entitled, therefore, to use the powers given by section 150 and to make a new sewer. Until they have expressed satisfaction with a sewer they may alter the system under that section.

Bosanquet, Q.C. (Edwyn Jones with him), for Bonella.—If the board were dissatisfied with the existing system of sewerage when it vested in them they might alter it under section 150, but could only do so once for all.

He cited Fulham Board v. Goodwin, 1 Ex. D. 400, 25 W. R. Dig. 156.

Arthur Powell, for Holmes.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case, at the time when the statutes with regard to local authorities became applicable, there was a sewer in existence for the purpose of draining the road which had been made by the Conservative Land Co. when they laid out the estate. We are clearly of opinion that that sewer was not a sewer made for profit within the exception given by section 13. That being so, the sewer, when the local board was constituted, vested in it, and it became the duty of the local board to see that the sewer was sufficient for the drainage of the road which at that time drained into it. If it was insufficient they had powers given them by section 150 to call on the frontagers to remedy its defects, and those powers they ought to have exercised. Obviously they must have a reasonably sufficient time to make up their minds whether the sewer was sufficient or not, but if they did nothing and expressed no opinion as to its sufficiency or insufficiency within a reasonable time, in my opinion that is conclusive evidence that they were satisfied with the existing sewer. When once they are satisfied with it they cannot again make use of section 150. That section was only meant to be used once for all at the time the local authority were dissatisfied with the existing sewer. After the lapse of a reasonable time, therefore, this sewer vested in them, and under section 15 they were bound to keep it in repair, and if at any time it became insufficient they had power under section 18 to alter or enlarge or even close it. It was, therefore, their duty to do so if the sewer became inefficient. That has happened, and it has become necessary to make a new system of sewerage. It is impossible for them now to use the powers given them by section 150, and they must therefore use the powers conferred by section 18, and must defray the payment out of the general rate under section 207, and cannot impose it upon the frontagers. That is, in my opinion, the true construction of the statute, and it follows the reasoning both of A. L. Smith, J., in the court below, and also that applied to another statute of similar character in the case of Fulham Board of Works v. Goodwin. The opposite construction would, in my opinion, be unreasonable, for it would confer upon the local board powers which would be alike unjust and oppressive. It follows, therefore, that we agree with the view expressed in the court below, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

In re JOHNSON. (a.)

Contempt of court—Abusive language—Interference with the administration of justice—Judge in chambers.

After the hearing of an application before the judge in chambers, a solicitor who was engaged in the case, after the parties had left the judge's chambers and gone into the adjoining hall, began to call the solicitor for the other side foul and offensive names in connection with the proceedings before the judge, and continued doing so while going downstairs until they reached the entrance to the building, when he shook his fist in the other solicitor's face, though he did not actually strike him.

Held, that this conduct was an interference with the administration of justice in connection with the proceedings at chambers; and that as the judge in chambers was engaged in the exercise of his judicial functions as a judge of the High Court the conduct was a contempt of the court of which the judge was the representative, and the court had power to commit for contempt.

Appeal from an order of Kekewich, J., sitting as Vacation Judge, committing one Johnson, a solicitor, to prison for contempt of court.

Upon an application on the 16th of August to Kekewich, J., sitting as Vacation Judge in chambers, in reference to an action in the Lambeth County Court, one Charles Robinson appeared as solicitor for the plaintiff, and Johnson as solicitor for the defendant. After the application was disposed of, and when the solicitors had gone into the hall adjoining the judge's chambers, Johnson began to call Robinson foul and offensive names, calling him a "liar" and a "damned perjured scoundrel," and continued doing so down the stairs until they came to the east entrance to the building leading to the Strand, when Johnson several times put his hand to Robinson's face in a threatening attitude.

The matter was thereupon, by leave, brought before Kekewich, J., sitting in court as Vacation Judge, upon a notice of motion to commit, and Johnson not appearing, Kekewich, J., made an order of committal, of which the following is the material part:—"No one appearing for the said George Johnson, and it appearing by the evidence that the said George Johnson did, within the precincts of the court, threaten, assault, and intimidate the said Charles Robinson, and the court being of opinion, upon consideration of the facts disclosed by such evidence, that the said George Johnson has been guilty of contempt of court, it is ordered that the said George Johnson" be committed to prison.

Johnson appealed, and filed an affidavit denying some of the language attributed to him, and saying that he was at the time suffering from personal trouble, and that he regretted his language and acts.

Oswald and F. Watt, for Johnson.—A judge sitting in chambers is not a "court." There can therefore be no contempt of court in connection with proceedings at chambers. A judge at chambers has no power to fine or imprison for contempt: Rex v. Faulkner, 2 C. M. & R. 525, at p. 533; and section 39 of the Judicature Act, 1873, has not enlarged the power of a judge at chambers: Baker v. Oakes, 25 W. R. 220, 2 Q. B. D. 171. They also contended that no contempt had been committed within the court or the precincts of the court, the language being mere vulgar abuse, and cited 2 Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, 8th ed., p. 221; Ex parte Wilton, 1 Dowl. N. S. 805; Republic of Costa Rica v. Erlanger, 46 L. J. Ch. 375.

Johnston Watson, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This case is a very simple one, though the arguments have lasted a considerable time. The judge in chambers came to a certain conclusion upon an application made to him, whereupon one of the solicitors, who had been before the judge, when the parties left the judge's chambers, began to misconduct himself, and continued to do so till he came to the door of the building. His disgraceful conduct consisted in using vile language of the lowest description to the solicitor who was against him in connection with the proceedings before the judge. I have no doubt that he intended that language to be an insult to the administration of justice and to bring it into contempt. There can be no doubt that it was an insult to the administration of justice. The matter was accordingly brought before the judge in court, and the judge, on the 31st of August, made an order of committal against the offending solicitor. It was argued on his behalf that there was no contempt in court, and that therefore the judge had no jurisdiction to commit him. It does not follow, however, that there was no contempt of court. It was further argued that the judge sitting in chambers was not sitting in court, and that a person while in judge's chambers could not be guilty of a contempt of court, even though he struck the judge a blow in the face. The answer to that is that it is not necessary that the occurrence should take place in court, nor that it should be a contempt of a judge sitting in court. All that is necessary is that it should be a contemptuous interference with a judicial proceeding, the judge acting in his judicial capacity. That is laid down in the prepared, but undelivered, judgment of Wilmot, C.J., in Rex v. Almon, a full report of which appears in "Notes of Opinions and Judgments by Lord Chief Justice Wilmot," p. 243, where, at p. 265, he says:—"Therefore the question resolves itself at last into this single point—whether a judge, making an order at his house or chambers, is not acting in his judicial capacity as a judge of this court, and both his person and character under the same protection as if he was sitting by himself in court. It is conceded that an act of violence upon his person, when he was making such an order, would be a contempt punishable by attachment. Upon what principle? for striking a judge in walking along the streets would not be a contempt of the court. The reason, therefore, must be that he is in the exercise of his office, and discharging the function of a judge of this court; and if his person is under this protection, why should not his character be under the same protection? It is not for the sake of the individual, but for the sake of the public, that his person is under such protection." It was only necessary in that judgment to speak of the person and character of the judge, but the doctrine there enunciated is applicable to any proceedings before a judge, if the judge is acting judicially in his office of judge of the High Court, whether the judge is sitting in court or in his private room; the proceedings before him are judicial proceedings; and anyone who interferes with those judicial proceedings so as to bring them into contempt is guilty of a contempt, not of the judge, but of the court of which that judge is a member. That judgment of Wilmot, C.J., has, as my brother Fry has discovered, been approved of by Lord Lyndhurst in Ex parte Van Sandau, 1 Phill. 445. The doctrine, therefore, is applicable to what is done by a judge, wherever sitting, provided that he is engaged in the exercise of his judicial functions. I do not confine that doctrine to a judge, but I apply it equally to a master of the court. Anyone doing, in the case of a master, what this solicitor has done here, would be guilty of a contempt of the court of which the master is an officer. In this I am confirmed by the judgment of Coleridge, J., in Ex parte Wilton, the true view of that decision being that the learned judge declined, in that particular case, to exercise his jurisdiction. It may be that there is no limit of time or of space in such a matter, provided that there is an interference with the administration of justice. I cannot lay down or define any such limit; but those circumstances must be taken into account in considering whether what happened was mere abuse or an interference with justice. The acts here took place immediately upon the decision of the judge in chambers, and they were intended to place contumely and insult upon what the judge had done, and to interfere with justice. I am not prepared to say whether or not the judge sitting in chambers constituted a court, and could have ordered a committal for the contempt. I am inclined to think not, but I do not decide it; but, assuming that the judge in chambers was not a court, he was acting for the court, and the insult was an insult to the court of which the judge was the representative, and was a contempt of court. The matter was accordingly brought before the court, and the judge sitting in court had power to commit for the contempt, and his order, therefore, is perfectly right. The appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The law has armed courts of record with the power brevi manu of preventing and punishing attempts to interfere with the administration of justice. Upon that ground it is that insults to judges, to witnesses, and to jurors are not permitted. And it is upon that ground that persons engaged in judicial proceedings in courts of justice are protected both in going to and returning from the courts. Has that principle been broken in this case? At the entrance to the building the solicitor insulted, and all but assaulted, if he did not actually assault, the solicitor for the opposite side. Is not that a gross interference with the administration of justice? A discussion has taken place as to whether this was a contempt committed in the face of the court; but in my opinion that question is immaterial, if the conduct is such as amounts to an interference with the administration of justice. The discussion as to the power of a judge at chambers to commit is also irrelevant, as the judge was sitting in court when he made the order of committal, though the offence occurred at chambers. The true principle is that stated by the Master of the Rolls, and laid down by Wilmot, C.J., more than one hundred years ago, in Rex v. Almon, and which has received the sanction of Lord Lyndhurst. This protection which is given to persons attending the judge at chambers will be extended to those attending the officers of the court when exercising their functions as officers of the court, the case of Ex parte Wilton showing that those attending the masters will be equally protected. The judgment of the court below was, therefore, right, and must be affirmed.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

By a bill of sale given as security for an advance the grantor covenanted to repay the principal sum with interest by equal monthly instalments until the whole sum advanced, together with the interest thereon, should be fully paid. The bill of sale was drawn in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and was duly registered. At the same time, and as part of the same transaction, the grantor gave to the grantee a separate promissory note for the same amount as that in respect of which the bill of sale was given, payable by the same instalments at the same dates, with a stipulation that in case of default in payment of any one instalment the whole sum remaining unpaid should become due and payable.

Held, that the promissory note operated as a "defeasance" of the bill of sale, as, in the event of the full amount of the promissory note becoming payable and being paid, the bill of sale would be defeated; and therefore the registration of the bill of sale was void under section 10, sub-section 3, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and the bill of sale was void.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division in favour of the plaintiff.

By a bill of sale, dated the 30th of September, 1885, given by the plaintiff to the defendants as security for the repayment of an advance of £80 and interest thereon at the rate of thirty per cent. per annum, the plaintiff covenanted that he would duly pay the principal sum aforesaid with the interest then due by equal monthly payments of £5 6s. until the whole sum and interest should be fully paid, and that on default in payment of any instalment he would pay interest thereon at the rate aforesaid from the date when such instalment became due until full payment thereof. This bill of sale was duly registered. At the same time the plaintiff gave the defendants a promissory note for the same amount as that in respect of which the bill of sale was given, the amount being made payable by the same instalments at the same dates, with a stipulation that in case of default in payment of any one instalment the whole sum remaining unpaid should become due and payable. This document was not registered.

The defendants having seized and sold certain of the goods under the bill of sale, the plaintiff brought an action against them to recover damages for trespass and conversion, alleging that the bill of sale was void. Denman, J., at the trial, gave judgment for the plaintiff upon the authority of Simpson v. Charing Cross Bank, 34 W. R. 568. The Divisional Court (Mathew and Grantham, JJ.) having refused a new trial, the defendants appealed.

Channell, Q.C., and Melsheimer, for the defendants.—The promissory note was given as collateral security. The two documents are distinct securities, the bill of sale alone affecting the goods. The non-payment of the instalments in the promissory note would not enable the defendants to seize the goods. The Bills of Sale Acts were only intended to deal with securities affecting the chattels assigned. No provision in those Acts touches this case. The note is not a "defeasance" within section 10, sub-section 3, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

They referred to Simpson v. Charing Cross Bank; Ex parte Collins, 23 W. R. 862, L. R. 10 Ch. 367; Ex parte Odell, 27 W. R. 274, 10 Ch. D. 76; Carlon v. Kenealy, 12 M. & W. 139.

Crispe and McIntyre, for the plaintiff.—An additional obligation has been imposed upon the grantor by the promissory note, and so the whole bargain has not been expressed in the bill of sale. No doubt the note does not affect the goods, but it might be indorsed away to a stranger, and still the defendants could seize under the bill of sale.

They referred to Ex parte Southam, 22 W. R. 456, L. R. 17 Eq. 578.

Channell, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

August 11.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the question was as to the validity of a bill of sale. The bill of sale itself purports to be drawn in the scheduled form. If that document stood alone no defect could be alleged in it. But at the same time, and in my opinion as part of the same transaction, the grantee took a promissory note for the same sum as that in respect of which the bill of sale was given. The dates of payment in the two documents were the same, the sums were the same, and both documents had reference to the same loan. Now a bill of sale is the contract between the parties reduced into writing; and the question for us to consider is whether there was one contract or two, whether there was only one transaction or two. That is entirely a question of fact; and considering the identity of the figures, of the terms, and of the dates, I have no doubt that here there was only one contract, though embodied in two documents. One of those documents has been registered. Will the unregistered document, which is part of the same contract, have any effect upon the registered document? If the sum secured by the promissory note were to become payable at once and were paid, whether by discount or otherwise, it would be impossible to suppose that the registered bill of sale could have any further effect at all. The registered bill of sale would be defeated if the promissory note, whether in the hands of the grantee or of anyone else, were paid. The security on the goods would be defeated. Therefore, in my opinion, the case comes within section 10, sub-section 3, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and the promissory note operates as a defeasance of the bill of sale; and as the promissory note is not contained in the same document and registered the bill of sale is bad.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It seems to me that the necessary effect of this promissory note, which is a negotiable instrument, is that the bill of sale would be redeemed by payment of the amount of the note, whether in the hands of the grantee or of a third person. Therefore the bill of sale would be defeated by a document not contained in the registered bill of sale. Section 10, sub-section 3, of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, is applicable, and the appeal must be dismissed.

CRAWFORD v. NEWTON.

Landlord and tenant—Dwelling-house—Tenantable repair.

Under an agreement for a lease for five years of a dwelling-house, the tenant was to leave the house in tenantable repair. In an action by the landlord at the end of the tenancy (which continued for seventeen years) for damages, upon the footing that the tenant was liable to paper and paint and leave the house in the same condition as when he took it,

Held, by Cave, J., that the landlord was not entitled to damages on that footing, but that he was entitled to compensation for waste, the tenant being liable to paint sufficiently to preserve the woodwork, but not to do papering or decorative painting.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that the decision of Cave, J., must be affirmed.

On the 29th of October, 1867, Bond, whose executrix was the defendant in this action, became tenant under an agreement for a lease of a dwelling-house called Burley House, near Leeds, for a term of five years to Croft, whose executors were the plaintiffs. The agreement contained a provision that the lessee should keep the inside of the premises in tenantable repair, and so deliver up the same at the end of the term.

The tenancy was continued upon the terms of the agreement till the 1st of December, 1884, when the tenant gave up the house. The plaintiffs sued for a breach of the provision to deliver up the premises in tenantable repair.

The action was tried before Cave, J., without a jury, at the Leeds Assizes, on the 10th of February, 1886. The evidence showed that the tenant had not painted or papered the house during the tenancy, that parts of the woodwork were worn away or decayed, and that holes were left in the walls from which tenant's fixtures had been removed. The plaintiffs delivered particulars, and claimed upwards of £300.

Forbes, Q.C., and Edge, for the plaintiffs, cited Monk v. Noyes, 1 C. & P. 265.

Waddy, Q.C., and C. M. Atkinson, for the defendant.

The following is the material part of the judgment.

CAVE, J.—This is an action for breach of an agreement to repair. The agreement is a memorandum for the term of five years, by which the lessee undertakes to keep the inside of the house in tenantable repair, and so to deliver it up at the end of the term. Looking at the fact that this was a tenancy for five years, it seems to me impossible to say that the tenant could have been called upon under that lease either to paint or to paper. Ordinarily speaking, paper lasts for seven years, and painting too. This term is only to run for five years. When a tenant is intended to paper and paint, it is usual and proper to put in a covenant that he will paper and paint. Either that he will paper and paint once in so many years, or that he will paper and paint in the seventh, fourteenth, or twenty-first years, or something of that kind. If you put in a covenant that he is to do it once in seven years it is quite possible for him to do it in the first of the last seven years of his term. He then complies with his covenant, and the landlord has to put up new paper and do new painting. The ordinary way of preventing that is by requiring him to paint and paper in the last year, or at the end of the term, whichever you please. Then the landlord gets the benefit of the new paper and the new painting. Otherwise, by any other mode of covenanting, the landlord does not get the benefit of it; because, if the tenant may do it at any time within the seven years, it is not necessary that he should do it in the last. He may do it in the first, second, or third year. In this case there is absolutely no requirement that the tenant should either paper or paint; and, looking at the term which was first stipulated for—five years—it is impossible to conceive that the landlord had a right to either. The tenant is to keep the inside in tenantable repair. It so happened that the occupation lasted longer than five years; but the covenant as to repairing cannot be extended. It must mean the same as it meant before. It does not mean anything in the way of decorative repair at all. That is the first step. Paper is decorative repair. No doubt if a man takes a house which is papered new for him for three years, he must return the house with the paper, not stripped off, or torn off, or anything of that kind, but subject only to the fair wear and tear of the paper. Where he takes a house for a term of years, and there is nothing to do but to keep the inside in tenantable repair, and he remains there so long that the paper, in the natural course of things, becomes useless for a future tenant, he is not bound to put on a new paper, although he may do it if he likes to please himself. It is not one of those things necessary to keep the house in repair. The house is just as much in repair whether it has paper on the walls, or whether it has not. The house is none the less fit for being papered afterwards, none the less fit for being dealt with by the landlord afterwards, if the tenant thinks fit to strip the paper off the walls, and to have the simple walls uncovered by paper at all. In the absence of a covenant that he shall paper and paint, I do not see what is to prevent him doing that, provided his term is not so short a term that it amounts to an absolute destruction of the paper he found there.

The case with regard to the paint is somewhat different, because the object of painting is not solely for decorative purposes. It is not as in the case of plaster. The inside of a house is quite as good, although not so pleasant, and as sound whether it is papered or not. That is not the case with regard to the painting. Painting is partly for decoration, but it is also for the protection of the woodwork. If the tenant does not paint as an ordinary tenant would do, and under those circumstances the woodwork becomes destroyed, or the painting which was on was left in such a condition as to require more than ordinary repair and expense in renewing it, that seems to me to be a defect, and is a want of tenantable repair. If the woodwork is perished, the woodwork ought to be repaired by taking the old pieces out and putting in new pieces and things of that kind. So, again, if it has been so treated as to cause extra expense in painting again, as I have said, that is another thing for which the tenant is liable. So, again, if he has allowed the plaster on the walls to come off, or the boards to decay, or to get broken, or the mantelpieces to get broken, all those are breaches of the agreement to keep in tenantable repair.

Now it appears that this house was in the possession of Mr. Bond for something like seventeen years, and, during that time, undoubtedly, very little was done to it in the way of decorative repair. At the close of his tenancy, or, rather, some little time afterwards, a question arose as to the amount of repairs which ought to be done, and, ultimately, this action is instituted.

Now, when one comes to look at the particulars, it is clear this action is brought on the wrong footing. It is brought upon the footing that there was a covenant to paint, and a covenant to paper at the end of the tenancy. Nothing of the kind is to be found here. It proceeds entirely on that footing, and, consequently, the amount is made up altogether wrong.

Now the evidence given here to-day has taken quite a different turn in consequence of the view I expressed. It is somewhat remarkable that none of the damage, of which evidence has been given to-day, is to be found in the particulars, with the exception simply of the woodwork. To take, for instance, the bedroom. Here is the statement of what is required:—"Ceilings and cornices washed off, prepared, and distempered." That is the ordinary thing that requires to be done when you want to renew your ceiling. There is nothing in that which points to any want of tenantable repair at all. "Walls stripped, stopped, prepared, and papered." All that must be done when you desire, in the ordinary course of things, to take off an old paper and put a new one on. There is nothing there which indicates a want of tenantable repair. "Woodwork prepared and painted, three coats shades." The same remark applies to that. Then comes "Parts stripped and painted, one coat additional." Now that, undoubtedly, does seem to point to some want of repair which renders necessary an additional cost, which otherwise would not have been required, and, when you come to the room over the storeroom, there is this: "Old paint stripped off woodwork where bad." That seems to point to the old paint having been left in a state which caused additional cost and expense But, with the exception of those two items out of the four pages of the particulars, I cannot find any on which the plaintiff is entitled to recover on the principle that I have laid down. Then there comes a further claim in the original particulars, of which further particulars were not required, of £30 5s. 5d., "the cost of replacing damaged venetian blinds"—I have had no evidence of any damage done to any venetian blinds at all—"and making good damaged ornamental ceiling centres." There was no evidence given me of any damage having been done to any ornamental ceilings and centres. Therefore that item of £30 5s. 5d. is entirely unsupported. Then the £34 5s. there are further particulars of, and they are these: "To painting and whitewashing the inside of the conservatory, and also all the stables, coach-house, and outbuildings." There is nothing there that indicates any want of tenantable repair. Then the next item is: "To painting and whitewashing the attics, two upper bedrooms, and staircase to same, and the whole of the basement." There is nothing there which indicates any want of tenantable repair. In fact, except with regard to what I have already referred to as to the condition of the paint, I do not find anything proved here to-day stated at all in the particulars. The ceilings I do not find stated. I have not read all through the particulars, but, as far as I can see, I do not find the letting down of the ceiling stated. I do not find anything said about the decayed and rotten woodwork in the cellar, nor in the butler's pantry and the passages, nor do I find anything about the stalls that were said to have been destroyed in the stables.

That is the general nature of the case. The first point taken was, that there was no liability at all. I cannot adopt that view of the case. It seems to me there was a continuation of the term from year to year, and that consequently the liability, which is a very slight liability be it observed, to keep the house in tenantable repair, did continue, and that Mr. Bond was liable to that much.

Now, that being so, what damages ought I to give? The amount has been variously estimated. The one or two witnesses who were called first gave nothing but general evidence, and could not give any figures at all. On the whole I come to the conclusion that I ought to give a sum of £20. Owing to the fact that the witnesses have not had their attention specifically directed to the matter, I have found a considerable difficulty in coming to that amount. One witness put it at £10 and another as high as £30, and adopting a common course in such cases, and adding a little to one and taking a little from the other, I think £20 represents the sum which I ought to give.

Then comes the question of costs. I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that of that £20 certainly the bulk of it is not included in the particulars. It is not to be found there at all. I have very grave doubts as to whether the plaintiffs are entitled at all to the damage done in the cellar, because the statement there is that the whole of the woodwork is gone. If the whole of the woodwork is gone and decayed, the defendants are not bound to put new woodwork up. The tenant was bound to keep the house in repair. When that can be done by repairing a piece of a door or anything of that sort, he is bound to do it; but when the whole flooring is rotten he is not bound to put in a new flooring, and when the whole of the inside has gone he is not bound to put up a new inside to the house. Probably in a case of this kind the tenant's proper course would be to have taken down all this decayed stuff, and if he did not choose to go to the expense of putting up this woodwork (which appears to have been unnecessary as far as I can gather—you do not want doors to your bins) he could have left the bins without doors. I have not entered into that in detail; I give the plaintiffs credit for what I think they ought to have in respect of that. I have not endeavoured to separate it from the other amounts spoken to by the witnesses, but I have taken it altogether. Looking to the fact that the plaintiffs claim a sum of over £300, and that they have established their right to only £20, and, as to that, half is not to be found in the particulars at all, I think the proper course is to give my judgment for the plaintiffs for £20, without costs.

I am reminded that the plaintiffs would only get county court costs on these findings, but I think they ought not to have any.

The plaintiffs appealed.

July 29, 1886.—Forbes, Q.C., and W. Wills, for the plaintiffs.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This was in effect an action by a landlord against his tenant for breach of an agreement to deliver up the house in tenantable repair. The case put forward at the trial was that under that provision the landlord was entitled to have the house papered and painted in such a way that it should be left in the same condition as when it was let, and that the damages were to be assessed on that footing. In this particular case the learned judge came to the conclusion upon the facts that the plaintiffs were not entitled to that extent. He came to the conclusion that where any waste had been committed the plaintiffs would be entitled to compensation for that. The learned judge found that some paint would be necessary to prevent the house from going to decay, and he held the defendant bound to paint to that extent, any further painting being decorative painting. So as to the paper. The question before us is whether the judge ought to have gone further and allowed the cost of painting and papering the house in all cases where it had been previously painted and papered. If we could determine the proper meaning of the agreement it would be very desirable; but upon the argument it is not necessary to do so. It seems to me to be sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that we cannot disagree with the finding of the learned judge that the defendant is not bound to do this decorative painting and papering, which are only required for the purposes of mere ornamentation. It is not necessary, therefore, to say what is the meaning of the words "tenantable repair."

The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

JOHNSTON v. SALVAGE ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Practice—Ord. 16, r. 48—Contract to indemnify—Policy of marine insurance—Suing and labouring clause.

The usual suing and labouring clause in a policy of marine insurance does not amount to a contract by the underwriters to indemnify the shipowner in respect of contracts made by him for the purpose of attempting to save the ship.

Therefore, where an action was brought against the shipowner for work done under such a contract,

Held, that the defendant was not entitled to bring in the underwriters as third parties under ord. 16, r. 48.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and A. L. Smith, J.).

The action was brought first against the Salvage Association alone for work done, services rendered, and expenses incurred by the plaintiffs for the defendants at their request in respect of attempting to save the ship Maggie Robertson and her cargo, but the plaintiffs afterwards obtained an order joining McKiver as a defendant.

The defendant McKiver was the owner of the ship which was chartered to carry a cargo to South America, and was insured by several policies of insurance containing the usual suing and labouring clause. During the voyage the ship became a total loss, and before this action was brought the underwriters had paid McKiver as for a total loss.

Upon being made a defendant, McKiver obtained at chambers an order giving him leave to serve the underwriters with a third party notice under ord. 16, r. 48, claiming to be indemnified by them under the policies of insurance against any liability in respect of any moneys the plaintiffs might recover against him in the action.

The Divisional Court rescinded this order, and McKiver appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 9.—LINDLEY, L.J. (after stating the nature of the action).—The claim of the plaintiffs, Johnston & Co., against McKiver is twofold—viz., (1) for work and labour and expenses done and incurred by the plaintiffs for the defendant at his request; (2) for damages for misrepresentation, or breach of warranty, by the defendant of his authority to act for other people in employing the plaintiffs to do what they did.

The work and labour and the expenses sued for were done and incurred by the plaintiffs in saving, or attempting to save, a ship and cargo. The ship was insured by the defendant with the persons sought to be introduced as third parties. The misrepresentation alleged is as to McKiver's authority to employ the plaintiffs for the underwriters.

The ship was totally lost, and was abandoned to the underwriters, and they long since paid McKiver as for a total loss. His claim against them now is based on the suing and labouring clauses in the policies, and is resisted by the underwriters.

The nature and effect of the suing and labouring clause are fully explained in Kidston v. Empire Marine Insurance Co., 15 W. R. 63, L. R. 1 C. P. 535, 2 Ibid. 357, and Lohre v. Aitchison, 28 W. R. 1, 4 App. Cas. 755. It is, in substance, a contract by which the underwriter agrees to pay the assured the expense he may reasonably and properly incur in preventing a loss which, if it occurred, would fall on the underwriter under the other clauses in the policy. Such a contract is not a contract of indemnity in any proper sense; it is a contract to pay the assured expenses which he may incur, but not to indemnify him against any claims made by other people against him.

In equity a contract to indemnify can be specifically enforced before there has been any such breach of the contract as would sustain an action at law. In equity the plaintiff need not pay and perhaps ruin himself before seeking relief. He is entitled to be relieved from liability. But in this case McKiver would have no locus standi in equity against the underwriters if he were to seek specific performance of a contract to indemnify him against Johnston & Co.'s demand. Assuming, therefore, that the underwriters are liable to pay McKiver for services and expenses under the suing and labouring clause, and assuming that these services and expenses are included in those in respect of which Johnston is suing McKiver, I am of opinion that this case is not within ord. 16, r. 48, and that the underwriters cannot be brought in as third parties under that rule. The effect of the rule was fully considered by the Court of Appeal in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., and the court there laid down that the rule only applies to cases where the third party was under some obligation, by contract or otherwise, to indemnify the defendant against the demand of the plaintiff. This construction is, in my opinion, warranted by the history of the rule, by its language, and by the forms referred to in it. Whatever obligation the underwriters may be under to McKiver, they are under no obligation to indemnify him against the claims of the plaintiffs, or any of them, or any part thereof.

There is clearly no obligation on the part of the underwriters to indemnify McKiver against the consequences of any representations he may have made as to his authority to employ the plaintiffs on their behalf or on behalf of any other person.

The appeal ought to be dismissed.

The Master of the Rolls agrees on the ground that the suing and labouring clause does not apply.

LOPES, L.J.—This case raises the question as to what is the meaning and scope of ord. 16, r. 48. Does it apply to cases other than those when the third party has contracted to indemnify the defendant against a claim made by the plaintiff? Under the old rules, before the recent amendment, the defendant had a much larger power than under the present rule to bring in third parties against whom he might claim some relief or remedy over.

The present rule was intended to curtail the old rule. Under the present rule the defendant must make out a primâ facie case showing that he is entitled to contribution or indemnity against the third party. The defendant here is not entitled to contribution. He must therefore make out a primâ facie case that he is entitled to indemnity. I am of opinion that he does not make out such a case. I agree with what was laid down in the case of Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co.—viz., that, to bring a case within the rule, there must be a direct right to indemnity as such; a right which can be enforced either at law or in equity.

Lindley, L.J., has fully stated the nature of the claim of the plaintiff against the defendants and the other facts of the case which are material. It seems to me that, whatever may be the liability of the underwriters to McKiver, the underwriters are in no way bound, either at law or in equity, to indemnify him against the claim of the plaintiff in this action or any part of it. There is no contract by them, either express or implied, to undertake such a liability. This case is covered by the case I have cited, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

The company was incorporated in 1877 with a nominal capital of £25,000 in 2,500 shares of £10 each. Article 15 of the articles of association empowered the directors from time to time to issue such portion of the capital as should not have been subscribed for and allotted, with such special privileges with reference to preferential, guaranteed, fixed, fluctuating, redeemable, or other dividend or interest, or otherwise, as should from time to time be determined by a general meeting.

At a general meeting of the company held on the 8th of February, 1881, a resolution was passed authorizing the directors to issue part of the nominal capital of the company in the form of 750 five per cent. preference shares of £10 each, every existing shareholder to be entitled to one such share at twenty-five per cent. discount for each ordinary share held by him. In pursuance of that resolution several of the original shareholders applied for preference shares, and the same were allotted to them at the twenty-five per cent. discount, £7 10s. being paid by the allottees on each share. To each allottee was handed a certificate declaring him to be the holder of so many "preference shares of £10 fully paid up." No agreement for the issue of shares at a discount was registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

On the 9th of May, 1885, an order was made for the compulsory winding up of the company. Eventually the ordinary shareholders who held preference shares were settled on the list of contributories in respect of such preference shares, and on the 20th of May, 1887, an order was made on the preference shareholders for a call of £2 10s. per share, being the balance unpaid in respect of each £10 preference share.

This was a summons by certain of the preference shareholders for leave to prove in the winding up against the company in damages to the amount of the call "for alleged breach of contract, or otherwise, in relation to the issue of the preference shares."

Farwell, in support of the summons, relied on Mudford's claim, 28 W. R. 670, 14 Ch. D. 634, and Ex parte Appleyard, 30 W. R. 147, 18 Ch. D. 587.

Marten, Q.C., and F. B. Palmer, for the liquidator.—This claim is made by the applicants in their capacity of shareholders, and by the Companies Act, 1862, s. 38 (7), any sum due to a shareholder "in his character of a member by way of dividends, profits, or otherwise," is to be postponed to the claims of the creditors. This has been held to include debts to members for advances (Grissell's case, 14 W. R. 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. 528) and fees to directors (In re Leicester Club and County Race Course Co., Ex parte Cannon, 34 W. R. 14, 30 Ch. D. 629). A contract to take shares cannot be rescinded after a winding up has commenced (Oakes v. Turquand, L. R. 2 H. L. 325, 16 W. R. H. L. Dig. 15; Burgess's case, 28 W. R. 792, 15 Ch. D. 507); and if the shares are retained there is no right to sue the company for damages in respect of their issue: Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, 28 W. R. 677, 5 App. Cas. 317. Therefore, owing to the failure to register under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, the shares are held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash. Moreover, the want of registration makes the issue of the shares at a discount ultrâ vires and void (In re Ince Hall Rolling Mills Co., 30 W. R. 945, 23 Ch. D. 545 n.), and a claim against a company founded on an ultrâ vires act cannot be sustained: Trevor v. Whitworth, 12 App. Cas. 409. This distinguishes the present claim from those in Mudford's case and Ex parte Appleyard, where good consideration was given for the issue of the shares. In such a case the proof for damages is made, not for the value of the shares, but for the price of the consideration given, which, owing to the failure to register, has not been paid by the company.

Farwell, in reply.—The failure by the company to register the contract would have entitled the applicants to repudiate the shares, so he does not stand in the position of a shareholder. [Kay, J., referred to Gompertz v. Bartlett, 2 W. R. 43, 2 El. & Bl. 849, and Kennedy v. Panama, &c., Mail Co., 15 W. R. 1039, L. R. 2 Q. B., at p. 587.] The claim is for a breach of contract, the damage for which is not within section 38 (7). [Kay, J.—Such damages are not payable out of the assets in competition with the company's debts and liabilities, per Lord Cairns, C., in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank.] That case can be distinguished, for the claim there went to the root of the contract with the company, here it rests on the collateral undertaking to make the shares fully paid up by registering the contract. The applicants do not seek to impeach the contract itself. The court will follow the decisions in Mudford's claim and Ex parte Appleyard, which are supported by the reasoning in White's case, 27 W. R. 895, 12 Ch. D. 511.

Marten replied on the cases.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 9.—Kay, J.—In the year 1881 this company issued to the present applicants fully paid-up preference shares of the nominal value of £10 each in consideration of the payment of £7 10s. per share. No contract was filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies as required by section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. On the 9th of May, 1885, an order was made to wind up the company, and the applicants have been placed on the list of contributories, and calls have been made on them for the amount of £2 10s. unpaid on each share. It is not denied that they are liable to these calls. They have taken out the present summons asking for leave to prove against the company in damages "for breach of contract, or otherwise," in relation to the issue of these shares, suggesting that the measure of such damages would be the £2 10s. per share which they have been so made to pay. Of course, it is too late to assert any remedy by way of rescission of the contract; but I will assume for the present that the applicants might elect to retain the shares and sue the company for damages. The question, then, is whether they can prove for such damages in competition with any other creditor not being a member of the company; or whether the case comes within section 38, sub-section 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, which is in these terms:—"No sum due to any member of a company, in his character of a member, by way of dividends, profits, or otherwise, shall be deemed to be a debt of the company, payable to such member in a case of competition between himself and any other creditor not being a member of the company; but any such sum may be taken into account, for the purpose of the final adjustment of the rights of the contributories among themselves."

Now, unquestionably the applicants—retaining these shares and claiming damages because the shares are not exactly what they were represented to be—are making such claims in the character of members of the company, and the only question is whether such claims are for sums due "by way of dividends, profits, or otherwise." To determine that it is necessary to consider the scope and intent of this provision in the statute. The obvious analogy is the case of a partner attempting to prove in bankruptcy in competition with the creditors of the firm. But whether this section is intended to have entirely the same effect or not, it is quite clear from the language of it that a debt due to a member in that character, such as for dividends, directors' fees, or the like, could not be so proved.

Now, is the mischief against which it is intended to provide the same in the case before me? Practically, what these applicants are seeking to recover by their proof is a dividend in respect of the £2 10s. per share which they have been compelled to pay in the winding up. But as shareholders they have contracted that they will pay this money, and that it shall be first applied in payment of the creditors whose debts are not due to them as members of the company—that is, they are practically admitting their liability to pay the £2 10s. per share to such other creditors, and yet seeking to get part of it back out of the pockets of those very creditors themselves. I confess it seems to me that the money so claimed is not only claimed in the character of members, but that the claim is just as unreasonable as if it were a claim of dividends or profits, and that, accordingly, it comes within the words "or otherwise" which I have read from section 38. So much for the principle.

The authorities are these. In Mudford's case Hall, V.C., decided that similar shares taken in satisfaction by a creditor of the company gave him a right of proof for the amount of the calls paid by reason of the company's breach of contract in not giving him paid-up shares. The question whether he could prove in competition with other creditors does not seem to have been argued. In Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank it was held that damages for fraudulent misrepresentation of the director inducing the plaintiff to take shares might give him a right to rescind the contract, but gave him no right whatever to hold the shares and prove for damages against the company. That case was called to the attention of Hall, V.C., in Ex parte Appleyard, in which the circumstances were the same as in Mudford's case, and he distinguished it as being a case of contract, and followed his own previous decision by holding that in the case before him there was a right of proof; but he does not say a word upon the point which seems to have been suggested in the argument, that such proof should not be in competition with other creditors. He refers to certain dicta in White's case, where the contract being for payment to a creditor of the company in fully paid-up shares, it was held that the creditor had no money demand against the company, and that the shares not having been, in fact, fully paid up, he was bound to pay calls upon them without prejudice to the question whether he was entitled to damages against the company. But there, again, I do not find any suggestion that he would be entitled to prove for such damages in competition with other creditors. In the two cases before Hall, V.C., the shares were given in satisfaction of bonâ fide claims against the company, so that, if they were not fully paid up, it might be said the holders of them should be remitted to their original position of creditors. I do not know how far this may have influenced the decisions. In the present case there is no such fact. The applicants, not being at the time creditors of the company, simply paid £7 10s. for £10 shares. No consideration was given for the remission of the £2 10s. per share which was not paid. I therefore hold that if these shareholders can claim damages at all, that claim cannot be made in competition with creditors in the winding up whose debts are not due to them in the character of shareholders.

But is it the law that this claim for damages could be supported if the company were not being wound up? If it could, the consequence would be that the company would receive, and must then return, in the shape of damages, £2 10s. a share in respect of these so-called paid-up shares. That would practically render nugatory section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. A solvent company might issue shares, nominally paid up, at a discount and omit to register the contract, and take with on hand and repay with the other the discount on eac share, and if the applicants' argument is sound no on could interfere. But suppose the company insolvent and that the other shares were bonâ fide paid up, an that the creditors, who had a right to treat these share as not paid up, had no other property to look to exceg the unpaid calls upon them, could it be said that th case was not touched by the statute? The decisions i favour of such a claim as that to which I have referre proceed upon the ground of a supposed breach of co tract by the company. But if the shareholder elect to keep the shares, how can there be any such breach of contract? An action against a solvent company would proceed upon the election of the shareholder to retain his shares. Would not the answer to such an action be —"Your only remedy is rescission; you cannot approbate and reprobate; you cannot be heard to say, 'I am a shareholder who has contracted to pay £2 10s. a share when called on'—which is the effect of approbating the contract—'but I ask to recover that amount from the company as damages because I did not so contract.' That would be reprobating the contract."

The truth is—as was said by Lord Cairns in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank—that a share taken from a company is not like an ordinary chattel, in respect of which the purchaser may have a choice of remedies. By accepting such a share the allottee merges himself in a society, and contracts to pay calls when made. Much of the reasoning of the learned lords in that case applies very closely to this. Here, as there, the shareholder "is making a claim which is inconsistent with the contract into which he has entered, and by which he wishes to abide" (p. 325). The loss against which he seeks to be indemnified is in effect what he has contracted to contribute to the debts and liabilities of the company. He seeks to throw this amount on the other shareholders. He is "trying to reconcile two inconsistent positions—namely, that of shareholder and that of creditor of the whole body of shareholders including himself" (p. 333). My opinion is that he could not maintain an action for such damages against the company if it were not being wound up, and that he cannot maintain such a claim as this in the winding-up, either against other creditors, or shareholders, or the company. I assume throughout that the company had power to issue fully paid-up shares at a discount if they had duly registered an agreement with each allottee of such shares. The application must be refused, with costs.

Adjourned summons.

In the year 1886 certain freehold property, consisting of four houses situate in Grey Friars-street, Northampton, was advertised for sale by public auction by order of the mortgagee. The property was sold in two lots for £420 and £380 respectively. The auctioneer was paid a commission by the vendor. The vendor's solicitor, Mr. John Faulkner, delivered his bill of costs, his charges amounting to £66 11s. 6d. In this bill he charged the sums of £6 15s. and £6 respectively for "deducing title," &c., these sums being the amount of the scale fees as prescribed by part 1 of schedule 1 to the General Order of August, 1882, under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881. He also charged £13 6s. in respect of certain charges paid to the auctioneer. He also made separate charges in accordance with the old system for drawing the particulars and conditions of sale and the abstract of title, for attendances on the auctioneer, for attending the sale, &c. The mortgagor, being dissatisfied with the bill, obtained an order to tax it.

The taxing master allowed the two scale fees and the payment to the auctioneer, but he disallowed all the other items in the lump without going into the propriety of each particular item.

In answer to objections carried in by Mr. Faulkner, the taxing master said:—"The solicitor objects to the disallowance of these items, because they are not included in those words for which the ad valorem scale charge is expressed to be given in part 1 of schedule 1. It is a fact that they, or nearly all of them, are not included in those words taken alone, but it is admitted that all the charges the disallowance of which is objected to are connected with the sale. I have disallowed these items and overruled the objections on the authority of In re Emanuel and Simmonds, 34 W. R. 613, 33 Ch. D. 40. The question for the decision of the court is whether the principle decided in that case with respect to a lease applies to a sale. It was decided in that case that, having regard to clause 2 of the order, the scale charge, though expressed to be for 'preparing, settling, and completing leases,' covers all business connected with the lease. I consider it necessarily follows that the scale charges expressed to be for 'conducting a sale' and for 'deducing title, &c.,' or the latter only, if the former is not applicable, cover all business connected with the sale."

This was a summons by Mr. Faulkner to review the taxation.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Shebbeare, for the summons—In re Emanuel and Simmonds was the case of a lease, it does not apply to cases of vendor and purchaser. In re Field, 33 W. R. 553, 29 Ch. D. 608, was also a case of a lease. In respect of matters done prior and leading up to a sale, the solicitor is entitled on a quantum meruit.

They referred to In re Wilson, 29 Ch. D. 790, 34 W. R. Dig. 185, and In re Sykes, 56 L. J. Ch. 238, 35 W. R. Dig. 179.

McSwinney, contrâ.—The object of the rules is to limit the remuneration of solicitors. The present point was not decided in In re Wilson. In the present case the auctioneer was paid by the client, and the solicitor, therefore, is not entitled to the scale fee.

North, J.—In this case certain property has been sold, and upon the taxation of the bill of costs of the vendor's solicitor the taxing master has taken a particular view which is now the subject of consideration before me. The Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, with the orders and schedules to it, lay down certain rules as to the costs to be allowed to solicitors under certain circumstances. In schedule 1, part 1, a scale of charges is provided for in cases of sales, purchases, and mortgages. Before referring to the schedules, perhaps I should refer to the second of the General Orders, which is (subject to an exception not material for this purpose) as follows:—"The remuneration of a solicitor in respect of business connected with sales, purchases, leases, mortgages, settlements, and other matters of conveyancing, and in respect of other business, not being business in any action, or transacted in any court or in the chambers of any judge or master, is to be regulated as follows—namely," and then come three heads—(a), (b), and (c). Head (a) provides for the fees in respect of sales, purchases, and mortgages completed; head (b) provides for fees in respect of leases and agreements for leases of the kind mentioned in part 2 of schedule 1 to this order. Now head (a) has provided for the remuneration being in accordance with part 1 of schedule 1. In respect of business that comes under head (b) the remuneration is provided by part 2 of schedule 1; and then comes head (c), which provides for business not hereinbefore provided for, and deals with a good many matters which I need not read through in detail, and at the end it says this:—"And all other business the remuneration for which is not hereinbefore or in schedule 1 hereto prescribed, the remuneration is to be regulated according to the present system as altered by schedule 2 hereto."

Then we come to schedule 1, part 1. The first sum allowed is in respect of the vendor's solicitor negotiating a sale by private contract. That does not apply to the present case. The next is this: "Vendor's solicitor, for conducting a sale of property by public auction, including the conditions of sale." Then the next head is: "Vendor's solicitor, for deducing title to freehold, copyhold, or leasehold property, and perusing and completing conveyance." Therefore, in the case of properties sold by public auction there are two things provided for—a scale fee for "conducting," whatever that means, and a scale fee for "deducing title and perusing and completing conveyance." Now, in the present case the solicitor did deduce the title and peruse and complete the conveyance, and the scale fee has been allowed in respect of that, but he also makes a claim in respect of work done not included in deducing title or perusing and completing conveyance. Now, reading the second head, of conducting a sale of property by public auction, and looking at the fourth of the General Orders, which provides that the remuneration prescribed by schedule 1 is not to include auctioneer's charges; looking at those two alone I should have come to the conclusion that the auctioneer, if employed, was to be paid, and that, in addition, the solicitor was to be paid a charge for conducting the sale of property by public auction, but there are certain rules at the end of part 1 of schedule 1, the 11th of which begins in this way:—"The scale for conducting a sale by auction shall apply only in cases where no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer." That is not the present case. A commission to the auctioneer was paid by the client, and therefore this scale fee for conducting is not to apply. Supposing that the auctioneer had been employed and had not been paid by the client but paid by the solicitor, then it is quite clear on the rule that this exception in rule 11 does not apply, and that the scale fee for conducting the sale would properly be paid. That seems clear from the language of the rule, and also the precise point is put by Cotton, L.J., in In re Wilson, where he says: "The property may have been in such a state that the solicitor could not do all things that were necessary for the sale, but in such a case, if he claims the ad valorem remuneration, he must get them done by a person paid by himself. As these things have been done at the expense of the estate I am of opinion that the solicitor cannot claim remuneration according to the scale. The Act and rules were not intended to give the solicitor remuneration according to the scale where he does not do the whole of the work for which the remuneration is provided, but somebody else does and is paid by the client for part of that work."

In the present case, therefore, there is certain work for which the solicitor would be entitled to be paid for conducting the sale if he also had himself paid the auctioneer. Some such work has been done. I am not now dealing with the particular items. If there is no such work done, the taxing master will not allow the charges, but I think it clear there is some such work done, and, therefore, I am dealing with the matter on that footing. The question, then, is, the solicitor having done certain work for which, if he had paid the auctioneer himself, he clearly would be entitled to receive the scale fee, is he not to be paid for that work at all because the auctioneer has been paid by the client? I think that case is not provided for by this rule, and that the scale fee for conducting does not apply, because the auctioneer has been paid by the client, but that leaves the solicitor entitled to remuneration for doing such parts of the work of conducting the sale as the auctioneer has not been paid for. If all that the solicitor has done was auctioneer's work, then there is nothing for which he can be paid; but if there is anything done by him which is not auctioneer's work, but which is expense of conducting the sale, it seems to me, as to those items, he ought to receive payment. The contention is that, because he did not do the auctioneer's work himself, or pay the auctioneer who did it out of his own pocket, he is not to have any remuneration for the work, inasmuch as the scale only provides for a person being paid who does the work, and that, if not paid for the whole, he cannot be paid for any part, but that seems to me inconsistent with the view that has been taken of the scale fee for deducing title, because it has been held that a solicitor cannot be paid the scale fee for deducing title, unless he does all the work of deducing the title, and perusing and completing the conveyance. Now, if Mr. MacSwinney's argument was good as to the scale fee for conducting the sale, it seems to me it would follow that, unless the solicitor did all the work in connection with deducing the title, and so earned the scale fee he ought not to be paid anything at all. But that is directly contrary to the decisions that have been come to in the cases relating to the fee for "deducing title"; because where the solicitor has done part of the work coming under the scale fee for deducing title, but not the whole, he is not allowed the scale fee, but he is allowed the fee for the work which he has done. It seems to me, therefore, that the cases that have applied that construction to the scale fee for deducing title are authorities for saying that the same rule must be applied to the fee for conducting the sale when the whole of the work contemplated by that clause has not been done by the solicitor—namely, when an auctioneer has been employed at the client's expense. It seems to me, therefore, that the construction put by the courts upon the fee for "deducing title" applies to the fee for conducting the sale, and that, under these circumstances, the taxing master has made a mistake in the view which he has taken in holding that the cases relating to leases relate also to the cases of vendor and purchaser.

I should say this, further, that in the case of In re Wilson the precise point was raised before the taxing master, and particular fees were allowed by him. The opinion of the Court of Appeal does not touch the point. It was not before them for decision, but they do not seem to have made any comment upon the propriety of the allowance of those fees.

In that case some of the ordinary charges were allowed for work which had been done, and so it was, apparently, in the case of In re Sykes. Those cases show that the practice in the taxing master's office has been, where the scale fee for conducting is not allowed, to allow such charges outside the scale fee as are made in respect of work properly done. That seems to me to be the right rule, and the cases upon the second part of the schedule do not seem to me to affect the present case. The matter must, therefore, go back to the taxing master with the intimation of my opinion that he is not precluded by the decision referred to in his reasons from allowing such of the charges disallowed by him as are proper to be allowed.

Solicitors—Costs—Sale by auction—Commission to auctioneer paid by client—Scale fee for conducting sale—Charge for solicitors' work not included in fee for deducing title—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44)—General Order, 1882, ord. 4, and schedule 1, part 1, r. 11.

Solicitors employed in a sale of property by auction where the auctioneer's commission was paid by the client delivered a bill in which they charged the scale fee for conducting the sale and deducing the title, and mentioned items of solicitors' work not included in the scale fee for deducing the title. The taxing master disallowed the fee for conducting the sale because of the auctioneer's charge being paid by the client, and did not allow any fee for items mentioned in the bill of solicitors' work not included in the scale fee for deducing the title, on the ground that the bill was made up on a wrong footing and could not be altered by adding charges.

Held, that the taxing master was right in disallowing the scale fee for conducting the sale, but that he ought to have allowed the solicitors a quantum meruit for solicitors' work done by them and mentioned in their bill, and which was not covered by the scale fee for deducing the title.

Adjourned summons.

Messrs. Peace & Ellis, solicitors, of Wigan, having been employed to carry out the sale of certain property, which was sold by auction in three lots, delivered a bill of costs as follows :—

"Fee on preparing advertisement for sale of property situate in Isce, Upholland, and Standish, in respect of which you were mortgagee, inserting advertisement in papers, preparing conditions of sale, deducing title thereto, and completing conveyances thereof, as follows:—

"Lot 1 to Mr. Thos. Baldwin, purchase-money £320 .	£10 5 0
Lot 2 Mr. Thos. Latham, purchase-money £127 .	10 0 0
Lot 3 to Mr. Harry Mitchell, purchase-money £535 .	13 15 0
		£34 0 0
"Disbursements.
"Printer's charges . .	£2 0 0
Bill poster . . .	2 0 0
Advertising, Wigan Examiner . . .	4 14 0
" Wigan Observer .	5 0 0
Auctioneer's charges . .	10 1 0
Hotel bill	2 16 0
	£26 11 0	£34 0 0
		£60 11 0"

The auctioneer's charge of £10 1s. was made up of a fee of £3 3s. for each lot, and 12s. for expenses out of pocket.

This bill was taxed and the taxing master made the following disallowances: In respect of Lot 1, £5; in respect of Lot 2, £5; and in respect of Lot 3, £5 10s. making in the whole £15 10s., which reduced the amount of the bill as delivered to £45 1s.

Messrs. Peace & Ellis objected to the disallowances for the reason that such charges were properly incurred and were allowable under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, in addition to the amounts allowed by the taxing master.

The taxing master's answer to the objections was as follows: "In this case an auctioneer was employed who negotiated the sales and was paid (by the client) his usual commision. The solicitors are therefore not entitled to charge negotiation fees but only the fees for contract, deducing title, and completing. This being a taxation under the Solicitors Act, I have no power to amend the bill, which otherwise I should have done by allowing the solicitors three guineas for their trouble in instructing the auctioneer and any other labour not covered by the scale fees allowed."

This was a summons by Messrs. Peace & Ellis for a review of the taxation.

Order 4 of the Solicitors' Remuneration Order, August, 1882, provides that "The remuneration prescribed by schedule 1 to this order is not to include stamps, counsel's fees, auctioneer's or valuer's charges, travelling or hotel expenses, fees paid on searches to public officers, on registrations, or to stewards of manors, costs of extracts from any register, record, or roll, or other disbursement reasonably and properly paid, nor any extra work occasioned by changes occurring in the course of any business, such as the death or insolvency of a party to the transaction, nor is it to include any business of a contentious character, nor any proceedings in any court, but it shall include law stationer's charges, and allowances for time of the solicitor and his clerks, and for copying and parchment and all other similar disbursements."

Rule 11, schedule 1, part 1, of the order provides that "The scale for conducting a sale by auction shall apply only in cases where no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer. The scale for negotiating shall apply to cases where the solicitor of a vendor or purchaser arranges the sale or purchase and the price and terms and conditions therof, and no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer, or estate or other agent. . . ."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the summons.—The disallowances ought not to have been made. The auctioneer's charge of £10 1s. is not a commission paid to him by the client under rule 11 so as to disentitle the solicitors to the fee for conducting the sale, but is a charge under order 4. At any rate, the solicitors ought to have been allowed some remuneration under schedule 2 of the Solicitors' Remuneration Order for work done by them and specified in their bill and not covered by the auctioneer's charge.

They referred to In re Wilson, 29 Ch. D. 790, 34 W. R. Dig. 185.

Everitt, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, contrà.—The taxing master was right in making the disallowance. The auctioneer's charge of £10 1s. is a commission under rule 11 and disentitles the solicitors to the fee for conducting the sale. It is too late now to contend that the solicitors ought to have been allowed a quantum meruit for work done by them and not covered by the auctioneer's charge. They cannot add items to their bill.

They referred to In re Faulkner, ante, p. 59; In re Wilson.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—The solicitors cannot add items to their bill, but they ask for taxation on a proper footing. A bill framed on an erroneous footing can be taxed on a proper footing: In re Lacey, 32 W. R. 233, 25 Ch. D. 301.

North, J.—In this case solicitors who acted for a mortgagee in selling the mortgaged property by auction in three lots, send in a bill charging £34 for, in the words of part F. of the schedule to the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, "conducting the sale" and "deducing title, and perusing and completing conveyance." The taxing master allowed the fee for deducing the title, but not the fee for conducting the sale. He therefore divided the sum charged for each lot into two portions, and disallowed one of such portions. It is objected that the three sums for the three lots, amounting in the whole to £34, ought all to be allowed. The solicitors performed a certain part of the business of conducting the sale, but they employed an auctioneer, paid his charges amounting to £10 1s., and charged them in their bill. Rule 11 of part 1, schedule 1, of the Solicitors' Remuneration Order, August, 1882, provides that the scale for conducting a sale by auction only applies when no commission is paid by the client to the auctioneer. In my opinion that rule applies to this case. It is argued that that rule is restricted by order 4, which provides that:—[His lordship read order 4 as set out above, and proceeded:—] and that the auctioneer's charge of £10 1s. is not a commission under rule 11, but a charge under order 4. But in my opinion it is commission under rule 11, and not a charge under order 4. It would be curious if the solicitors' remuneration were to depend upon whether the auctioneer is paid a fixed charge or a commission. The taxing master, who was told what the £10 1s. was made up of, says:—[His lordship read the answer of the taxing master as set out above, and continued:—] I cannot say that this a charge under order 4, so this is a case in which the scale does not apply. The point was not decided in the case of In re Wilson, but the opinions of the Lords Justices seem to tend in the direction of the view I take.

But certain work has been done by the solicitors for which they have not been paid, but ought to be paid. They are not entitled to be paid separately for preparing conditions of sale, because that is included in the scale fee for deducing title. But they have charged for preparing the advertisement for sale. It seems to me that preparing the advertisement is the solicitors' business, and is not covered by the scale fee and therefore they ought to be paid something for it. If anything has been done by them which is not the auctioneer's business they ought to be paid for it. There is, however, this difficulty. The solicitors have sent in their bill, and it said they cannot alter their bill by making fresh charges. The taxing master has taken that view. [His lordship read the latter part of the answer of the taxing master as set out above, and continued:—] The solicitors have sent in a bill in which they have charged wrongly. But that does not prevent the taxing master from allowing them the right charges for items mentioned in the bill. The taxing master evidently thought that there were some items the solicitors ought to have been paid for, but which he could not allow. It seems to me that he ought to have allowed them. But he could not allow a charge for anything the solicitor did which is included in the scale fee. The case of In re Faulkner, where the solicitor did not charge for conducting the sale, differs from this case. I see that in the case of In re Sykes, 56 L. J. Ch. 230, 35 W. R. Dig. 193, before Chitty, J., ten guineas were allowed for work not included in the scale fee. The case of In re Lacey would assist me if any assistance were wanted, but I do not think any authority is necessary to support the view that there was nothing to prevent the taxing master from allowing a proper sum for items of solicitor's work charged in the bill and not included in the scale fee. The taxing master was right in disallowing the scale fee for conducting the sale, but he ought to have allowed a fee for work done by the solicitors outside the scale fee which was solicitor's and not auctioneer's work. I must refer the matter back to the taxing master to reconsider the taxation.

Costs—Recovery of less than £20—County Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), s. 5—Ord. 65, r. 12.

The plaintiffs in an action having recovered the sum of £3, an order was made by a judge at chambers that the plaintiffs do recover their costs against the defendant, to be taxed upon the county court scale B.

Held, that such order was bad.

Appeal from an order of Kekewich, J., as to costs.

The action was brought in the Sheffield District Registry of the Hight Court of Justice to recover a sum for rent of a house which the defendant held of the plaintiffs, and also for an account of rents which the defendant had collected for the plaintiffs as their agent.

An order having been made for an account, and the defendant having set up a counter-claim, the district registrar issued a certificate the effect of which was that he found that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover £3 from the defendant.

The defendant paid into court the sum of £3, which was paid out to the plaintiffs, who then applied to the defendant for their costs of the action, which amounted to £56.

The defendant refusing to pay, the plaintiffs applied at chambers for an order for their costs, when Kekewich, J., made an order that the plaintiffs do recover their costs of the action against the defendant, to be taxed by the Sheffield District Registrar upon the county court scale B.

From that order the defendant appealed.

T. W. Chitty, for the defendant.—By virtue of section 5 of the County Courts Act, 1867, the plaintiffs, having recovered a sum not exceeding twenty pounds, are not entitled to any costs at all, unless the court or a judge by rule or order allow costs. If any such order were made they would be entitled to costs on the High Court scale; but here Kekewich, J., expressly refused to allow the plaintiffs costs on the High Court scale. The effect of section 5 and ord. 65, r. 12, read together, is that where the plaintiff recovers between £50 and £20, he is only entitled to costs on the county court scale, but where he recovers less than £20 he is not entitled to any costs unless in either case an order is made giving him costs on the High Court scale. Therefore ord. 65, r. 12 is not applicable to the present case, and the learned judge had no power to make an order under that rule. Otherwise the rule would repeal section 5 of the County Courts Act.

Morton Daniel, for the plaintiffs.—The judge had an absolute discretion, whether he acted under section 5 of the Act or under ord. 65, r. 12. In either case the plaintiff is only to be disallowed costs unless the judge otherwise orders. Here the judge did otherwise order. [Charles, J., referred to Calvert v. Davison, W. N. 1884, p. 18, a case decided at chambers. Stephen,

(a.) Reported by F. G. Rucker, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

—Surely ord. 65, r. 12, must be read together with section 5, and must therefore be limited to cases where the plaintiff recovers a sum not exceeding £50, but exceeding £20.]

The Court (Stephen and Charles, JJ.) held that the order of Kekewich, J., was bad, and allowed the appeal, without prejudice to the plaintiffs' right to apply to a judge for costs on the High Court scale.

Appeal allowed.

Lewis v. Lewis. (a.)

County court—Remitted action—Claim reduced by admission—19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 26.

A plaintiff claimed for £220. The defendant denied the claim in toto, and counter-claimed for £203. The plaintiff admitted the counter-claim, and applied to a judge at chambers for the remittal of the cause to the county court under section 26 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, as for a claim not exceeding £17. The case was so remitted by the judge.

Held, that the judge was right in remitting the action, inasmuch as the amount in dispute did not exceed £50, and that the fact that the defendant "counter-claimed" for the amount due to him did not prevent the amount being treated as a "set-off" against the plaintiff's claim under section 18 of the Judicature Act, 1884.

Appeal from an order of Pollock, B., at chambers remitting an action to the county court under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 26.

The plaintiff had brought an action for the produce of a farm under "outgoing tenant's rights" to the amount of £220. The defendant denied the claim in toto, and set up by way of counter-claim and set-off a claim for rent up to £203. The plaintiff admitted indebtedness to this amount, and applied to Pollock, B., at chambers, to remit the action to the county court of Glamorgan on the reduced claim for £17, which application was granted, and against which the defendant now appealed.

H. F. Manisty, for the defendant.—The plaintiff's claim is not reduced to a sum "not exceeding £50," which alone would give the county court jurisdiction. The whole claim is disputed, and the county court judge would have to adjudicate on the sum of £220. Section 26 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108 only applies to where the claim is admitted to a certain extent, but reduced in amount. The sum "in dispute" must not exceed £50. The words "admitted claim" must be imported to explain the section. This was not a claim in which a set-off could be pleaded, because the counter-claim is for a totally different matter from the claim—viz., for rent. A set-off can only be pleaded to a money debt which is "ascertainable with certainty at the time of pleading": Grant v. Royal Exchange Assurance Co., 5 M. & S. 439. The claim here is for an unascertained amount.

Rose, for the plaintiff.—The word "admitted" is not attached to the word "claim" in section 26. The sum in dispute is the criterion, and here only £17 is in dispute. The plaintiff's claim is for a liquidated demand which has been ascertained—i.e., for a debt.

H. F. Manisty, in reply.—The form of judgment must be for £220 if the plaintiff succeeds, that is an adjudication for a sum in excess of county court jurisdiction.

Manisty, J.—The plaintiff here brings an action for £220. The defendant says, "You owe me £203." The plaintiff answers, "I do; therefore my claim is only for £17." The question on that state of facts is whether the cause can be sent to the county court to be tried. I am of opinion that Baron Pollock was right, and that it could be so remitted. Putting the matter simply, the motion by the plaintiff is for the payment of a claim confessedly reduced to £17.

Charles, J.—I am of the same opinion. The fact that the defendant has pleaded by way of counter-claim as well as for a set-off does not affect the question, for there is full power given by section 18 of the Judicature Act, 1884, to the county court to deal with counter-claims under the present circumstances.

Master and servant—Injury to workman—Volenti non fit injuria—Statutory duty—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-section 2—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76), s. 52.

The plaintiff's husband had been employed in the defendant's coal mine, where it was the custom that the banksman, though required to be constantly in attendance at the mine while men were ascending or descending, under section 52 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, should not be present during the night. The plaintiff's husband was killed while ascending at night, in consequence of an accident caused by the absence of the banksman. In an action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880,

Held, that the maxim Volenti non fit injuria did not apply, as the injury was caused by the breach of a statutory duty.

Appeal from the judge of the Staffordshire County Court, sitting at Hanley.

The action was brought under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-section 2, under the following circumstances:—

The plaintiff's husband was employed in the defendant's colliery, and while coming out of the pit at night an accident happened owing to a signal to lower the cage, in which the deceased was ascending, having been improperly given by a boy of fourteen years of age not in the course of his duty. There was no banksman present in accordance with the rules established in pursuance of section 52 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76), but it was the practice at the mine that no banksman should be present at night.

The county court judge, being of opinion that the negligence of the manager of the mine in not providing for the constant attendance of the banksman was the cause of the accident, gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Aspland, Q.C., and G. E. Tyrrell, for the defendant.—The maxim Volenti non fit injuria applies. The deceased well knew of the risk he had undertaken, and Thomas v. Quartermaine, 35 . R. 555, 18 Q. B. D. 685, is in point. Wilson v. Merry, L. R. 1 Sc. App. 326, is also in the defendant's favour. Further, there was no obligation on the defendant's manager to have a banksman constantly in attendance, and, even if he was negligent in that respect, his negligence was not the cause of the accident.

C. A. Russell, for the plaintiff.—Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., in Thomas v. Quartermaine point out the distinction between the breach of a common law and of a statutory duty. The decision of the county court judge was right on all the points. It was not shown at the trial that the practice of the colliery as to the absence of the banksman was known to the deceased.

WILLS, J.—The important question is as to the application of the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Thomas v. Quartermaine. That case has established the doctrine that where an action lies primâ facie under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, an answer is supplied if the servant has voluntarily undertaken the risk which proved fatal. It is a case which in all probability will give rise to much discussion from the frequency with which similar questions arise in these courts, and therefore I shall not attempt to lay down any general rule, as it is desirable to confine oneself to the particular facts of the case under discussion. I do not propose to discuss the general meaning or limitations of the maxim Volenti non fit injuria, the application of which is to be watched with great care in each individual case. But assuming its general applicability in the widest sense, it is sufficient for the purposes of the present case that both the Lords Justices in Thomas v. Quartermaine, thought that the maxim did not apply at all where the injury complained of arises from the direct breach of a statutory obligation. The remarks of Bowen, L.J., were not made in a casual manner. It is true that the Master of the Rolls expressed a different opinion, and that all the observations made were not necessary for the decision of the particular case, and therefore not a binding authority on us. But we have the deliberately-expressed opinions of Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., in a case in which the judgment was long in suspense. Therefore, I have there an expression of opinion which I should follow. But I think, further, that there is a great deal to be said on public grounds in favour of that view. In the first place, an obligation imposed by statute ought to be capable of enforcement with respect to all future dealings affected by it. As far as the future is concerned, statutory obligations should be incapable of being got rid of.

In respect of past breaches persons may come to what agreement they please. But there ought not to be any encouragement to a deliberate engagement between A. and B. that B. shall take no action for a breach of a law for the protection of A. I do not know whether that would be an illegal agreement as being against public policy. But it seems to me it would be against public policy where the supposed agreement, in consequence of which the principle Volenti non fit injuria arises and has to be applied, comes to this, that the master agrees to employ the servant on the terms that the servant will waive breaches by the master of a statutory obligation, and will in that sense, and to that extent, connive at and encourage a breach of a statute the obligations of which are imposed for the benefit of others as well as of the parties to the agreement. I am inclined to think that such an agreement would be in violation of public policy, and one which ought not to be countenanced. There is much that could be said in favour of the proposition that where an accident arises from the breach of a statutory obligation the maxim Volenti non fit injuria ought not to apply. In the present case I follow that proposition, and hold that there being a breach of a statutory obligation, the maxim Volenti non fit injuria does not apply, and, therefore, this case is taken out of the rule laid down in Thomas v. Quartermaine. Therefore this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

His lordship added that the learned county court judge had came to a correct decision upon the other points raised in the argument.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the defendant is precluded, by the peculiar character of the decision in the case of Thomas v. Quartermaine, from arguing that in consequence of the deceased being aware of the danger of going up and down the pit when he knew the banksman was away, the plaintiff cannot recover. The learned Lords Justices who decided the case of Thomas v. Quartermaine expressly say that their decision in that case is not to apply, where there is a statutory liability as there is here. If that is so, I agree with the Master of the Rolls that in such a case as this the defendant would be liable. The case of Blamires v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., L. R. 8 Ex. 283, seems to me to be an important authority and much in point. Here there has been a distinct breach of a statutory obligation, and I think that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment she has obtained.

BLAIR v. CORDNER. (a.)

Practice—Frivolous and vexatious action—Power of court to stay—Ord. 25, r. 4.

The Queen's Bench Division has an innate and inherent authority to dismiss or to stay a frivolous or a vexatious action. This authority is distinct from the authority conferred on it by ord. 25, r. 4, which is limited to pleadings which are frivolous or vexatious or otherwise objectionable.

Appeal from an order of Huddleston, B., at chambers, staying an action.

The plaintiffs, Messrs. Blair & Girling, solicitors, had commenced an action against the defendants for the detention of a deed of reconveyance of mortgaged property under the following circumstances:—The defendant was transferee of a mortgage which the plaintiffs paid off on receiving an undertaking from the defendant's solicitors that the defendant would execute a proper reconveyance. A dispute afterwards arose between the two firms of solicitors as to an item of 10s. claimed by the defendant's solicitors in their bill of costs. The plaintiffs refused to pay the 10s., but they were willing to pay the other items of the bill. The defendant's solicitors refused to hand over the defendant's reconveyance to the plaintiffs, who then commenced this action.

Huddleston, B., at chambers, ordered the defendant to hand over the reconveyance (duly executed) to the plaintiffs upon their paying the costs of the defendant's solicitors less the 10s. in dispute, and stayed all further proceedings in the action, the parties to pay their own costs of the application. The deed was accordingly handed over to the plaintiffs, and the defendant's solicitors were paid their bill of costs less the 10s. The plaintiffs appealed from the order staying the action.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

H. Reed, for the plaintiffs.—Huddleston, B., had no power to stay the further proceedings in the action, because it is grounded on a matter of 10s. There is a good cause of action. The statement of claim is a good one, it has been delivered and it must be pleaded to. There is nothing in it which evinces that the action is frivolous or vexatious, and, therefore, there is no power under ord. 25, r. 4, or under any other rule to strike it out.

C. Dodd, for the defendant.—The action is frivolous. We offered to execute the deed, and they accepted it, saving our claim for 10s. Ord. 50, r. 8, deals with cases of property retained by virtue of a lien, and enables the court to settle the rights of both parties in a summary manner. Again, by ord. 33, r. 2, a judge may at any stage direct any necessary inquiries to be made: The Sally, 48 L. J. P. D. & A. 56, 27 W. R. Dig. 204. The court has an innate jurisdiction to stay vexatious and unreasonable actions. We have handed up the deed, and so soon as we did so the action became an unreasonable one.

H. Reed, in reply.—Ord. 33, r. 2, is merely the old chancery procedure and only applies to redemption suits, actions of account, and so forth. If this rule were applied to other cases it would deprive a suitor of his right to go to a jury, and would alter the whole system of trials. If we had not brought the action we were liable to pay any bill of costs that might be sent to us, and we wanted the deed. [A. L. SMITH, J.—It appears to be merely an action for costs. Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I should make you pay the costs of both sides, and in any event, if the action continued.] We have a right to nominal damages at the least, and these we press for.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The appeal must be dismissed, and the order of Huddleston, B., must be affirmed. I had no doubt throughout the arguments as to what was just. But the doubt which did occur to me was how, in view of technical rules and authorities, we could do justice and carry out the order of Huddleston, B., which I entirely approve of. I am of opinion that Huddleston, B., had no power to stay the action under ord. 25, r. 4, as that order only applies where an action is shown on the pleadings to be frivolous and unreasonable; and this action is not shown to be so on the pleadings. I do not know whether he acted or not under ord. 25, r. 4, but I quite approve of the result which he arrived at. When all the facts concerning this action are understood, there is no doubt but that it is frivolous and vexatious, and this court has an undoubted authority of its own, as was laid down by the Court of Appeal in Willis v. Lord Beauchamp, 34 W. R. 357, to dismiss or stay a frivolous or a vexatious action. This authority is dependent on no statute and on no rules, but is innate and inherent in this court. In the case before us the whole dispute turned on 10s., which dispute has already been settled by Huddleston, B., who ordered the deed to be handed over to the plaintiffs on their paying the costs less the 10s. in dispute, yet, although they have gained their point, they persist in carrying on their action in detinue for the sake of nominal damages for the detention of the deed. In my opinion, from the moment the deed was handed to the plaintiffs their action became both frivolous and vexatious. Thereupon, the power of this court immediately arises to stay the action.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I concur.

Held, also, that the true interpretation of the words in ord. 42, r. 14, of R. S. C., 1883: "The forms used in Appendix H. shall be followed, with such variations as circumstances may require"—is, that the forms in Appendix H. can only be varied for the purpose of making them to be in accordance with the terms of the judgment or order.

Appeal from North, J.

On March 19, 1883, Fry, J., gave judgment in the action of Boswell v. Coaks, dismissing the action with costs, but gave no special direction as to interest on the costs. At that date the rules of practice of the Supreme Court of Judicature in force were the Rules of 1875. In the form of the writ of fi. fa. given in Appendix F., No. 1, to those rules, interest on costs ran from the date of the certificate of taxation. On the 24th of October, 1883, the new Rules of the Supreme Court (1883) came into operation. The preface to these rules enacts that they "shall also apply, so far as may be practicable, . . . to all proceedings taken on or after that day" (October 24, 1883) "in all causes or matters then pending." Ord. 42, r. 14, of the R. S. C., 1883, provides that "every writ of execution shall bear date of the day on which it is issued. The forms in Appendix H. shall be used with such variations as circumstances may require." In the form of the writ of fi. fa. given in Appendix H., Form No. 1, of the R. S. C., 1883, interest on costs runs from the date of the judgment. The date of the taxing master's certificate of the costs of one of the defendants was the 3rd of March, 1884, after the R. S. C., 1883, had came into operation. Summonses to vary the certificate were taken out by both plaintiff and defendants, but before they came on for hearing a decision of the Court of Appeal reversed the judgment of Fry, J., and took away the order for taxation. Subsequently the House of Lords restored the judgment of Fry, J. (see 11 App. Cas. 232, 34 W. R. Dig. 211).

The only question now raised was whether the defendant was entitled to interest on costs from the date of the judgment of Fry, J., or only from the date of the taxing master's certificate.

North, J., held that interest on the costs ran from the date of the judgment (31 S. J. 721).

The plaintiff appealed.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cookson, Q.C., and Langley, for the appellant.—The whole of these costs were incurred and were adjudged to be paid when the Rules of 1875 were in force, those rules therefore apply, and not the Rules of 1883. By the Rules of 1875 interest on costs runs only from the date of the allocatur, and not from the date of the judgment: R. S. C., 1875, ord. 42, r. 12, Appendix F.; Schroeder v. Clough, 46 L. J. C. P. 365, 25 W. R. Dig. 189. Pyman v. Burt, 28 S. J. 428, W. N., 1884, p. 100, only decides that when the new rules (1883) are applicable interest on costs runs from the judgment. North, J., relied on the case of Landowners' Co. v. Ashford, 33 W. R. 41, a decision of Pearson, J., but the point does not appear to have been argued there. In re London Wharfage Co., 33 W. R. 836, is a case in which the judgment was given after the 24th of October, 1883, and therefore the Rules of 1883 clearly applied. Here the judgment dismissing the action with costs was given before the new rules came into force, and by the rules in force at that time the judgment directing the plaintiff to pay costs obliged him to pay, and gave the defendant the right to receive, interests on costs only from the date of the allocatur. The new rules are not to be construed so as to affect vested rights or obligations: Evans v. Williams, 13 W. R. 423, 2 Dr. & Sm. 324. The cause came to an end when the action was dismissed—viz., on the 19th of March, 1883—and, therefore, on the 24th of October, 1883, there was no cause then pending: In re McClellan, 33 W. R. 888, 29 Ch. D. 495. The form of the writ of fi. fa. given in Appendix H. may be varied as circumstances may require: ord. 42, r. 14.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Methold, for the respondent.—The taxation of costs in this case took place after the 24th of October, 1883. That was a proceeding taken in a cause or matter then pending, and therefore the Rules of 1883 apply. Interest on costs, therefore, runs from the date of the judgment, and not from the date of the certificate.

Cookson, Q.C., replied.

COTTON, L.J.—The first point we have to decide is one not free from difficulty. It is whether or not, having regard to the preface to the new rules and orders (1883), the previous rules (1875) do apply under the particular circumstances of this case with regard to the time from which interest on the costs is to run.

Before these rules (1883) came into operation an order was made dismissing this action, with costs. Subsequently these new rules, with alterations as to the mode and effect to be given to an order for the payment of costs, came into operation. The question is whether the new rules and orders apply.

It was said by Mr. Cookson that no cause was pending on the 24th of October, 1883, as the action had then been dismissed, and that it was only to proceedings taken on or after the 24th of October, 1883, in a cause then pending, to which the new rules would apply.

No doubt for some purposes dismissal of an action puts an end to the action—as regards, for instance, the determination of the rights of the parties—but the action is not at an end for the purposes of enforcing the judgment. Take the case of a plaintiff giving an undertaking for damages on the granting, in his favour, of an interlocutory injunction; if the action is subsequently dismissed, no doubt it still continues for the purpose of having effect given to the decree.

In my opinion this action still continues for the purpose of enabling the court to work out its own decree and for the purpose of enabling the parties to work out the taxation of costs and to take proceedings to enforce payment of the costs. The action, therefore, was, within the meaning of the preface to the Orders and Rules of 1883, "a cause pending" on the 24th of October, 1883, for the purposes of what remained to be done under the decree. That, I think, is the true interpretation of the preface.

Then there were some other points urged. It is said that the form of the writ of fi. fa. given in Appendix H. may be varied as circumstances may require, having regard to the words of ord. 42, r. 14, "the forms in Appendix H. shall be used with such variations as circumstances may require." I think that North, J., gave the true interpretation to these words in holding that the forms should be followed, having regard, however, to the directions contained in the judgment or order itself; for instance, if an action were dismissed without costs, the form of the writ of fi. fa. would, of course, be varied by omitting from it the provisions as to enforcing payment of costs.

Mr. Cookson also urged that the right of the successful defendant depends on the judgment of the 19th of March, 1883, and that the new orders ought not to be construed so as to interfere with vested rights. Now the Rules of 1875 altered the old common law rule by making the time from which interest on costs was to run later—viz., from the date of the taxing master's certificate instead of from the date of the judgment. That appears from the case of Schroeder v. Clough, and the present rules have altered that again; but it is wrong to say that the parties have vested rights at the moment a judgment is given as to the manner in which it is to be worked out. The rights of the parties in that respect are dependent on the rules and practice relating to the working out of judgments in existence at the time the judgment is worked out. Here there is a form prescribed by the rules which applies to this case. In my opinion the judgment of North, J., was right.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The right to recover interest on costs ordered to be paid was given by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 17, 18, and section 20 of the same Act gave all courts power to issue new or altered writs in such forms as they should think fit to order. The old Court of Chancery, in pursuance of these provisions, issued a form of the writ of fi. fa. (see Consolidated Order 29, Part 3, r. 6), which directed that interest on costs should run from the date of the taxing master's certificate. That is how it happened that interest on costs ran in the Court of Chancery from the allocatur and not from the date of entry of the incipitur. When the Rules of 1875 came in they did not alter the Consolidated Rules of the old Court of Chancery, and therefore the chancery practice was not touched till 1883. The new Rules of 1883, however, struck out all the old Chancery Consolidated Rules and Orders and made one new code of rules, and there we find the form of the writ of fi. fa. varied, and interest on costs is thereby directed to run from the date of the judgment.

Now the circumstances of this case render it peculiar. The judgment here was given on the 19th of March, 1883, when the old chancery practice was in force, but owing to circumstances the taxation of costs did not take place till after the new Rules of 1883 had come into operation. It is impossible to accede to the contention that the action was then so completely at an end as not to be pending for any purpose. It was then pending for all purposes of enforcing the judgment. Otherwise a fi. fa. would have to issue in an action not pending at all. The action, however, was then pending for the purposes of working out the decree, and amongst other matters for taxation of costs. In my opinion, therefore, interest on the costs runs from the date of the judgment. Then it was said that this would affect the vested rights of parties, but parties have no vested rights in what is a mere rule of practice, and the rule that interest ran from the date of the allocatur was a mere rule of practice.

LOPES, L.J.—The preface to the Rules of 1883 states that those rules apply to all proceedings taken in any case or matter then pending. I think that on the 24th of October, 1883, this action, although dismissed, was still a cause pending for the purpose of giving effect to the decree. The new rules, therefore, apply, and interest runs from the date of the judgment. Ord. 42, r. 14, of these rules provides that "the forms in Appendix H. shall be used with such variations as circumstances may require." I entirely agree with the view of North, J., as to the words "as circumstances may require."

Held, on appeal, that the Court of Appeal would not interfere with the discretion so exercised.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of North, J.

Aaron Wray, a solicitor, had acted as solicitor to the trustees of the will of W. Simpson, and had received from them certain trust moneys for investment. He did not invest them, but applied them improperly.

On the 7th of March, on the application of the present appellants, the surviving trustee and the residuary legatees under the will, North, J., made an order that the solicitor should, on or before the 7th of April, pay the moneys in question, "being moneys in his hands and received by him as solicitor" for the trustees, to the surviving trustee.

On the 22nd of March the order was served on the solicitor personally, but he failed to obey it.

On the 27th of April a notice of motion, dated the 22nd of April, was served on Wray by the applicants, asking that they might be at liberty to issue a writ of attachment against him for his contempt in not paying the money pursuant to the order.

On the 25th of April a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against Wray upon the petition of another creditor, but the applicants were ignorant of this fact until after they had served the notice of motion.

North, J., held that, notwithstanding the receiving order, he had jurisdiction to allow the attachment to issue, because an attachment against a solicitor for the non-payment of money which he had been ordered to pay in that character was not a merely civil process for the recovery of the debt, but was in its nature "punitive or disciplinary." But in the exercise of the discretion given to the court by section 10 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, he declined to allow the attachment to issue, on the ground that, by reason of the receiving order, no benefit could result to the applicants from the attachment, and the issue of it might embarrass the bankruptcy proceedings.

From this decision the applicants appealed.

Warrington, for the appellants, referred to Jarmain v. Chatterton, 30 W. R. 461, 20 Ch. D. 493; In re Freston, 31 W. R. 804, 11 Q. B. D. 545.

Bunting, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Cotton, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of North, J., refusing to send the solicitor to prison. If the judge had held that the existence of the receiving order deprived him of jurisdiction to order the attachment, or that on some other grounds there was no such jurisdiction, we should have entertained the appeal. But I understand that North, J., held that he had jurisdiction to order the attachment, but that taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case and the fact that a receiving order had been made, the issue of the attachment would produce no good result. He, therefore, in the exercise of his discretion, declined to allow it to be issued. I give no opinion what order I myself should have made if I had been hearing the application as a judge of first instance, but I think it would be wrong of the Court of Appeal to interfere with the discretion of the judge below. It is like the case in which, upon a motion to commit a person for contempt, the judge, in exercise of his discretion, declines to make an order for committal, but orders the respondent to pay the costs of the motion. In such a case the Court of Appeal ought not to interfere. I do not say that the court will not interfere in a very gross case, but in the present case I do not think the court ought to interfere by imposing on the solicitor a heavier penalty than the judge in the court below thought fit to inflict.

The costs of the appeal must be set off against the costs which the solicitor has been ordered to pay in the court below.

Form of order upon such a judgment.

This was an appeal against an order of Kekewich, J., sitting as Vacation Judge, for the committal of the defendant, a married woman, for non-payment of a judgment debt payable out of her separate estate, recovered against her in an action on a simple contract entered into after marriage.

Kisch and Salter, for the appellant.—A married woman cannot be committed under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 5, for non-payment of a judgment debt, which is, in fact, a charge upon her separate estate: Meager v.

H. Reed, for the respondent, the judgment creditor.—A married woman was, at the common law, always liable to process by capias, though she might have been released, according to the practice of the courts, upon proof being given of the absence of any separate estate: Ivens v. Butler, 5 W. R. 202, 7 El. & Bl. 159; Edwards v. Martyn, 17 Q. B. 693. That was the law in cases where the contract had been made dum sola, though, on her marriage, the contract became the contract of her husband. So, also, where she omitted to plead coverture, the court would not release her on subsequent proof of coverture, unless proof were also given of the absence of separate estate: see Tidd's Practice, p. 696; Poole v. Canning, L. R. 2 C. P. 241, 15 W. R. C. L. Dig. 70. Dillon v. Cunningham, L. R. 8 Ex. 23, 21 W. R. C. L. Dig. 90, is directly in point; see also Ex parte Linton, In re Linton, 33 W. R. 714, 15 Q. B. D. 239. The judgment in the present case is against the woman personally, and she may be compelled to pay the debt out of her separate estate. In Draycott v. Harrison the woman had no property except such as was subject to a restraint on anticipation.

He also referred to Newton v. Boodle, 9 Q. B. 948; Bursill v. Tanner, 32 W. R. 827, 13 Q. B. D. 691; and Conolan v. Leyland, 27 Ch. D. 632, 33 W. R. Dig. 94.

Salter replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that in this case it is necessary to consider, in the first place, what was the liability of married women before and up to the time of the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. At common law, with respect to the contracts made by a married woman before her marriage, upon which action was brought after marriage, she and her husband were sued together, and, if the contract was proved to have been made by her before her marriage, there was judgment against husband and wife. Thereupon execution followed the judgment, which was the result of the contract, against both husband and wife, and therefore the woman would have been properly taken in execution to satisfy the judgment. The practice of the courts, however, was to deal with the woman in a different manner from that in which the husband was treated. After her marriage a woman could not enter into a contract, and no action would lie in respect of a contract attempted to be entered into by her without her husband's authority, nor, indeed, with such authority, for then it was his contract. In respect of certain torts committed by a married woman, she and her husband might be sued together, and, if the action proceeded to judgment, she and her husband might both be taken in execution. But she was under no liability on her contracts at common law.

In equity it was possible to take proceedings by which a decree could be obtained declaring that the separate estate now vested in a married woman was chargeable to the extent of a judgment against her, but it was not possible to make her personally liable so that she could be taken in execution. Therefore, until the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, women could be taken in execution in certain cases, but neither at law nor equity in respect of contracts entered into by them after marriage. The Married Women's Property Act did not alter the liability of the woman in this respect as it existed at common law. It does not prevent an action against her in respect of a claim against her arising before her marriage, nor in respect of wrongful acts done after her marriage; and further, where by the common law a woman is personally liable in this sense, that she could be taken under a ca. sa. in those cases, now, by virtue of the Debtors Act, she may be summoned and dealt with according to the provisions of that Act. But in respect of the new liability imposed by this Act of 1882, and which the common law had not laid upon her, while she is rendered liable upon contracts into which she could always enter, but which could not be enforced against her, if section 1, sub-section 2, stood alone, the consequences to her would be the same as if she were still a feme sole. For if no new remedy had been given by the Act of 1882 the common law remedy against her as a feme sole would have been established. But a remedy is given by the Act, and that must be taken to be the only remedy. For if a new liability is established by statute, and a remedy also given in respect of that liability, it must be a remedy different from that which the common law would supply. The statute says that she is to be liable in respect of and to the extent of her personal property as if she were a feme sole, and that damages and costs are to be payable out of her separate property, and not otherwise. That means that payment is to be made, not by the married woman personally, but out of her separate property. The judgment in such a case as this ought to follow the words of the statute. The new liability given in this Act is intended to have the same result with regard to the married woman at law as existed in equity, which was, as I have said, a decree that the debt should be a charge on her separate estate, and it is now recoverable against her, and payable out of her separate estate. Is the Debtors Act applicable to such a case? Section 5 of that Act requires that the debt upon which proceedings are taken should be a debt "due from" the debtor, and that means a debt which the debtor is personally liable to meet. If the Married Women's Property Act is set up as an authority to courts to commit to prison persons who could not have been committed previously to its enactment, it must be considered as a highly penal statute, and must be construed strictly, and it is not possible to say that money payable out of certain property is money payable personally. But if the Act was intended to enable the courts to modify the effect of imprisonment or the taking in execution as it stood at common law, there being nothing to modify, the statute is not applicable; for there is no arrest in this case, and we are not called upon to release the woman on terms. In either case, with regard to the judgment which can be recovered against a married woman only by virtue of the Married Women's Property Act, the Debtors Act is not applicable, and I agree with the result of the judgments arrived at in Draycott v. Harrison.

I desire to say that this decision only applies to judgments obtained under the Married Women's Property Act, and not to such judgments as could have been obtained against married women before the passing of that Act.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The power of committal under the Debtors Act is a substitute for the old powers of arrest for debt. If the Debtors Act had not been passed, would the plaintiff in such an action as this have been entitled to arrest a married woman on his judgment? As a general rule the writ of capias followed a regular judgment obtained against a married woman in an action against her and her husband, or against her alone. In Benyon v. Jones, 15 M. & W. 566, and Newton v. Boodle, the capias followed the writ. Where, if the woman had taken the proper course and pleaded coverture she might have escaped, she was not allowed to complain of arrest under a capias where she had not so pleaded. A limitation was put to the right of arrest by the courts, and she might have been discharged after being taken on a judgment against her and her husband where she had no separate property: Edwards v. Martyn, Larkin v. Marshall, 4 Ex. 804. That was an act of indulgence after she had been duly taken in execution.

Does the judgment to which the plaintiff becomes entitled under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, confer upon him the same rights as a common law judgment in the old common law actions maintainable against married women? A married woman is now capable of contracting, and is liable on the contract to the extent of her separate property. If that provision stood alone it would not seem to create a personal liability, but a liability in respect of her property only. Then the statute goes on to alter the procedure to the extent that the husband need no longer be joined; and, finally, the result is expressed to this effect, that damages and costs become payable out of the married woman's separate property, and not otherwise. Satisfaction for the judgment must therefore be sought in the personal estate, and not in arresting the person. That is certainly not like the old judgments at common law. Then, does the Act of 1869 give the court power to commit her? It would seem to be improbable, having regard to the history of the Act, which was intended to reform abuses, and was passed before this new liability had been imposed on married women. Finally, I agree with the Master of the Rolls in the construction he has placed on the Married Women's Property Act. The 5th section of the Debtors Act does not include a debt which is due, not from the debtor personally, but from her only to the extent of her personal property, and we cannot stretch that section to make it cover such a debt.

FRY, L.J.—A married woman might have been taken in execution on a capias in certain cases before the Debtors Act of 1869. Wherever the power of arrest existed before that Act it would seem that a committal might be obtained under its provisions. But neither at law nor in equity could the defendant have been taken for the debt now sued on. In equity the form of order gave no relief as against her personally. The Married Women's Property Act empowers married women to sue and be sued on contracts to the extent of their separate property, and the subject-matter against which damages and costs can be obtained is the separate estate. Even if the Act of 1882 had been passed before the Debtors Act of 1869, I think that no capias could have been taken out, because the judgment is made recoverable out of a particular fund, and a debt due out of a special fund cannot be a debt due from the defendant personally.

Appeal allowed.

Nov. 12.—The COURT announced that the proper form of order against a married woman on a judgment (under section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882) would be as follows:—"It is adjudged that the plaintiff recover £ and costs to be taxed against the defendant J M , such sum and costs to be payable out of the separate property as hereinafter mentioned, and not otherwise. And it is ordered that execution hereon be limited to the separate property of the said J M , not subject to any restriction against anticipation (unless by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, such property shall be liable to execution notwithstanding such restriction)."

EGGLETON v. NEWBEGIN. (a.)

Pauper lunatic—Past maintenance—Statute of Limitations, 21 Jac. 1, c. 16—Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97), s. 104.

Only six years' arrears of money paid for the past maintenance of a pauper lunatic, who has subsequently become entitled to property, are recoverable by the guardians of the poor under section 104 of the Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853.

Adjourned summons.

T. Y. Newbegin had, since the year 1867, been confined as a pauper lunatic in the Sussex County Asylum, and had been maintained by the guardians of the poor for the parish of Brighton.

In 1880 the lunatic became entitled to property of substantial value under the will of his father.

The guardians put in a claim for past maintenance, and this was a summons which raised the question whether the claim of the guardians was to be limited to six years' arrears, having regard to section 104 of the Lunatic Asylums Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97).

Whitehorne, Q.C., and R. F. Norton, for the guardians claimed the full amount paid, without restriction of time.

They referred to In re Upfull's Trust, 3 Mac. & G. 281; In re Drewery's Trusts, 2 W. R. 436; In re Buckley, Johns. 700, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 40; Wentworth v. Tubb, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 171.

Upjohn, contrà, referred to In re Marman's Trusts, 26 W. R. 621, 8 Ch. D. 256; In re Weaver, 31 W. R. 224, 21 Ch. D. 615; In re Webster, 27 Ch. D. 710.

Whitehorne replied.

CHITTY, J.—This is a case of some difficulty. The point is this. An executor has funds in his hands which belong to a person who is a lunatic, and who has been in the county asylum for a considerable number of years on the footing of being a pauper, and under his father's will he has lately had an accession of property. The executor desires the direction of the court with regard to the application of the funds he has in his hands belonging to the lunatic. The lunatic has no family and he is still in the asylum, and the question for decision relates to past maintenance.

The guardians of the parish chargeable say that for more than six years they have been applying moneys in their hands for the purposes mentioned in the 104th section of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, and that they are now entitled to have repaid to them out of the lunatic's fund the whole of the amount, without regard to the Statute of Limitations. The question is whether the statute does or does not apply to this. The exact part of the section on which the question turns is a part which I will read:—"If any trustee or other person having the possession, custody, or charge of any property of such lunatic, or if the Governor and Company of the Bank of England or any other body or person having in their or his hands any stock, interest, dividends, or annuity belonging or due to such lunatic pay any money according to any such order" (I will state what that is in a minute), "or pay any money without any such order to the guardians of any union or parish or to any officer of any parish not in a union or under a board of guardians, or to the treasurer of any county or any other officer of any county authorized to receive the same, to defray the charges paid or incurred by or on behalf of such parish, union, or county, for the examination, bringing before a justice or justices, removal, lodging, maintenance, clothing, medicine, and care of such lunatic, the receipt of the person authorized to receive such money under such order, or of such guardians, overseer, treasurer, or other officer shall be a good discharge to such trustee, Governor and Company, or other body or persons as aforesaid.' That is in its form a mere permissive enactment. The trustee, and not only the trustee but the other persons in a position which, for the purposes of this enactment, the Legislature considered to be analogous, are allowed to make the payment; and if they do make the payment then the receipt of the guardians and the other persons here mentioned is a good discharge.

But this part of the section cannot be interpreted properly without reading the earlier part, and a question which has been argued before me is with regard to the effect of the previous part of this same section—is this previous part founded on obligation on the part of the lunatic to make the payments mentioned, or is it the creation of a new statutory liability?—is it the recognition of an old or the creation of a new? Now I must read the earlier part shortly—"If it appear to any justice or justices by this Act authorized to make any order for the payment of money for the maintenance of any lunatic that such lunatic has an estate, real or personal, applicable to his maintenance, and more than sufficient to maintain his family, if any, he or they shall, by an order under his or their hand and seal or hands and seals, direct the overseers of the parish, or a relieving officer of the parish, a receiver, or the treasurer or some other officer of the county to which such lunatic is chargeable, or in which any property of the lunatic may be, or any officer of the asylum in which the lunatic may be, to seize so much of any money, and to seize and sell so much of the goods and chattels, and to take and receive so much of the rents and profits of the lands and tenements of such lunatic and other income of such lunatic as may be necessary to pay the charges of the examination, bringing before a justice or justices, removal, lodging, maintenance, clothing, medicine, and care of such lunatic, accounting for the same to such justice or justices, such charges having been first proved to the satisfaction of such justice or justices, and the amount set forth in such order." It is a power to seize, and to seize property to the amount required for the payment of the sum mentioned in the order. Land or real estate is mentioned, but there is no charge upon the corpus of the land; and it appears to me that all that the justices can direct to be seized under this is the property of the lunatic, real and personal, to which the lunatic is entitled, not through the medium of any trust, and I think that this part of the section must be read as certainly creating a new remedy.

But was it intended merely to recognize an old pre-existing liability or not? That is a question of some little difficulty. I think consistently with the decisions that have been pronounced upon this section, or a section in the repealed Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 27), which, for all practical purposes, is equivalent to this, I am bound to hold that this statute recognizes a liability on the part of the lunatic to pay for the matters which are here mentioned, which are in the nature of necessaries for the lunatic.

In Buckley's Trusts Wood, V.C., said that his impression was that he had often acted on the authority of Upfull's Trusts, which was Lord Truro's decision, and continued:—"There may be same doubt whether the justices could make an order actually to seize the stock or whether the overseers could get anything more than the income of the stock under such an order. But I think that the court will be acting for the benefit of the lunatic in paying the debts for which he is liable, and saving him from process under which he might be incarcerated." In that part of his judgment he plainly considers that an action might be brought, either on the footing that these were necessaries supplied for the benefit of the lunatic, or that the statute created an obligation to pay. The latter may be, after all, the true view. So that it either stands as a recognition of the pre-existing liability or the creation of a new liability by statute. But it is a liability according to this judgment on which an action might be brought. The decision which I am reading was in 1860, when a man might be thrown into prison for debt; and the grounds on which the Vice-Chancellor proceeds are that he ought now, being placed in the position of a trustee, to do that which would save the lunatic from being incarcerated for a debt for which he is liable. I have slightly transposed, but I have not altered, the sense in the least. Then he goes on:—"In order, therefore, to relieve the lunatic from the possibility of an execution against him the court will apply the corpus of his property in satisfaction of the claim of the petitioners. I apprehend that the court has a discretion at any time to say whether it will exercise this power of dealing with a lunatic's property, or whether it will leave the claimants to their remedy by execution. In cases where the application was to take away the whole of the lunatic's property, the court might prefer to leave the creditors of the lunatic to do their worst; but this is not such a case, and there will be an order as prayed." Throughout the judgment the Vice-Chancellor relies on the fact that there is a debt for which the lunatic might be sued, and then his reasoning is this: "I am now acting in the place of the trustee, and in executing this trust will do that which I think the trustee ought to do." There is no jurisdiction by this section conferred on the old Court of Chancery which then existed or on the High Court as it now exists. All that is done is to authorize the trustee to make the payment, and then, says the Vice-Chancellor, "I will make the payment executing the trust, because I consider it for the benefit of the lunatic so to do in order to save him from the process of execution and the other liabilities to which a debtor is liable." Now I am not at liberty to overrule what the Vice-Chancellor did in the year 1860, and if he has taken a wrong view of the Act of Parliament it is not for me to say so.

I find that Bacon, V.C., has held in In re Webster that the guardians, who had not obtained any order under the first part of the section, are creditors of a deceased lunatic and entitled to be paid. In my opinion, if I may express it, that is right, that this is either a recognition of a pre-existing liability or a new statutory obligation.

Now I come to the exact point. If this is a debt apart from the statute, then it follows as a matter of course that the lunatic, appearing as he does now by his guardian ad litem, is entitled to set up the statute, and there is no pretence, as was partly suggested in argument, that this court is to administer the lunatic's estate in some such way as to pay all the debts without regard to the question of the Statute of Limitations. The lunatic is entitled now to defend this as if it was an action being brought against him, and that is the view I take of the matter. I stated the exact form at the beginning of this judgment in which the question arises, but it is substantially this, that the guardians are suing the lunatic. Having made that statement, I say it is obvious that the lunatic can set up the statute—that is, on the footing of the section being a recognition of the debt. But if it is a statutory liability created, the statute only creates the liability and is silent with regard to the point of time. It does not say that this debt or obligation shall be paid at whatever time it accrued, or notwithstanding the general law as to the statute. It appears to me to leave the statute applicable to the case where it would apply. As I have tried to point out at the beginning of this judgment, it does not make it in terms obligatory or in substance obligatory on the trustees to pay. It is merely permissive. I think if it is a statutory obligation the lunatic is entitled to set up the statute, and it appears to me that this case is analogous to the case of necessaries supplied to a lunatic, though in In re Weaver some doubt is cast by the Court of Appeal as to the liability of a lunatic with regard to necessaries supplied to him, and I do not see any substantial distinction for this purpose between the case of an infant and the case of a lunatic so far as the Statute of Limitations is concerned.

So much for the section itself. I think the section is silent with regard to the Statute of Limitations, and that it is competent for the lunatic to set it up. That is the conclusion I arrive at on the section, having regard to the authorities.

But there would be a most extraordinary anomaly if it were otherwise. I admit it is competent for Parliament to create any number of anomalies if Parliament, in its wisdom, thinks fit, and it may consider, in its superior wisdom, that they are not anomalies. But this would be the result, that if there is what is called a pauper lunatic he shall remain liable, notwithstanding the Statute of Limitations, for any number of years for that which has been spent on him, say ten or twenty years; but if he is an ordinary pauper—that is to say, a pauper who is not lunatic, and he has been, say, in the workhouse for a period of ten years, and then suddenly, as sometimes happens, a large fortune shall accrue to him, possibly by the death of some unknown relation, he shall be liable to pay for his maintenance for one year and one year only. That is the plain effect of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, s. 16, where there is a limitation of one year. In the main Act I have been construing there are two other clauses in which there is a limitation of time imposed, and that is where there is one parish, to put it shortly, which has paid for the maintenance of the lunatic, and another parish in the result is found to be the parish that ought to have paid. In that case there is a limitation of a year; and there is another similar limitation. Thereupon it is argued, and it was for Mr. Whitehorne to do so, that, when the statute intended to impose a limitation of time, it said so. But to my mind that argument is not sound as applied to this statute, because that is a shorter time than the time allowed by the statute; and if I had to decide on the sections that I have just been referring to—namely, the 97th and the 98th, if it had not been for the twelve months' limit, I think I must have held that it was a six years' limitation. Therefore, so far from that being an argument against the conclusion I have arrived at, I think in some slight degree it supports it. The question, I agree, is one of difficulty involving the construction mainly of this section of the Act of Parliament. It is impossible, as I have often heard the late Master of the Rolls say, to dogmatize on such a matter; but I have given the best opinion I can, and I think the guardians are not entitled to recover more than six years.

Under a settlement of real estate situate within the jurisdiction, the trustees had a power of sale with the consent of the tenant for life, the proceeds to be invested in the purchase of land. A power of appointing new trustees was vested in the surviving or continuing trustees or the heirs or assigns of the last surviving or continuing trustee.

The last surviving trustee died in 1874 without making any devise of trust estates. His heir had not been heard of for ten years.

All the cestui que trusts were and had for many years been resident out of the jurisdiction, and knew no one within the jurisdiction but A. who would consent to become trustee. A. had for many years managed the estate and received the rents as agent at a commission of five per cent. on the annual rental, and declined to be appointed trustee except at the same rate of remuneration. Two of the proposed new trustees, B. and C., were resident out of the jurisdiction.

On the application of all the cestui que trusts, some of whom were infants, and of A., B., and C., Stirling, J. (remarking that, if all the trustees should be resident out of the jurisdiction, they might exercise their power of sale and remove the whole trust estate out of the jurisdiction), appointed A., B., and C. to be trustees, A. to manage the estate at a commission of five per cent. on the annual rental, and B. and C. undertaking, in the event of A.'s death, not to appoint a new trustee resident out of the jurisdiction without applying to the court.

Petition.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 10th of February, 1840, certain real estate, situate in the county of Cardigan, was assured to the use of John Bethell and S. B. Freeman upon trust to pay the income to Mary Freeman during her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death to pay the income to Joshua Freeman during his life, and after the death of the survivor to hold the said trust premises upon trust for the children of Mary Freeman as she should by deed or will appoint, and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for all and every the child and children of Mary Freeman, who, being a son or sons, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, should attain that age or marry, in equal shares as tenants in common, and if there should be no such child upon such trusts as Mary Freeman should appoint, with an ultimate trust for Mary Freeman, her heirs and assigns, for ever. The settlement conferred upon the trustees a power of sale with the consent of Joshua Freeman and Mary Freeman, the proceeds of such sale to be invested in the purchase of land; and it was thereby provided that if the trustees, or either of them, or any future trustees, should die or desire to be discharged from, or refuse or become incapable to act in the trusts thereof, it should be lawful for the then surviving or continuing trustee, or (if by any accident it should become necessary) the heirs or assigns of the last surviving or continuing trustee by deed to appoint any other person or persons to be a trustee or trustees in the place of the trustee or trustees so dying or desiring to be discharged or refusing or becoming incapable to act as aforesaid.

(a.) Reported by C. HERBERT BROWN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

John Bethell, one of the trustees, died in 1867. S. B. Freeman, the other trustee, died in 1874, leaving his son, George Freeman, his heir-at-law. S. B. Freeman's will contained no devise of trust estates.

George Freeman had not been heard of for ten years, and could not be found. When last heard of he was out of the jurisdiction.

There were six children of Mary Freeman who attained the age of twenty-one years or married. No appointment to any child had been made in exercise of the power in that behalf contained in the settlement.

Joshua Freeman and Mary Freeman had, since the year 1840, and for many years prior thereto, resided, and all the cestui que trusts resided, in Canada or the United States.

This was a petition presented by all the cestui que trusts, including two infant co-heiresses-at-law of one of the children of Mary Freeman, and by the proposed new trustees, for the appointment of Duff, Lazier, and Lloyd, as trustees of the settlement, and for a vesting order. The petition asked that the new trustees might be authorized to pay to Lloyd, so long as he should manage and collect the rents of the real estate comprised in the settlement, a commission at the rate of five per cent. on the annual rents.

Duff and Lazier were resident out of the jurisdiction. The cestui que trusts knew of no one within the jurisdiction but Lloyd who would undertake the duties of trustee. Lloyd had, for many years, collected the rents as agent, at a commission of five per cent., and declined to accept the office of trustee except upon the terms of his continuing to receive such commission.

Farwell, for the petitioners.—Formerly the court would not appoint persons resident out of the jurisdiction to be trustees, but for many years this has, under special circumstances, been done: In re Guibert's Trusts, 16 Jur. 852; In re Long's Settlement, 17 W. R. 218; In re Smith's Trusts, 20 W. R. 695; In re Hill's Trusts, W. N., 1874, p. 228; In re Drewe's Settlement Trusts, W. N., 1876, p. 168; In re Cunard's Trusts, 27 W. R. 52; In re Liddiard, 28 W. R. 574, 14 Ch. D. 310; Lewin on Trusts, 8th ed., p. 662. [STIRLING, J., remarked that if all the trustees should be resident out of the jurisdiction they might exercise their power of sale and remove the whole trust estate out of the jurisdiction.] As to Lloyd, he is the only person within the jurisdiction known to the beneficiaries who will become trustee. He has for many years received the rents at a commission, and if not appointed as trustee at a like commission he will continue to receive it as agent. A trustee dealing with the court is at liberty, before accepting the trust, to stipulate for any remuneration which the court may choose to give him: Lewin on Trusts, 8th ed., p. 632; Marshall v. Holloway, 2 Swan. 432. All the beneficiaries who are sui juris wish for his appointment on the terms proposed.

STIRLING, J., made an order appointing Duff, Lazier, and Lloyd trustees, subject to the production of a satisfactory affidavit by Lloyd as to the nature of the property and of his duties in the management of it, Duff and Lazier undertaking by their counsel that in the event of the death of Lloyd they would not appoint as a new trustee any person resident out of the jurisdiction without applying to the court.

UNION BANK OF LONDON v. MUNSTER. (a.)

Specific performance — Auction — Bidding — Want of bona fides on part of bidder.

At an auction for the sale of some mortgaged property sold by order of the court, a person, acting in the interest of the mortgagor, and who had no intention of purchasing the property, and no means of doing so if it were sold to him, bid for it, and ran up the price considerably above the reserve, when it was knocked down to the defendant. The plaintiffs, the mortgagees, who had the conduct of the sale, had no knowledge of this dishonest bidding, and were not party to it in any way.

Held, that the vendors could enforce the contract.

Trial of action.

J. J. E. Mayall equitably mortgaged to the plaintiffs, the Union Bank of London, some property situated at Lancing, in Sussex, known as the Stork's Nest. An action to enforce their security was commenced by the plaintiffs in the Chancery Division, and by an order made therein the property was ordered to be sold by public auction or private contract, the plaintiffs to have the conduct of the sale. The property was put up for sale in five lots on June 11, 1886, subject to conditions which included one that the sale was subject to a reserve price and that the vendors reserved the right to bid up to such reserve price for each lot by themselves or their agent. The reserve price fixed for lot 1 was £2,250. The biddings commenced at a price considerably below the reserve price and eventually the defendant, Henry Munster, made a bid of £2,270 for the property.

After this several biddings were made by one Brown, who had no intention whatever of buying, and no means of purchasing the property even if it were knocked down to him. Lot 1 was knocked down to the purchaser, the defendant, for £2,610, and he paid a deposit, and signed the usual contract, but he refused to complete on the ground that the bids made by Brown after the reserve price was reached were not bonâ fide bids, but made solely with a view of improperly and fraudulently running up or increasing the price, and that Brown had been employed to run up the biddings in the interest of the owner of the equity of redemption in the property. The defendant was willing to pay £2,270, the first bidding made by him after the reserve price had been reached, and counter-claimed for conveyance to him at that price.

Lemon, for the plaintiffs.

Oswald, for defendant.—The sale was for the benefit of the mortgagees as well as the mortgagor, so that they profited by the fraud of the stranger. In section 699 of Fry on Specific Performance, 2nd edition, p. 313, the following passage occurs: "Will the fraudulent act of a mere stranger, to which the plaintiff was neither party nor privy, deprive him of his right to enforce the performance of a contract? The question has never, it is believed, been judicially answered. But upon the general equitable principle that no person, though innocent, can derive a benefit from the fraud of another, the contract, if resting absolutely in fieri, could not be enforced." That applies here; the bidding by Brown was fraudulent, and the whole contract is therefore tainted, and cannot be enforced.

KEKEWICH, J., after stating the facts, said it had been contended for the defendant that the plaintiffs, the bank, were not the sole vendors, but were in fact trustees for other people, amongst others the owner of the equity of redemption. No doubt they were trustees, but they were also sole vendors, and possessed all the rights of vendors. The owner of the equity of redemption had an interest in the purchase-money to this extent, that his interest was that the full value should be obtained for the property, and the bidding without any intention of purchasing could not be justified. But it had not been suggested that the vendors had any privity with the dishonesty. Did the existence of it on the part of third parties enable the defendant to refuse to perform his contract. If it could be said that a vendor was liable for dishonest bids a purchaser might also be bound to beware of them in an auction room. A passage had been cited from the well-known book of Lord Justice Fry on Specific Performance. Many warnings had been uttered against treating text-books written by eminent judges as quasi-judicial, and Lord Justice Fry himself, in the preface to the work in question, said this: "There is one notion often expressed with regard to works written or revised by authors on the bench which seems to me in part at least erroneous, the notion, I mean, that they possess a quasi-judicial authority. It is hardly enough remembered how different are the circumstances under which a book is written and a judgment pronounced, or how much the weight and value of the latter are due to the discussions at the bar which precede the judgment." That remark applied here, since, if it were endeavoured to apply the passage quoted from Lord Justice Fry's work, counsel would be asked what he meant by "fraudulent act." But it was not necessary to express an opinion on the passage since the fraudulent act of a mere stranger must, to prevent the court from granting the vendor specific performance, be something more than a dishonest bid on the part of such stranger in an auction room.

A case might exist in which the owner of a house next door to one which was being sold by auction might run up the bidding in order possibly to enhance the price to be obtained for his own if he should afterwards sell it. The morality of such conduct might be questionable, but the act would not be of that fraudulent character which would give the purchaser a right of relief against the vendor. Under these circumstances the vendors were entitled to specific performance, and the counterclaim must be dismissed, with costs.

Hobbs v. Wayet. (a.)

Indemnity — Trustee and cestui que trust—Shares—Action for indemnity before call—Distringas—Disclaimer.

A. and B. agreed that the income of money invested in their joint names in shares in a company, but in fact supplied by A., should go to A. for her life, and afterwards to B. for his life, and the principal then to such charities as A. should by will appoint.

Held, on failure of such appointment, after the determination of the life estates, that there was a resulting trust of the principal in favour of A.

B. having survived A., and the company having gone into liquidation, B.'s executor, being liable in the winding up, sued A.'s executors for an indemnity before any call had been made on him.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to the indemnity.

A legatee of shares in a company who puts a distringas on those shares does not thereby irrevocably declare his acceptance of them, so as to be estopped from subsequently disclaiming them.

Trial of action.

This was an action by the legal personal representative of Dr. Edward Thomas Roe against the legal personal representatives and the residuary legatee of Miss Hannah Hughes, claiming to be indemnified against all liability in respect of sixteen shares in the Oriental Bank Corporation.

By an agreement of December 26, 1863, between Miss Hughes and Dr. Roe in pursuance of a previous arrangement between them to the same effect, it was agreed that the investment of her money in the Oriental Bank Corporation and in East India debentures in their joint names shall go and be according to their original intention (namely) the interest or income to her for her life, and afterwards to him for his life, and the principal then to go to such charities as she by her will or codicil should direct.

In 1864 Miss Hughes and Dr. Roe executed a deed poll releasing each other from all claims except under the above agreement.

Miss Hughes, who died on the 26th of March, 1878, by her will directed that her shares, moneys, or funds invested in the Oriental Bank Corporation and in East India Railway Debentures in the joint names of herself and Dr. Roe should, subject to his life interest, be deemed as given and bequeathed, and she thereby gave and bequeathed the same (free from legacy duty) to seven charitable institutions mentioned in her will, of which the British and Foreign Bible Society was one.

Dr. Roe died in September, 1884. On May 15 in the same year an order had been made by Chitty, J., for the winding up of the Oriental Bank Corporation, and the charitable institutions disclaimed the gift of the shares. It appeared, however, that in the year 1878 the solicitors of the British and Foreign Bible Society, having made the necessary affidavit, had caused a distringas to be placed on the Oriental Bank shares and East India Railway Debentures, and that it had never been removed. A distringas had also been placed on the same shares and debentures by the executor of Miss Hughes.

The liability on the sixteen shares was £400, being £25 per share, and the East India debentures were insufficient in value to answer that sum, the whole of which, it was stated, would be required by the liquidator.

In April, 1885, the liquidator informed the plaintiff that he would be placed on the list of contributories as executor of the survivor of the joint shareholders. The plaintiff claimed to be indemnified by Miss Hughes's representatives against all calls and liabilities in respect of the bank shares.

Warmington, Q.C., and Hull, for the plaintiff.—This case is covered by Balsh v. Hyam, 2 P. Wms. 453, and Jervis v. Wolferstan, L. R. 18 Eq. 18, 22 W. R. Dig. 251, The defendants are, as regards the Oriental Bank shares, cestui que trusts of the plaintiff, and we prove the liability on the shares. Miss Hughes was absolute owner of them subject to the life estates, nor was her ownership (in the result) divested by her will at her death, because the charities disclaimed the shares. The Bible Society are not estopped from disclaiming by their distringas, which was merely a precautionary measure.

B. B. Rogers, for the defendants.—In order to succeed the plaintiff must at least make out, first, that Miss Hughes was a cestui que trust as to the shares, and, secondly, that there is some liability on them. Neither point has been made out. Miss Hughes had, under the agreement, no beneficial interest beyond her life estate, but merely a power to appoint to charities, and, therefore, in the default or failure of appointment, which happened, the ultimate interest in the shares, being undisposed of, became the property of Dr. Roe as the survivor of the joint owners and as the legal owner on the company's register of shareholders. Moreover, in Fraser v. Murdoch, 6 App. Cas. 855, Lord Blackburn expressed an opinion (p. 872) that Jessel, M.R., in Jervis v. Wolferstan, L. R. 18 Eq., at p. 24, had stated too broadly the rule as to the liability of a cestui que trust to personally indemnify a trustee who has accepted the trust at his request. Furthermore, Miss Hughes released her interest (if she ever had any) by the deed poll of 1864. The Bible Society were estopped from disclaiming the shares by their distringas affidavit, which must be treated as an acceptance by them of the shares.

Kekewich, J.—I think the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. It seems that there had been accounts between Miss Hughes and her medical attendant Dr. Roe, into the history of which I do not think it necessary to go, but ultimately an arrangement was come to between them as to other matters apparently, but especially as to certain East India Railway Debenture Stock, and shares in the Oriental Bank Corporation, which stood in the joint names of Dr. Roe and Miss Hughes. This arrangement was subsequently embodied in a written agreement which is as follows :—[His lordship read the agreement of December, 1863.] Upon this agreement the question arises what is to happen after both the parties to the agreement are dead, without the power of appointment having been exercised—in other words—what is the ultimate trust? To my mind, looking at the agreement alone by the light of the previous transactions, there is no doubt whatever that Dr. Roe estopped himself from making any claim to that money. It is admitted to have been Miss Hughes's money, but was invested by him, and certain trusts were declared of it. It would never be held under such circumstances that the beneficial interest could be controlled by the legal interest. Whichever survived would be a trustee for the purposes of that instrument, and so far as that instrument failed to declare how the money was to be applied ultimately, I hold there was a resulting trust in favour of the lady who supplied the money.

About the same time or shortly afterwards a release was executed which seems to me to confirm my view. Neither Dr. Roe nor Miss Hughes would be entitled under the agreement to any ultimate interest in the funds therein referred to, as it does not deal with such ultimate interest, but the release recites all the transactions between them, and settles them on the terms of the agreement. Therefore, for Dr. Roe now to come and say "the money is standing in my name and belongs to me subject to your life interest" would be to open up one of the very questions settled by the two documents. The release was intended to settle by way of general release the several accounts and pecuniary transactions therein recited, but would not prevent Miss Hughes claiming the money dealt with by the agreement. I hold that this money belonged to Miss Hughes, and was invested in the joint names for her benefit as well as Dr. Roe's, and the question is whether his estate is entitled to be indemnified. Unfortunately the Oriental Bank shares have turned out valueless. Dr. Roe, or rather the plaintiff as his personal representative, will be placed on the list of contributories and will be liable to pay some money. It is said that even if he is called upon to pay he will not be entitled to an indemnity, and, secondly, that the right to an indemnity cannot at any rate exist before he is called upon. As to the first point, I believe I am entitled, and therefore bound to accept in the broadest sense the rule laid down by Jessel, M.R., in Jervis v. Wolferstan, L. R. 18 Eq., at p. 24, on which Lord Blackburn merely remarked that perhaps it was too broadly stated. Lord Blackburn himself states the rule in terms on which I can, for the present purpose, rely equally well. He says, in Fraser v. Murdoch, 6 App. Cas., at p. 872 :—"No doubt anyone who requests another to incur a liability which would otherwise have fallen on himself is, in general, bound, at law as well as in equity, to indemnify him." There is no doubt that Dr. Roe accepted these shares, on which there was a liability, at the request of Miss Hughes, and the liability has fallen on his estate in consequence. I think, therefore, that his executor ought to be indemnified by Miss Hughes's estate. But then it is said secondly, that this action is brought too soon. As to that the evidence shows that it is being attempted to settle Dr. Hobbs on the list as the executor of Dr. Roe, and that the liability will be enforced, which distinguishes the case from that of Hughes-Hallett v. Indian Mammoth Gold Mines Co., 31 W. R. 285, 22 Ch. D. 561, which I may accordingly pass by without further remark. I hold that the particular case is aimed at and hit by the decision of Giffard, V.C., in Wooldridge v. Norris, 15 W. R. 965, L. R. 6 Eq. 410, though no doubt the passage he quotes applies to a surety more than to a cestui que trust. A man who accepts any liability, and is, therefore, entitled to be indemnified, is entitled, directly the cloud, however small, appears, to go to the man who made the request, and say, "Do you acknowledge my right to be indemnified?" and, unless the right is acknowledged, he is entitled to come to this court for a declaration of his right to be freed from liability. This is the very case. An action has been commenced, and the liability is denied at the bar.

There is one other point—an interesting one—the distringas. Miss Hughes exercised her power of appointment over the fund by will by leaving it among seven charities, but there is nothing to show that any of these, except the British and Foreign Bible Society, did anything with reference to this particular fund. They executed a disclaimer, the shares being damnosa hæreditas, and I think they were quite at liberty to do so, and I hold that disclaimer good, and that it removes them from the field in any case. But as regards the British and Foreign Bible Society, their solicitor, knowing the trust fund was in the hands of a sole trustee, thought the charity ought to be protected, and therefore, either acting under a general resolution, or doing what he would have advised a meeting of the governors to do, he put a distringas on the Oriental Bank shares. Even treating the case as if he had had express authority, which he had not, what does it amount to? The distringas is put on under rules which are of very recent origin.

His lordship proceeded to discuss the history of the rules now in force in relation to the putting on of a distringas, and the mode of procedure, and concluded as follows :—The object is that anyone who thinks he has a claim to a fund standing in the name of trustees, or may have an interest in it, may stop it while he makes enquiries or takes proceedings, not being certain whether he is entitled or not. The distringas does not operate as an injunction. If anyone wishes to transfer the fund notice has to be given to the man who put on the distringas, and then, if he does nothing within a limited time, the distringas ceases.

If I were to hold that a man, by swearing he believed he had an interest in a fund, did what committed him to an acceptance and amounted to an election so as to estop him from subsequently denying the fact, the consequences might, in some cases, be terrible, and I certainly will not be the first to hold that a mere affidavit, made because a solicitor believes a man is beneficially interested in some bank shares, amounts to an acceptance of those shares so as to estop him from subsequently disclaiming. I give the plaintiff the relief he asks by way of indemnity. Under the circumstances it will not, I think, be necessary to do more than declare the right to an indemnity.

I declare that Miss Hughes's estate is liable to indemnify Dr. Roe's estate in respect of the Oriental Bank shares formerly standing in his name.

UNDERHAY v. READ. (a.)

Mortgage—Subsequent lease by mortgagor—Notice to tenant in possession by mortgagee—Evidence of new tenancy.

The mortgagor of property leased it to B. in March, 1886, without notice of the mortgage. B. paid to the mortgagor one quarter's rent up to June. On the 7th of July the mortgagees served a notice on B. to pay them rent due from that date until further notice. On the 10th of September B. received notice of a transfer of the mortgage. No one applied to B. for the rent due on the 29th of September. In December the plaintiff obtained judgment for a debt due to him from the mortgagor, and was appointed receiver of all rents then due to the mortgagor without prejudice to prior incumbrances. Notice of his appointment was sent to B. On the 25th of January, 1887, B. paid the two quarters' rent due up to the 25th of December, 1886, to the assignees of the mortgage. Upon a summons at chambers by the receiver for the rent, the judge ordered the quarter's rent up to the 29th of September to be paid to him.

Held, that the proper inference to be drawn from the conduct of B. was that a new tenancy from year to year had been created between him and the mortgagees from the date of the notice served on him by the mortgagees on the 7th of July, 1886, and that the receiver had no right to claim the rent due for either quarter since that date.

Quære (per Manisty, J.), whether a judge at chambers has power to make such an order as was made in this case.

Appeal from an order of Pollock, B., at chambers, ordering the payment of one quarter's rent to a receiver.

The facts of the case were as follows:—

The defendant Read mortgaged certain property in September, 1885. On the 11th of March, 1886, Read let the property to one Butler, as tenant, who had no knowledge of the mortgage. Butler paid to Read the quarter's rent due in June.

On the 7th of July Butler received notice from the mortgagees that the rent due from that date was to be paid to them. On the 10th of September Butler received notice of a transfer of the mortgage.

On the 14th of December an order was made by Field, J., appointing the plaintiff as "receiver of rents then due to Read, without prejudice to prior incumbrances." Notice of this order was sent to Butler.

On the 25th of January, 1887, Butler paid the half-year's rent then due to the assignees of the mortgagees. Upon application to Pollock, B., at chambers, the judge ordered the quarter's rent due at Michaelmas, 1886, to be paid to the receiver.

Against this order Butler now appealed.

Gore, for the tenant, Butler.—A fresh tenancy was created between the tenant and the mortgagees from the date of the notice given by the mortgagees in July, 1886; Evans v. Elliot, 9 A. & E. 342; Waddilove v. Barnett, 2 Bing. N. C. 538; Hickman v. Machin, 4 H. & N. 716, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 57; Moss v. Gallimore, 1 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., 604. Butler paid the rent due to a person in a position to receive it, having the title to possession during the period for which payment was made. The receiver took no action to recover the rent subsequent to the notice of his appointment.

Powell, for the receiver.—Butler should have paid the previous quarter's rent to the receiver after receiving the notice of his appointment: Woodfall on Landlord and Tenant, 11th ed., 49. There notice by the mortgagees has been held to be insufficient. Attornment by the tenant is necessary to create a new tenancy: Brown v. Storey, 1 M. & G. 117; Ward v. Carter, 35 Beav., per Lord Romilly, at p. 176. The receiver, as an officer of the court, can apply for a summons for money due without an action; and the judge at chambers can decide the whole issue of law and fact involved as if sitting in court.

Gore replied.

MANISTY, J.—This is an appeal from an order of Pollock, B., ordering £18 7s. 6d., which was one quarter's rent due from Mr. Butler at Michaelmas, 1886, to be paid to the plaintiff as receiver of the defendant's property. Butler, the tenant, now appeals to us, on the ground that he was, from July, 1886, a tenant to the mortgagees of the defendant's property, and not to the defendant, his original lessor, and that consequently, having paid his rent to them, there is no rent due from him to the plaintiff as receiver of the defendant's estate. The facts in the case are simple. There is no doubt that Read, the defendant, mortgaged his property in February, 1886. In March, after this mortgage, he let the property in question to Butler, the present appellant, at a rent of £73 10s., payable quarterly. Butler was not aware of the mortgage. Subsequently an action is brought by the present plaintiff, Underhay, against Read. Judgment is obtained by Underhay, and a sort of equitable execution is further obtained through his being appointed to act as a receiver on the 13th of December, 1886. The only point is whether or not the plaintiff, as such receiver, had a right to the rent due from Butler at Christmas, 1886. Butler had paid his rent to the defendant in June. He had not paid his rent in September, apparently because he was not called upon to do so either by the defendant or anyone else. Nothing, in fact, took place as to the September rent. Butler continued in possession. In July, 1886, however, he had received notice from the mortgagees that the rent accruing due from that time would be payable to them, and that he was not to pay it to anyone else than themselves. It does not appear that either party demanded any payment of the first quarter subsequent to this notice, but in September notice was given to Butler of the transfer of the mortgage. This, however, has no material bearing on the question whether, in July, 1886, from the date of the notice, a new tenancy commenced between Butler and the mortgagees. On the 13th of December the order appointed the plaintiff a receiver "for all rents due and to become due" to the defendant as landlord. Now the receiver can have been placed in no better position than the defendant himself. That cannot be disputed. The question is whether the defendant had or had not a right at that time to the payment of this rent? This case differs much from any case cited, because, in January, 1887, the defendant paid the half-year's rent due to the assignees of the first mortgagees. No rent was paid by him after July, 1886, when he received the notice of the mortgage, to anybody but to these assignees in January, 1887. What is the proper inference to be drawn from such facts? Is it not that Butler assented to the notice given him in July—i.e., that he assented to become tenant to the mortgagees from that date not, I should say, under the terms of the original lease, but as their tenant from year to year. That would be for the jury to say. I take it that a judge at chambers would draw the same inference. Upon that the case of Brown v. Storey is almost conclusive. It is there laid down to be the proper inference that where, after notice, the tenant agreed to abide by such notice, he does thereby become the tenant of the mortgagees from year to year.

It is said that the case of Evans v. Elliot lays down that notice only is insufficient—that is to say, that the party in possession cannot be compelled to become tenant to the mortgagees by merely receiving notice. That is so; and no doubt some passages in the judgments in that case seem to go further and to support the present plaintiff's view; but they do not do so really, for the facts here differ from those in that case. Moreover, Brown v. Storey comes subsequently to Evans v. Elliot, and clearly says that it is a question of fact for a jury whether such tenancy has been created in the absence of any express assent, but that the tenant's conduct after such notice has been received is to be considered as evidence, and if his conduct towards the mortgagees has been that of a tenant, the proper inference to be drawn, and the one which the jury may and ought to draw, is that a new tenancy has been created from the date of the notice. Indeed, one judge—Chief Justice Tindal—in the later case, goes so far as to say that the fact of the receipt of the notice alone may be sufficient evidence from which to draw that inference, and his whole judgment is a very strong decision in favour of the view which I take of this case, for he says: "I agree that the relation of landlord and tenant cannot be created without the consent of both parties;" and, after showing the evidence of consent by the mortgagees, he continues: "The plaintiff—i.e., the tenant—receives a notice from the parties in whom was the legal interest. If he remained in possession without repudiating the notice he seems to have been in possession under the old terms. It is not clear that, upon issue joined upon the replication, it was necessary to show an attornment by the tenant. It would seem that no distinct act of assent need have been proved." Butler here might have been ejected by the mortgagees had he paid no attention to the terms of their notice by not complying with the payment of the rent to them. He remains in possession; and that also is some evidence that he assented to become their tenant. As Bosanquet, J., puts it, in Brown v. Storey, "It is said that it ought to have been left to the jury whether the plaintiff assented to a new tenancy. It is clear that there can be no demise without an assent by both parties. But if it had been wished to raise the point of want of assent, that should have been suggested to the learned judge. If it had been, the jury could have found but one way." Doubtless, cases are not argued at chambers quite as they are in open court, but such an inference as that a new tenancy was created was a question of fact for a jury, had there been a jury, and if it has been held to be a correct inference, the judge or jury ought to draw such inference upon such facts—namely, that the tenant, Butler, was tenant to the mortgagees—and, if so, the order here made was wrong. Whether a judge at chambers has any power to make such an order as that made here need not now be settled by us, but I should very much like to hear such a question argued.

Charles, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question of whether or not there was a new tenancy is one of fact. What was the status of the tenant on Michaelmas Day, 1886? The facts have been so fully detailed by my brother Manisty that I need only say that the proper conclusion was that Butler had become a tenant of the mortgagees and had ceased to be a tenant of the defendant's from the date of the notice to which he assented.

Justice of the peace—Practice—Special case—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 33—Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, r. 18.

A court of summary jurisdiction has no power to state a special case under section 33 of 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49 unless an application has been made to the court in writing, and unless a copy of such application has been left with the clerk of the court within seven days of the date of the proceeding to be questioned according to rule 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886.

Case stated by justices of the county of Stafford under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 33.

The respondent contended that the justices had no power to state a case on the ground that no proper application had been made.

It appeared that at the hearing an oral application for a case had been made on behalf of the appellants, which was granted by the justices. No application was made in writing, and a written notice of appeal was served on the clerk to the justices by the appellants within seven days from the oral application.

Hugo Young, for the respondent.—Two processes are prescribed by rule 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, for the purpose of getting a case stated—viz., an application in writing to the justices and the leaving of a copy of the application with the clerk to the justices. The right to have a case stated depends absolutely upon these formalities being observed. Ex parte Curtis, 26 W. R. 210, 3 Q. B. D. 13, shows the necessity of strict compliance with the rules.

Wills, for the appellants.—Section 33, sub-section 1, of the Summary Jurisdiction Act gives an aggrieved person an absolute right to apply for a case stated. Sub-section 2 and rule 18 are mere directions as to procedure, and cannot be held to limit the absolute right created by sub-section 1. The oral application to the justices having been successful, another application became superfluous. Besides, rule 18 was substantially complied with by service of the notice of appeal.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—Our decision on this preliminary objection must be in favour of the respondent. Whatever be its merits, we cannot entertain the appeal because the statutory conditions have not been complied with. The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which creates the appeal, expressly states that the application shall be made and the case stated according to the rules under the Act. Rule 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, directs in the plainest manner that an application to a court of summary jurisdiction to state a special case shall be made in writing and a copy left with the clerk of the court. To hold that this rule has been complied with by an oral application and the notice of appeal would be to create a new rule, and cannot be done.

Harper v. Davis. (a.)

County court—Payment into court with denial of liability—County Courts Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 82—County Court Rules, 1886, ord. 4, rr. 11, 12; ord. 51, r. 37.

Where a defendant in a county court action paid money into court, but stated at the same time in a memorandum addressed to the registrar that the payment was made "without prejudice to the defendant's defence to this action, and while denying the plaintiff's cause of action,"

It was held by Day and Wills, JJ., that the payment into court was not an admission of liability, and the defendant was entitled to dispute his liability at the hearing;

By Wills, J., that, apart from the notice, the defendant was entitled to pay money into court and afterwards to dispute his liability at the hearing, according to the decision in Berdan v. Greenwood, 26 W. R. 902, 3 Ex. D. 251.

This was an appeal from the Birmingham County Court. The action had been brought for trespass to goods. The defendant paid into court the sum of £2 with 2s. for costs, stating at the same time in a memorandum addressed to the registrar that the payment was made "in full satisfaction of the plaintiff's alleged cause of action without prejudice to the defendant's defence to this action, and while denying the plaintiff's cause of action." The registrar sent a notice to the plaintiff in due form, informing him that the money had been paid in satisfaction, but not giving him any information as to the other terms of the memorandum. The county court judge treated the payment into court as an admission of liability on the ground that the County Courts Acts and Rules contained no provision authorizing the payment of money with denial of liability. The defendant appealed.

T. W. Chitty, for the defendant.—Though the County Court Rules of 1886 contain no specific provision for payment into court with denial of liability, the practice in the High Court, since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Berdan v. Greenwood, 26 W. R. 902, 3 Ex. D. 251, is a ground for so interpreting these rules as to extend this privilege to defendants in county courts. Apart from this general question the admission was clearly limited by the memorandum.

Hugo Young, for the plaintiff.—Section 82 of the County Courts Act, 1846, which deals with payment into court, impliedly prohibits it with denial of liability. The rules issued under section 82 since the Judicature Acts, the County Court Rules, 1875, ord. 12, rr. 4 and 5, and the County Court Rules, 1886, rr. 11 and 12, are framed on the assumption that it would have been ultra vires to introduce the new practice established in the High Court by Berdan v. Greenwood into the county courts. The registrar was bound to administer the existing rules relating to payment into court, and under orders 51 and 27 had no power to recognize any forms but those numbered 103 and 104, which make no reference to denial of liability.

Day, J.—This appeal must be allowed. If the conditional payment into court, reserving all rights, is not permitted by the practice of the county courts, the registrar was bound to return the money to the appellant. There has been no admission of liability. On the more general question I express no opinion.

Wills, J.—There has been clearly no admission of liability in this case, so the appeal must be allowed. But the question as to county court practice is important. I certainly entertain the opinion that, apart from any notice to the registrar, the defendant in a county court action has the right which was defined by the Court of Appeal in Berdan v. Greenwood. The existing County Court Rules of 1886, rr. 11 and 12, seem to me to be framed in obvious conformity with the rules comprised in order 30 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1875, on which Berdan v. Greenwood was decided. At any rate, they resemble these rules much more than they do those substituted in 1883. I think the county court judges, by adhering to the text of the rules on which Berdan v. Greenwood was decided, have adopted that decision into their practice. The apparent want of machinery ought not, in my opinion, to defeat their intention, and in this case the defendant would have reserved his right to dispute his liability at the hearing, even though he had not given the registrar notice at the time of the payment of the money into court.

Appeal allowed.

Q. B. Div. (Mathew and Cave, JJ.) April 4, 5; May 2.

Wilson v. Glossop. (a.)

Husband and wife—Necessaries supplied to wife—Liability of husband for—Connivance by husband in adultery of wife—Condonation.

A husband is liable for necessaries supplied to his wife after he had turned her out of his house without any means of support for adultery committed with his connivance.

The claim in this action, which was tried in the Sheffield County Court without a jury, was for £40 for forty weeks' maintenance of the wife of the defendant.

The facts were shortly these:—In August, 1885, the defendant charged his wife with having committed adultery and turned her out of doors without any means of support. She, thereupon, went home to her mother, the plaintiff, who supplied her with board and lodging. The defendant, having subsequently petitioned in the Probate and Divorce Division for a dissolution of his marriage, it was proved at the trial that the wife had committed adultery; that the petitioner had not condoned the adultery committed by the wife; but that the petitioner had connived at the adultery committed by her; and the petition was thereupon dismissed.

In the county court the defence set up to the action was the wife's adultery. To this it was answered that the husband's connivance precluded him from relying upon that defence.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Herbert Reed, for the plaintiff.—The reason of the rule that a husband is not liable for goods supplied to his wife after she has committed adultery, is the wrong suffered by him. Volenti non fit injuria. No wrong is done to a man who connives at his own dishonour.

He cited Robinson v. Gosnold, 6 Mod. 171; Govier v. Hancock, 6 T. R. 603; Norton v. Fazan, 1 B. & P. 226; Hunt v. De Blaquiere, 5 Bing. 550; Culley v. Charman, 29 W. R. 803, 7 Q. B. D. 89.

Moorsom, Q.C. (Cyril Dodd with him), for the defendant.—The true test of the husband's liability is, Did the wife's misconduct operate as a revocation of her implied authority to bind him for necessaries supplied to her? The fact that he was a party consenting to his own dishonour is quite beside the point.

He cited Manby v. Scott, 1 Keble, 69, 80, 87, 206, 337, 361, 383, 429, 441, 482, 1 Sid. 109, 1 Lev. 4; Cox v. Kitchen, 1 B. & P. 338; Harris v. Morris, 4 Esp. 41; Mainwaring v. Leslie, M. & M. 18; Drew v. Drew, 1 Notes of Eccl. Cur. adv. vult.

May 2.—The judgment of the COURT (MATHEW and CAVE, JJ.), was delivered by CAVE, J.—This was an appeal from a judgment of the county court of Sheffield, holding that a husband is not liable for his wife's maintenance after her adultery, although he was guilty of connivance. The case was argued before Mathew, J., and myself on April 4 and 5 last, and I have now to deliver the judgment of the court.

For the purposes of this case it must be taken that the wife committed adultery with the connivance of her husband, that the husband subsequently turned her out of doors, that she had no means of support, and that the plaintiff supplied her with necessaries, and brought this action against the husband to recover the sum so expended.

It is undoubted law, that, if a husband without any justifiable cause turns away his wife, he is bound by any contract she may make for necessaries suitable to her degree and estate: per Bayley, J., Montague v. Benedict, 3 B. & C. 631, 635. We can nowhere find any statement of what is justifiable cause in point of law for turning a wife out of doors. According to the earlier authorities adultery is not such a cause. Thus in Robinson v. Gosnold an opinion expressed by Holt, C.J., at Nisi Prius is given in the following terms: "Let the woman be ever so vicious, yet while she will cohabit with her husband he is bound to provide necessaries for her and is liable to the actions of such persons as furnish her with them; for his bargain was to take her for better for worse. In like manner it is, if the husband turns his wife away for her wickedness, he remains still chargeable for her necessaries. But if the wife leave her husband, they that trust her after it is notorious that she has left him do it at their peril, and shall not thereupon charge the husband." So again in Manby v. Scott, Bac. Abr. Baron & Feme (H.) Hale, C. B., says: "Also, if the wife cohabits with her husband, and is ever so lewd, he shall be liable for her maintenance; for he took her for better for worse; so, if he runs away from her, or turns her away, or forces her by cruelty or ill-usage to go away from him." Again, in Hunt v. De Blaquiere, 5 Bing., at p. 557, Best, C.J., says: "If a man turns his wife out of doors it has been said by judge after judge that he sends her forth with an implied credit for necessaries. This is the general law; and the defendant is liable under it, unless the obligation cast on him by turning his wife out be discharged by something subsequent." But however this may be, it is at all events admitted that a husband has no right to turn his wife out of doors under circumstances that would not disentitle her to succeed in an action for restitution of conjugal rights.

Mr. Moorsom, in his able argument, cited Drew v. Drew as deciding that the adultery of the wife is a bar to a suit by her for restitution of conjugal rights, even though the husband has connived at her adultery. But when the case is looked into it will be found that it does not really decide that point. The suit was originally one for restitution of conjugal rights. By way of bar to this suit the husband pleaded that his wife had committed adultery, and prayed for a decree on that ground. The cause then resolved itself into a suit of that nature, in answer to which the wife alleged in bar—first, that the husband had himself committed adultery; secondly, that he had connived at her adultery. These matters, it will be seen, were pleaded in reply to the husband's plea in bar to the claim for restitution, and the question whether connivance is an answer to a plea of adultery in such a suit was neither decided nor argued. There are, however, two cases in which, although not decided, the point was discussed. The first is Seaver v. Seaver, 2 Sw. and Tr., App. II., 665, decided in the Consistorial Court in Dublin in 1846. This was an action by the wife against the husband for restitution of conjugal rights. The husband pleaded adultery of the wife in bar; to which she replied the adultery of the husband, and it was held by the Consistorial Court, and afterwards, on appeal, in the Court of Delegates, that the replication was good.

It seems clear that by the canon law an adulterous wife was entitled to a restitution of conjugal rights if the husband had himself committed adultery or had connived at or had condoned his wife's adultery; and the question in Seaver v. Seaver was whether this had become the law of England in its whole extent. After considering the authorities the learned judge of the Consistorial Court arrived at the conclusion that by our law condonation or connivance would prevent a husband from relying on his wife's adultery so condoned or connived at as a bar to her suit for restitution.

The same point came before the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in 1858, in a suit of Hope v. Hope, 6 W. R. 585, 1 Sw. & Tr. 94, where, however, the learned Judge Ordinary came to a different conclusion from that at which the Irish courts had arrived on the subject of mutual adultery. On the subject of connivance and condonation the learned judge expressed the following views:—"By connivance in this (a passage cited from Oughton's Ordo Judiciorium) and other passages, I take it that the party is supposed so to connive as to give a willing consent to the act, although not an accessory before the fact. In such a case it is consistent with reason to say that the party so consenting shall not be allowed to take advantage of the guilt contracted by doing the act consented to. So, as to condonation, it is reasonable to say that an offence which has been blotted out by forgiveness shall not afterwards be made the subject-matter of accusation. But the same observation is not strictly applicable to a case of compensation by mutual guilt. Both break the sacred obligation into which they have entered; neither instigates or consents to, neither pardons the offence of the other. And although it may not be competent to either to obtain the assistance of a court to punish the offence committed, it by no means follows as a reasonable consequence that each shall be bound to treat the other as an innocent party." This view the learned judge supported (amongst other authorities) by a reference to Govier v. Hancock, and Re v. Flintan, 1 B. & Ad. 227. In the former of these cases it was held that a husband was not bound to sup put his wife where he had turned her out of doors and she had afterwards committed adultery. In the second it was held that a man was not liable to a penalty under 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 3, for refusing to maintain his wife, who had committed adultery and then voluntarily left him.

Mr. Moorsom relied somewhat on the former case, on the ground that if adultery, accompanied by any gross misconduct, did not compensate the wife's adultery, connivance, which was only another form of misconduct, should be equally powerless. But, as we have seen, Cresswell, J.O., in Hope v. Hope, drew a distinction between mutual guilt, which he held not to be compensation, and connivance, which he admitted would entitle an adulterous wife to sue for restitution of conjugal rights. Moreover, in Govier v. Hancock, the wife, when she was turned out of doors, had authority to pledge her husband's credit; and if, having that resource, she nevertheless committed adultery, she placed herself in a similar position to a woman who leaves her husband's house with an adulterer. In Harris v. Morris it was held by Lord Kenyon, C.J., that if a husband condones his wife's adultery and takes her back into his house, and afterwards turns her out of doors, he is liable for necessaries furnished to her. This is in accordance with the judgment of the Irish court and the opinion of Cresswell, J.O. And if a husband is liable to maintain a wife whose adultery he has condoned, it seems to be equally just that he should be liable for necessaries supplied to his wife, whose adultery he has connived at. In the one case he has forgiven the wrong done him, in the other he consented to it; and the maxim Volenti non fit injuria applies. The appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for £40, with costs here and below.

Bosvile v. Attorney-General. (a.)

Legitimacy—Access—Possibility of cohabitation—Presumption of legitimacy—Rebutting evidence.

The presumption in favour of the legitimacy of a child born in wedlock may be negatived by evidence, but such evidence must be strong, distinct, satisfactory, and conclusive.

Motion to enter judgment for the plaintiff, or, in the alternative, for a new trial in an action for a declaration of legitimacy brought by Arthur Bolle Bosvile, an infant, by Gordon Arthur Willis, his next friend. The petition prayed for a declaration that the infant was the legitimate son of Mr. Thomas Bolle Bosvile, and the action was tried before Hannen, P., and a special jury on February 28 and March 2, when the jury found a verdict against the petitioner.

Mr. T. B. Bosvile married E. M. J. Willis on June 14, 1882, and a daughter, Nelly Marion, was born in June, 1883. On June 30, 1884, Mrs. Bosvile eloped from her husband's house with A. W. Craven, and she and her husband had never cohabited since; they had, however, occupied the same bedroom up to the day of the elopement. On April 3, 1885, Mrs. Bosvile gave birth to the infant petitioner. Mr. Bosvile instituted a suit for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with A. W. Craven, and a decree absolute was pronounced on February 16, 1886.

Mr. Bosvile, Nelly Marion, the infant daughter of the marriage, and Mrs. Bosvile were all cited to see the present proceedings, and appeared.

At the trial Mrs. Bosvile's maid gave evidence that on June 29, the day before Mrs. Bosvile left her husband, she was at the commencement of her monthly period. Dr. Barnes, Dr. Priestley, and others gave evidence as to the period of gestation, and two letters written by Mrs. Bosvile to her husband at periods after her elopement were put in. In a letter written in March, 1885, after Mr. Craven had left her, there was a strong appeal to her husband for forgiveness and maintenance. "Surely," she said, "you will not let me starve for the sake of the child I bore you. She is the one link of the past and all that is left of our married life."

Hannen, P., in summing up the case to the jury on the points of law, directed them as follows:—"Now it is to be remembered that in any case of this kind the law prescribes this presumption in the outset, that any child born of a married woman is to be deemed to be the offspring of her husband unless the contrary be shown. That is, the onus of proof rests upon those who assert that the child born in wedlock is not the legitimate offspring of the two married people.

"At one time the law of England went very far in support of that presumption, and did not allow a child born of married people to be declared illegitimate unless it was proved to be impossible that the husband should have had access to the wife. Even to so great an extreme did the law go, that for many years—hundreds of years I may say—it was the law that it must be shown that the man was not in the kingdom; otherwise, if he was in the kingdom, it was to be presumed that the child of his wife was begotten by him.

"But that is not the law now. The law has gradually relaxed those stringent rules, and now a case of this kind is to be determined by a jury like any other question of fact; and it is for the jury to say whether, upon the whole of the evidence given on behalf of those who assert the illegitimacy of the child, the conviction has been brought home to their minds that the husband was not the father of the child.

"Well, there is still another presumption of law which must be called to your attention before we proceed to deal with the particular facts of this case, and that is that if a husband and wife sleep together, and there be no other facts in the case, then it is to be presumed that sexual intercourse takes place between them, and if it were proved to demonstration that at a time when the husband was sleeping with his wife she was carrying on an adulterous intercourse with some other man, so that it would be possible that the child should be the child of either the husband or the paramour, still the presumption is that it is the child of the husband. You will bear in mind, I say, that is where there is nothing else in the case."

And he concluded his summing up as follows:—

"Now, gentlemen, I have gone through the several facts of the case, and the question which I leave to you is this: whether you are convinced by the evidence in the case that this child was not the child of Mr. Bosvile? and my concluding words to you shall be borrowed from the judgment of a very great judge—Lord Lyndhurst—who has dealt with that particular case of which I have mentioned to you some of the salient points. In the case of Morris v. Davies, 5 Cl. & F. 163, after stating his view that the conduct of the parties must be taken into consideration for the purpose of repelling the inference of law arising from the relation of husband and wife, he used this language, which I commend to your attention: 'My lords, this, then, is the view I have always taken of the law connected with this subject; at the same time, as I before expressed and I now feel, that presumption of law—which is that a child born in wedlock is the child of the husband—that presumption of law is not lightly to be repelled. It is not to be broken in upon or shaken by a mere balance of probability; the evidence for the purpose of repelling it must be strong, distinct, satisfactory, and conclusive.' It will be for you to say whether this evidence does establish to your mind conclusively, not by way of conjecture, but by way of conviction, that the child was not begotten by the husband."

The jury found that the infant, Arthur Bolle Bosvile, was not the son of Mr. Thomas Bolle Bosvile.

May 2 and 3.—Gully, Q.C., and Ram, for the petitioner.—In this case, as the husband and wife slept together on the night of June 29, there is an irresistible presumption that the child is legitimate. If intercourse was possible that is sufficient to raise the presumption. To repel it impotency or impossibility of access must be proved.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., Inderwick, Q.C., and C. A. Middleton, contrâ.—That the presumption suggested is not irrebuttable is admitted, as impotency may be shown to rebut it, and, if one class of evidence is admissible, why not another? The jury were properly directed in this case, and the verdict was a reasonable one.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 29.—BUTT, J., delivered the judgment of the court (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and BUTT, J.).—In this as in other cases of the birth of a child during wedlock there is, primâ facie, a strong presumption in favour of legitimacy.

It is contended on the part of the plaintiff that the facts proved and not in dispute establish not merely a strong presumption in favour of the legitimacy of the child, but such a presumption or such presumptions as the law holds incapable of rebuttal, or in the language of the civilians præsumptio, or præsumptiones juris et de jure.

There is the highest authority for saying that the presumption in favour of legitimacy may be rebutted by evidence; but counsel on behalf of the plaintiff contend that the admitted facts of this case preclude such evidence. If we rightly understand their argument it is this—From the admitted fact of the husband and wife having occupied the same bedroom on the night of the 29th—30th of June, and of the wife having given birth to a child on the 3rd of April following, the period between those dates being a not impossible period of gestation, a presumption absolute, and incapable of rebuttal, arises that marital intercourse between the husband and wife occurred on the 29th or 30th of June, and that the fact of marital intercourse being so established, another presumption equally absolute and irrebuttable ensues—viz., that the child born on the 3rd of April was the result of that intercourse. It is not clear to us that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, any such presumption arises. We certainly know of no authority for saying that such presumption of law may be cumulative—i.e., that a presumption based, not on facts established by direct proof, but on another presumption of the same nature, is incapable of rebuttal by evidence.

The decision of the House of Lords in the case of Morris v. Davies appears to us sufficient to support the proposition that the presumption in favour of the legitimacy of a child born in wedlock may be negatived by evidence. In the more recent case of The Aylesford Peerage Lord Blackburn said:—"The case of Morris v. Davies, a decision of this House, decides what, upon the balance of authority without the decision, I should have no hesitation in deciding, that such a presumption can be rebutted, and it also shows that it can be rebutted by the conduct of the parties, taking the whole res gestae, raising a strong and irresistible conclusion that the child born was not the child of the husband, but the child of another."

That being the law on the subject, it is impossible to say that there was misdirection on the part of the learned judge who tried the case, for he read and commended to the jury the following passage from Lord Lyndhurst's opinion in the case of Morris v. Davies:—"My lords, this, then, is the view I have always taken of the law connected with this subject; at the same time, as I before expressed and I now feel, that presumption of law—which is that a child born in wedlock is the child of the husband—that presumption of law is not to be lightly repelled. It is not to be broken in upon or shaken by a mere balance of probability; the evidence for the purpose of repelling it must be strong, distinct, satisfactory, and conclusive." The learned judge added:—"It will be for you to say whether this evidence does establish to your minds conclusively, not by way of conjecture, but by way of conviction, that the child was not the child begotten by the husband."

The direction to the jury being right, it remains to consider whether the verdict ought to be set aside as against the weight of evidence.

Now we agree with the argument that it is not a case in which the jury would be justified in finding against the legitimacy of the child on a mere balance of probabilities. In order to support such a verdict there must be a strongly preponderating body of evidence making against the presumption of legitimacy. The jury, under proper direction, must be taken to have found that such evidence exists in the present case.

In support of the view they took the following facts were established:—The ordinary period of gestation is 270 to 275 days; anything beyond is exceptional. The child was born 276 or 277 days after the last opportunity of intercourse between the husband and wife, and at the time when that opportunity occurred the wife's periodical menstruation had begun—a circumstance that makes marital intercourse on that day, to say the least, improbable. Reckoning backwards from the birth of the child on each of the days from 270 to 275 both inclusive, the lady slept with Mr. Craven and not with her husband.

Menstruation was certainly going on at the time the lady left her husband on June 30. That is a fact which, in the opinion of the medical men examined on the part of the defendant (and there were none called on behalf of the plaintiff), makes strongly against the probability of the child being the husband's. One of the witnesses, Dr. Barnes, said:—"It would almost exclude the idea." Moreover, the lady herself seems to have regarded the child as the child of Mr. Craven and not of the husband. The time fixed by her for the attendance of the monthly nurse was obviously based on a calculation which placed the commencement of the period of gestation subsequent to the day on which she left her husband's house from which day she was living in adultery with Craven. And in her letters to her husband, written in September, 1884, and March, 1885, Mrs. Bosvile not only refrains from suggesting that the child with which she was pregnant was his child, but does not even mention the fact of her pregnancy, although she is imploring forgiveness and asking pecuniary assistance. Under these circumstances we are not prepared to say that the jury were wrong in regarding the evidence against the legitimacy of the child as conclusive. The present application must therefore be refused.

Middleton, on behalf of Mr. Bosvile, applied for costs against the petitioner, but the court refused and expressed an opinion that it was not a case in which costs should be given.

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Appeal, but on October 24 the appeal was abandoned.

In re DILLET. (a.)

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of British Honduras.)

Appeal from criminal proceedings—Grounds of special leave—Conviction of solicitor for perjury—Striking off the roll—Grounds of reversal.

The rule laid down in Falkland Islands Co. v. The Queen, 12 W. R. 220, 1 Moo. P. C. (N. S.) 312, is subject to few exceptions But leave to appeal from a criminal conviction (as from a conviction for perjury in the present case) will be allowed where such conviction is the sole ground for consequential civil penalties (in this case striking off the roll of solicitors), and where the conviction, having been unfairly obtained, is not conclusive as such a ground.

A barrister and solicitor of Honduras appealed against a verdict convicting him of perjury, and against an order of court, founded on the conviction, directing him to be struck off the roll of practitioners.

Held, that the directions of the judge having been grievously unjust to the appellant, the conviction and consequential order must be set aside.

Appeal by special leave from the Supreme Court of Honduras to reverse a conviction for perjury dated the 6th of September, 1884, and to set aside an order of that court dated the 27th of March, 1885, striking the appellant off the roll.

The petition for special leave stated the facts, and alleged thirteen grounds for granting the relief prayed. The thirteenth was "that the Chief Justice in his charge to the jury made statements of alleged facts with reference to the petitioner's conduct on previous and other occasions, of which no evidence had been given at the trial, and which were highly detrimental to the petitioner's character, and calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury against him. In particular the Chief Justice made the observations to the jury marked A., B., and C. There was no evidence before the jury as to the matters commented upon in the extracts A. and B."

Those extracts are as follows:—

A. "As allusions have been made in the affidavits and elsewhere to previous cases of contempt in which Mr. A. M. Dillet was concerned, it was right they should know what these cases were, and it was enough to say that the first time he had had to take notice of Mr. Dillet's conduct was when he (Mr. D.) was engaged in editing the Belize Advertizer. He (the Chief Justice) had made an order in the case of Maximo Carrillo to sell real property, coupled with certain stipulations to be observed when the property should be put up for sale. What punishment did the court give him? He placed himself (at the suggestion of the court) unreservedly in the hands of the court, and nothing was done to him; Mr. Parker, the counsel moving against Mr. Dillet, foregoing all costs in the case. 2. Mr. Dillet having a suit himself pending, in which he (Mr. Dillet) was plaintiff, and Mr. Henry Trumbach, the defendant, plaintiff came to his (the Chief Justice's) house, and brought with him certain papers, demanding an order of the judge. He had ruled, before this, that all business communications to him were to be sent through the clerk of courts. He, therefore, declined to see him. Mr. Dillet then wrote him an offensive letter. Mr. Dillet was again brought before the court. On Mr. Dillet making an affidavit admitting that he had been guilty of a contempt, he got off without any punishment. Mr. Goodman was not then in the colony."

B. "With respect to witnesses to character, if Mr. Dillet had lived at a distance, if he had lived many years out of Belize, he (the Chief Justice) could understand his calling witnesses to character. But then, as he has told the jury, they all know him. Gentlemen, if he says you know him, why call witnesses to character? It may be that you can say of him, though I myself cannot tell, whether he has been a dutiful son, the joy of a mother's heart, the support of a father in his declining years; whether he has been a loyal and staunch husband, a reliable and trusty friend, or whether his name has been mixed up with any tragical or dark transaction. But he (the Chief Justice) begged them to wipe out of their minds what they knew in him to be base, low, and disgraceful, give him all benefit of the good, and try him simply on the evidence before them."

C. "Mr. Dillet tells Mr. Bristowe (according to the former) that he is not coming. He then comes late and says, 'You are asking leading questions.' It is natural for the Attorney-General to say, 'What business is it of yours?' If Mr. Bristowe gave him cause for offence, is that sufficient cause to write such a letter to the Atorney-General? You, gentlemen, are there to stand between the Crown and Mr. Dillet at this his trial. Pause for a second and reflect what the result would be of a verdict in favour of Mr. Dillet. It would be to brand the Attorney-General of the colony, a magistrate, and others, as perjurers; and are you going to brand all the members of my bar as alike perjurers and conspirators? If the jury think so, let them do their duty regardless of consequences."

The appellant appeared in person on the 11th of July, 1885, before Lords Watson, Monkswell, and Hobhouse, Sir Barnes Peacock, and Sir Richard Couch in support of his petition. Their lordships directed the petition and the above extracts to be referred to the Chief Justice for his observations thereon, with liberty for him to appear and show cause.

The Chief Justice's observations appear in their lordship's judgment.

On the 20th of March the appellant in person appeared before their lordships in support of his application for special leave to appeal, and the judgment of their lordships (Lords BLACKBURN, MONKSWELL, HOBHOUSE, and Sir R. COUCH) was delivered by Lord BLACKBURN.—This is a petition for special leave to appeal in a case of rather an unusual kind, and it requires some statement to make the case intelligible.

(a.) Reported by J. M. COLLYER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

of the Supreme Court, on the 23rd of June, 1884, it was ordered that the said Abraham Mallory Dillet should, on Monday, the 30th of June, 1884, appear and answer upon oath the various matters set forth in the affidavits of William Meigh Goodman, Thomas Graham, and Richard Cato in the said matter respectively duly filed.

These affidavits related to the conduct of Abraham Mallory Dillet on the 17th of June, 1884. In substance they disclosed that Mr. Graham was, on the 17th of June, 1884, sitting as judge of a petty debtors' damages court. The sitting had begun at 11 a.m.

Mr. Goodman, who was Attorney-General for the colony, was conducting a case before Mr. Graham, and was opposed by Mr. Bristowe, a solicitor. When Mr. A. M. Dillet came into court, Mr. Graham, in his affidavit says, "I noticed that Mr. A. M. Dillet was apparently under the influence of drink." Mr. Dillet interfered, and, "after some words with Mr. Goodman, objected to Mr. Goodman asking leading questions, and called my attention." He states that, after some discussion whether Mr. Dillet was retained or not, Mr. Dillet left the court. Mr. Graham further says:—"Mr. A. M. Dillet's conduct and demeanour throughout were unbecoming a solicitor and a professional man; and appearing, as he did, under the influence of drink, his temper seemed to be excited and uncontrollable, so that I, as judge of the court, had more than once to call him to order, and twice I got up from the bench and threatened to adjourn the court."

The court was, in the ordinary course, adjourned from twelve to three o'clock. After it resumed Mr. Graham saw Mr. A. Dillet come into court with a whip in his hand and take his seat opposite Mr. Goodman. But, apparently on the persuasion of Mr. Bristowe, he left the court.

Mr. Goodman, in his affidavit, gives nearly the same account of what passed in court as that given by Mr. Graham, and states that on his leaving court at twelve o'clock and going to his own chambers he found a note in Mr. Dillet's handwriting addressed to him. It was in the following terms:—

"Sir,—You are an impertinent fellow. If you continue your rudeness by me I shall thrash you.

"Your obedient Servant,

"A. M. DILLET."

Richard Cato, the crier of the court, in his affidavit states that about 2.30 p.m. on the 17th of June, 1884, Mr. A. M. Dillet came to him. He says: "I saw Mr. A. M. Dillet was intoxicated and had a riding-whip in his hand. He then said to me, 'Cato, I want you to take a message to the Attorney-General. Tell him, with my compliments, I wish to see him.'" Cato brought back the answer that Mr. Goodman would not see Mr. Dillet, and Cato swears that Mr. Dillet then said, "He does not wish to see me. I want to thrash him, and if he comes here I will thrash his damned hide." It seems obvious that on such affidavits the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to order Mr. Dillet, a solicitor, and as such the officer of the court, to answer the matters in them, and on hearing his answers to adjudicate on the conduct of the solicitor.

Mr. A. M. Dillet made a long affidavit. It has now been returned from the colony and is to be found in the record. It contains many statements, in the technical sense of the word, impertinent, and does not in any way improve his position. It is difficult to doubt that on these affidavits the Supreme Court might, if it had adjudicated on them, have properly come to the conclusion that A. M. Dillet had been guilty of misconduct as a solicitor, and passed such a sentence as would be adequate to that misconduct.

But that course was not taken. The Attorney-General filed an information containing one count charging A. M. Dillet with perjury in having sworn, in answer to the affidavits of Goodman and Graham stating that he appeared under the influence of drink, "I positively say I was not so," and a second count imputing perjury in swearing, "As to the affidavit of the aforesaid Richard Cato, I deny that I was intoxicated as alleged."

The information was tried before the Chief Justice and after a long trial the jury, on the 6th of September 1884, returned a verdict of guilty, and sentence of six months' imprisonment was pronounced.

After the imprisonment had been undergone the following order was made:—

"In the Supreme Court of British Honduras, 1885.

"In the matter of Abraham Mallory Dillet, a solicitor of this honourable court.

"Upon the motion of Frederick Hardyman Parker acting Attorney-General of British Honduras, and upon reading the affidavit by him made and filed therein, it is ordered that the said acting Attorney-General have leave to serve Abraham Mallory Dillet, a solicitor of this court, with notice of motion for 11 a.m. 27th of March instant, before this honourable court, for an immediate order that the said Abraham Mallory Dillet be struck off the roll of practitioners of this said court as a solicitor thereof, on the ground that the said Abraham Mallory Dillet was tried and convicted of a misdemeanour, to wit, of perjury, at the sittings of this honourable court for criminal business, August, 1884, and was thereupon sentenced and committed to six months' imprisonment in the gaol of Belize; and that the said Abraham Mallory Dillet do pay the costs of and incidental to this application, and the proceedings consequent thereon.—Dated at Belize, this 26th March, 1885.—BY ORDER."

The affidavit consisted only of a verification of the certificate of the conviction.

Mr. Dillet, in an affidavit sworn on the 27th of March, admitted personal service on him of a notice of the 26th of March, about 1 p.m., and stated that he verily believed the whole proceedings from beginning to end in the matter of his trial for perjury were contrary to law.

He, before this board, verbally stated to their lordships that he was in court on the 27th of March, and heard the Chief Justice make the order as moved for, but, having sailed for England on the ensuing day, never saw the formal order.

It was solely on this ground that the order proceeded; there never has been any adjudication on the order to answer the matters in the affidavits.

A conviction for a grave offence is a ground for justifying the conclusion that the person convicted is not a proper person to be a solicitor: Ex parte Brownsell, 2 Cowp. 829; In re King, 8 Q. B. 129.

No appeal against the striking the petitioner off the roll can be of use unless it is open on it to the appellant to show that the conviction was obtained in such a manner that it ought not to have this effect against him.

When this petition was before the committee in 1885 they reported to her Majesty, as their opinion, that the petition, together with certain extracts from the charge of the Chief Justice, as reported in the Colonial Guardian, should be referred to the Chief Justice of Honduras, in order that he might make such observations on the petition and the allegations contained in the extracts as he might think fit, and that his Honour the Chief Justice ought to be directed to return such observations to the Registrar of the Privy Council in order that the same might be laid before this board and considered by their lordships. These have now been returned. After considering them, their lordships think that there is ground for inquiry as to whether the Chief Justice did not, more especially if he spoke to the purport stated in the extracts B. and C. even after giving effect to his observations, obtain the verdict of the jury in such a way that it ought not to be considered satisfactory and conclusive against the petitioner, in which case the order striking him off the rolls on the ground on which it was made should not stand.

In Falkland Islands Co. v. The Queen, 12 W. R. 220, 1 Moo. P.C. (N.S.) 312, it is said: "It may be assumed that the Queen has authority, by virtue of her prerogative, to review decisions of all colonial courts, whether the proceedings be of a civil or criminal character, unless her Majesty has parted with such authority. But the inconvenience of entertaining such appeals in cases of a strictly criminal nature is so great, the obstruction which it would offer to the administration of justice in the colonies is so obvious, that it is very rarely that applications to this board, similar to the present, have been attended by success."

In this statement of the general practice their lordships agree. They are not prepared to advise her Majesty to make this conviction for perjury an exception if it were not made the sole foundation for the subsequent order of the 27th of March, 1885.

Their lordships do not think that the petitioner has made out any one of the first twelve grounds of objection stated in his petition, and they do not advise that he should be allowed to appeal on any of these twelve grounds. Nor are they to be taken as considering it as established that the summing-up of the Chief Justice really was as reported in the Colonial Guardian.

But they think, after considering the observations of the Chief Justice, Mr. Dillet ought to be permitted, on appeal, to show, if he can, that, on the grounds stated in his 13th reason, the conviction was obtained in a manner so unsatisfactory that the conviction alone ought not to be conclusive as a ground for striking him off the rolls.

Their lordships will humbly advise her Majesty that the petitioner be at liberty to appeal against the order of the 27th of March, 1885, striking him off the roll, and also to the extent above stated, and no further, against the conviction for perjury.

Leave being thus given, the appeal came on for hearing on the 10th of March, 1887.

R. O. B. Lane (Willis, Q.C., with him) for the appellant.

March 19.—The judgment of their lordships (Lord WATSON, Lord FITZGERALD, and Sir BARNES PEACOCK) was delivered by Lord WATSON.—This appeal is brought by Abraham Mallory Dillet, of the Inner Temple, barrister-at-law, against a verdict returned by a jury on the 6th of September, 1884, finding him guilty of the crime of perjury before William Anthony Musgrave Sheriff, who was at that time Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of British Honduras; and also against a consequential order of the Chief Justice, dated the 27th of March, 1885, directing the appellant to be struck off the list of practitioners of that court. Such appeals are of rare occurrence, because the rule has been repeatedly laid down, and has been invariably followed, that her Majesty will not review or interfere with the course of criminal proceedings, unless it is shown that, by a disregard of the fundamental process, or by some violation of the principles of natural justice, or otherwise, substantial and grave injustice has been done.

Along with his petition for leave to appeal, the appellant produced a printed report of the charge of the presiding judge, and, inter alia, alleged (reason 13) that the judge had made statements to the jury with reference to his conduct on other occasions, of which no evidence had been given at the trial; and he referred in particular to three extracts from the charge, marked respectively A., B., and C., as calculated to prejudice unduly the minds of the jury against him. By Order in Council of the 12th of August, 1885, her Majesty directed the petition and these extracts to be referred to the Chief Justice, in order that he might make such observations thereon as he might think fit, and further ordered that he should be at liberty to appear and show cause against the prayer of the petitioner. His honour did not avail himself of the leave thus given him, but forwarded his observations to the Registrar of the Privy Council. These observations were submitted to this board, and upon their report her Majesty, by Order in Council of the 3rd of April, 1886, allowed the appellant to enter and prosecute his appeal upon the ground stated in the 13th reason of his petition—viz., that the conviction was obtained in a manner so unsatisfactory that the conviction alone ought not to be conclusive as a ground for striking him off the roll. The Chief Justice was duly served with the appeal, but has not made appearance.

The prosecution of the appellant for perjury had its origin in these circumstances. The Chief Justice received a communication from Mr. Goodman, the Attorney-General of Honduras, bringing under his notice the conduct of the appellant in the inferior court at two sittings of the court held upon the 17th of June, 1884, and in the presence of the acting magistrate. His honour thereupon directed the affidavits of three persons who were present on those occasions to be prepared and submitted to him for his approval, and these were subsequently sworn to by the deponents. Two of them (the Attorney-General and the acting magistrate) stated that the appellant "appeared to be under the influence of drink"; the third (Cato, the court crier) stated, "I saw that he was intoxicated." The Chief Justice appointed the appellant to answer the affidavits, and the appellant accordingly made an affidavit in which he stated that he was not "under the influence of drink," and denied Cato's statement that he was intoxicated. Upon consideration of these statements in the appellant's affidavit, the Chief Justice, acting under the authority of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, which has been extended to Honduras, directed the Attorney-General to prosecute the appellant for perjury, and a criminal information was filed by that officer on the 15th of August, 1884, containing two counts, one founded upon the appellant's contradiction of the Attorney-General and the magistrate, and the other upon his contradiction of Cato's statement. The trial commenced upon the 27th of August, 1884, and, after occupying eight days, terminated in a verdict of guilty by a majority of five to two, accompanied by a recommendation to the sympathy of the court.

It is very unfortunate that, owing to the fact of there being but one member of the Supreme Court of British Honduras, the trial took place before the same judge who had directed the affidavits to be prepared and submitted to him, had appointed the appellant to answer them, and, upon the affidavit and answers being made, had directed the prosecution. These circumstances may in some measure account for, although they cannot, in the opinion of their lordships, justify many of the observations which were addressed by the Chief Justice to the jury.

The issue which the jury had to try was a very simple one. They had to consider, in the first place, whether the accused was under the influence of liquor on the occasions libelled; and, in the second place, whether he knew and believed that he was so at the time when he made affidavits to the contrary. Unless they were satisfied on both these points, the jury had no right to find the appellant guilty. A man labouring under excitement may appear to others to be under the influence of drink when he is not; and, although he is actually under that influence, he may be unconscious of the fact. The only question submitted to the jury was, whether the appellant's behaviour in court on the 17th of June, 1884, was due to drink. A misdirection of that kind would not necessarily afford a ground for setting aside a conviction in a criminal case. But in the extract C., which the Chief Justice in his observations states to be "substantially correct," he thus put the case against the accused :—"Pause for a second and reflect what the result would be of a verdict in favour of Mr. Dillet. It would be to brand the Attorney-General of the colony, a magistrate, and others as perjurers, and are you going to brand all the members of my bar as alike perjurers and conspirators? If the jury think so, let them do their duty regardless of consequences." Comment upon that language is needless. It grossly misrepresented the real issue, and was most unfair to the accused, whose acquittal by the jury would have cast no imputation of perjury, or even of untruthfulness, either upon the officials alluded to, or upon the members of the Honduras bar.

The Chief Justice does not, in his observations, impeach the substantial accuracy of the extract A., which is sufficiently vouched by the affidavits produced, but he vindicates the remarks contained in that extract by pointing out that the records in the four cases therein referred to were put in evidence by the prosecutor before the case was closed, and that the appellant was the first to refer to these cases of contempt. Apparently, the Chief Justice has failed to appreciate the gravamen of the objections which the appellant takes to the remarks in question, which are, in their lordships' opinion, well founded. The judge not only uses these records in a manner altogether unwarrantable, but he converts himself into a witness, and, without being sworn, makes statements to the jury regarding a visit of the accused to his (the Chief Justice's) private house and other matters, which are neither to be found in these records nor in the evidence.

The remarks contained in extract B. are a little, but not much, less objectionable. Their lordships have not, in estimating their character, taken into account a reference which is therein made to a certain "tragical or dark transaction." The Chief Justice, in his observations, states that he has no recollection of making, and is under the impression that he did not make, such a reference, and their lordships have assumed, for the purpose of this appeal, that he did not do so, although there are affidavits produced by persons who heard the words, including one reverend gentleman, who took them down in shorthand at the time they were uttered to the jury.

It would be neither pleasant nor profitable to criticize more minutely the directions of the Chief Justice to the jury, so far as contained in these extracts. Their lordships are of opinion that these directions were grievously unjust to the appellant, and in many instances outraged the proprieties of judicial procedure. A conviction obtained by such unworthy means cannot be permitted to stand; and their lordships will humbly advise her Majesty to set aside the verdict and conviction appealed from. Seeing that the appellant has already undergone the sentence which followed upon the verdict, it is unnecessary to order a new trial. Their lordships will also humbly advise her Majesty to reverse the order of the 27th of March, 1885, removing the appellant from the roll of practitioners of the Supreme Court of British Honduras. Their lordships will direct a copy of their judgment in this case to be communicated to one of her Majesty's Secretaries of State.

Lunacy.

Practice—Petition in Chancery Division as well as in Lunacy—New trustees—Verification of consent—Rules of Court (December, 1885), ord. 38, r. 19a.

On a petition in the Chancery Division as well as in Lunacy the signature of a proposed trustee to his consent to act may be verified as provided by ord. 38, r. 19a, and the old practice requiring an affidavit need not be followed.

G. B. Hume, a trustee of, and a beneficiary under, two wills and a settlement, being of unsound mind, though not so found, and the other trustees desiring to retire, a petition was presented by the beneficiaries under the three instruments in Lunacy and in the Chancery Division asking that two named persons might be appointed trustees of the three instruments in the place of the existing trustees, and for the necessary vesting orders.

The consent of the proposed trustees was verified in the manner provided by Rules of the Supreme Court, ord. 38, r. 19*a* (December, 1885).

Onslow, for the petition.—It was held in In re Wilson, 31 Ch. D. 522, 34 W. R. Dig. 202, a case in Lunacy, that the old practice was to be followed, and that an affidavit was necessary, but ord. 38, r. 19*a*, is applicable where the petition is in the Chancery Division as well as in Lunacy.

Leeke, for the existing trustees.

COTTON, L.J.—The consent is sufficiently verified. The General Orders do not apply to lunacy proceedings, but where the petition is in the Chancery Division as well I think the chancery rule may be followed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

In 1849 the predecessor in title of the plaintiff, W. H. Hall, granted a lease of the premises, No. 339, Edgware-road, for a term of eighty years. The lease contained a restrictive covenant by which the lessee covenanted that he, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns "shall not at any time during the term use, exercise, or carry on in or upon the said demised premises, or permit or suffer any part thereof to be occupied by any person or persons who shall use, occupy, or carry on therein, any noisome or offensive trade, business, or employment whatsoever without the consent in writing of the lessor, his heirs or assigns, first had and obtained."

In 1851 the original lessee sub-demised the premises by way of mortgage for the residue of the term of eighty years, less three days.

In 1865 the executors of the mortgagee, in exercise of the power of sale in the mortgage, sold the sub-lease to the present defendant, J. Ewin, who purchased with notice of the restrictive covenant in the original lease.

In October, 1885, Ewin demised the premises to the defendant G. McNeff for a term of twenty-one years, and the demise to McNeff contained a covenant by McNeff with Ewin in terms similar to the restrictive covenant in the original lease.

McNeff entered into possession of the premises, and in February, 1886, he opened an exhibition of wild animals on the premises.

An action was brought by the plaintiff, W. H. Hall, as successor in title of the original lessor, and by one of the tenants of premises adjoining, claiming an injunction against the defendants Ewin and McNeff to restrain the defendants from using or permitting the premises to be used for the purpose of carrying on there an exhibition of wild animals . . . and from using . . . or carrying on upon the premises, or permitting or suffering any part thereof to be occupied by any person or persons who should use . . . or carry on therein, any noisome trade. . . .

The facts of the case with reference to the conduct of the defendant Ewin, as shown by the evidence, were as follows:—The solicitor of the plaintiff Hall, before the issue of the writ, wrote letters to the defendant Ewin complaining of McNeff's user of the premises, and requesting Ewin to stop it. The defendant Ewin was ill at the time and did not answer these letters, but on the 12th of March, some days prior to the issue of the writ, a clerk of Ewin's told the plaintiff's solicitor that Ewin would speak to McNeff about it, and on the 14th of March McNeff wrote a letter to the plaintiff's solicitor in which he said: "Out of respect to my landlord, Mr. Ewin, I have closed the exhibition on these premises." The defendant McNeff did not in fact close the exhibition, and on the 18th of March, 1886, the plaintiffs accordingly issued the writ in the action, claiming an injunction against both McNeff and Ewin.

Kekewich, J., granted an injunction against both the defendants.

The defendant Ewin appealed.

Romer, Q.C., and Farwell, for the appellant.—The judge below construed the words "not to suffer" as being tantamount to "hinder or prevent." [LINDLEY, L.J.—Is there not a recent case bearing on the meaning of such words in a covenant of this kind? Romer, Q.C.—Perhaps Attorney-General v. Guardians of Dorking, 30 W. R. 579, 20 Ch. D. 595, is the case you refer to? LINDLEY, L.J.—No, that is not the case.*] Ewin is not liable on the covenant at law or in equity: Cox v. Bishop, 5 W. R. 437, 8 De G. M. & G. 815. Neither is he liable under the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774, for that principle is confined to the enforcement, by means of an injunction, of covenants of a negative kind, and is not to be extended so as to compel the doing of something actively—e.g., the taking of an action against another: Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society, 30 W. R. 299, 8 Q. B. D. 403; London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 620, 20 Ch. D. 562; Austerberry v. Corporation of Oldham, 33 W. R. 807, 29 Ch. D. 750. There is no evidence or admission here that Ewin has sanctioned or consented to McNeff's user of the premises as an exhibition for wild animals. The cases of Parker v. Whyte, 11 W. R. 683, 1 H. & M. 167; Clements v. Welles, 14 W. R. 187, L. R. 1 Eq. 200; and Carter v. Williams, 18 W. R. 593, L. R. 9 Eq. 678 are therefore distinguishable.

Nichol v. Fenning, 30 W. R. 95, 19 Ch. D. 258, was also referred to.

Warmington, Q.C., and D. Sturges, for the respondents.—The defendant Ewin, by "suffering" his tenant McNeff to occupy the premises while carrying on this business, has acted contrary to the covenant of which he had notice, and therefore is liable to be restrained on the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay, or, if the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay does not cover this case, Ewin is, at all events, having purchased with notice of the covenant, bound in equity as a covenantor in equity: Baily v. De Crespigny, 17 W. R. 494, L. R. 4 Q. B. 180. Austerberry v. Corporation of Oldham, and all the cases of that description, only decide that where a person is in possession of the premises an injunction will not be granted to compel such person to do some collateral act, but only to restrain him from using the premises in any manner contrary to the covenant. But where a person who has notice of a restrictive covenant is not in possession of the premises, but has sub-let them to another who breaks the covenant, the original lessor in an action for injunction against the person in possession is entitled to make the person so sub-letting a defendant also, in order to render him liable for the payment of costs.

Farwell replied on the question of costs only.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendant Ewin against a judgment of Kekewich, J., granting an injunction against him.

The predecessor in title of the plaintiff Hall granted a lease containing a restrictive covenant, the original lessee mortgaged his interest by way of sub-demise, the mortgagee sold, and the defendant Ewin was the purchaser. Ewin, therefore, was an under-lessee, and, as such, is not at law bound by the covenants in the original lease, there being no privity of estate existing between him and the original lessor. Ewin is not in occupation of the premises, and it is not necessary, therefore, to consider the question as to how far the covenant is one running with the land, at law. Relief, if any, against the defendant Ewin must be, not on any doctrine of common law, but on the equitable principle established in Tulk v. Moxhay. Now in my opinion it would be an extension, and a wrong extension, of the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay to hold that the defendant Ewin is bound under it. [The Lord Justice here read the words of the restrictive covenant in the original lease, and continued:—] Ewin granted a sub-lease to McNeff with a covenant by McNeff not to exercise or carry on upon the premises any noisome trade, business, or employment without the consent in writing of Ewin first had and obtained. If Ewin had given a licence to McNeff to carry on any noisome trade, &c., the case would be quite different, as then Ewin would have done something active, contrary to the terms of the covenant. But Ewin has done nothing, and can he be said to have broken the covenant by merely standing by and doing nothing?

As I understand the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay, it is that, where there is a restrictive covenant, though not binding on the defendant at law, if the defendant has purchased with notice of the restrictive covenant, a court of equity will not allow him to use the land in any way inconsistent with the restrictive covenant; but the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay has never been carried to the length of compelling a defendant to do any act entailing, or which might entail, the expenditure of money. The plaintiff here seeks, not to restrain Ewin from doing anything, but to compel him to bring an action against his sub-tenant, who is in possession of the premises. In my opinion it would be wrong to make Ewin liable for not bringing an action against McNeff. [The Lord Justice here referred to the letters in evidence, and said:—] There is no evidence whatever to show that the defendant Ewin gave any sanction or permission to McNeff to carry on this exhibition; on the contrary, the evidence put in by the plaintiff himself negatives even the idea of any tacit consent.

On the facts proved, therefore, in my opinion it would be wrong to grant any injunction against Ewin.

On the question of costs, I first thought that the fact that Ewin did not reply to the letter of the plaintiff's solicitor might have rendered Ewin liable to pay costs. But the evidence shows that a week before the action was brought the plaintiff's solicitor saw a clerk of Ewin's, who promised that Ewin would send to his tenant and try to get him to stop the nuisance, and the letter of the 15th of March, 1886, written by McNeff to the plaintiff, shows that Ewin requested McNeff to close the exhibition. In my opinion, therefore, Ewin cannot be made to pay the costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The evidence shows that McNeff, the person in possession, was using the premises in a way not allowed by the covenant. Now McNeff could not have been sued on the covenant at law, but on the equitable doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay he would have been bound and would be restrained from using the property in a manner not in accordance with the covenant. But Ewin was not in possession, and was not using the property in a manner contrary to the covenant. He was in fact, I think, doing what he could to stop this exhibition. The evidence as to the interview of the plaintiff's solicitor with Ewin's clerk on March 12, and the expression contained in McNeff's letter of March 15, shows this. The fact that Ewin was ill at the time is, I think, important, as showing a reason for his not answering the letters of the plaintiff. There is no evidence at all to show that Ewin in fact consented to McNeff's carrying on this exhibition. Now the part of the covenant on which the plaintiffs rely is that the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns "shall not . . . permit or suffer any part of the demised premises to be occupied by any person . . . who shall use or carry on therein any noisome or offensive business," and they contend that the defendant Ewin is suffering his under-tenant to occupy the premises and carry on this exhibition. But it is all important to bear in mind that Ewin is not an assign of the original lessee, and is not bound in law by that covenant in the sense that an action for damages could be maintained against him. The plaintiffs therefore must rely only on the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay. This is, therefore, an attempt to extend the principle of that case to a person not in possession of the land at all, and who is not doing any act, but simply abstaining from ejecting his under-tenant. In my opinion, to do so would be to extend the principle to what it ought not to apply to. The principles on which the judges in Haywood v. The Brunswick Building Society refused to extend the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay so as to compel the person in possession to incur expense apply to this case. I don't think it would be right to grant an injunction against Ewin because he has not brought an action against McNeff—for that is what it comes to. There is nothing to justify us in forcing Ewin to bring such an action.

LOPES, L.J.—An action at law on the covenant is clearly not maintainable here, but the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay is relied on. That doctrine is, that a court of equity will not permit a purchaser of land with notice of a restrictive covenant to use the land in a way prohibited by the terms of the covenant. Now what are the facts here? We must look to the evidence to ascertain them. [The Lord Justice here referred to the evidence and continued:—] If Ewin had let this house with notice of the purposes for which McNeff intended to use it, the case would then be different, and an injunction against Ewin might have been right. But there is no evidence of any sanction or acquiescence by Ewin, and it is quite consistent with all the facts proved that Ewin might have taken measures to prevent the user complained of—short of bringing an action for that purpose—when he became aware of the user. The judge in the court below seems to have construed the words in the covenant "not to suffer" as if they were equivalent to "hinder and forbid." I do not think they bear that construction.

I express no opinion as to how this case would be if Ewin were assignee of the original lease.

DAVIES BROTHERS & CO. v. DAVIES. (a.)

Covenant in restraint of trade — Covenant to retire so far as the law allows—Validity—Reasonableness—Vagueness.

A deed executed on the dissolution of a partnership between E. D., E. A. D., and J. D., contained the following covenant by J. D.:—"The said J. D. (1) to retire wholly and absolutely from the partnership; and, (2) so far as the law allows, from the trade or business thereof in all its branches; and (3) not to trade, act, or deal in any way so as to either directly or indirectly affect E. D. and E. A. D."

Held, as to (2) and (3), that they were too vague to be enforced, and were therefore void.

Held, also, as to (3), that it was a covenant entered into for the protection of E. D. and E. A. D. personally, and that it therefore did not pass to their assignees with the goodwill of the business.

Per Cotton, L.J.—It is still the law that a covenant in general restraint of trade, unlimited both as to time and space, is void.

Per Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.—Whether having regard to altered circumstances which now exist in England the old rule still prevails, quære.

Decision of Kekewich, J., reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The plaintiff E. A. Davies and the defendant, J. Davies, were half brothers, and they had formerly carried on business in partnership with their father, who was since dead, in London and Wolverhampton as galvanizers and galvanized iron manufacturers. The partnership was dissolved, and E. A. Davies and his father purchased the defendant's interest in the business and goodwill thereof, which he assigned to them by a deed dated the 11th of October, 1884.

The deed contained the following covenant by the defendant:—"The said James Davies to retire wholly and absolutely from the partnership, and, so far as the law allows, from the trade or business thereof in all its branches, and not to trade, act, or deal in any way so as either directly or indirectly to affect the said E. Davies (the father) and the said E. A. Davies."

The business was afterwards sold to the plaintiff company.

In 1885 the defendant commenced business in Old-street, London, as galvanized iron merchant and manufacturer, in partnership with one Codner, who had been a traveller for the old firm. This trading was alleged to be a breach of the covenant, and the company and E. A. Davies brought the action to restrain the defendant from so trading.

Kekewich, J., granted an injunction restraining the defendant from carrying on business in Old-street, or otherwise trading, acting, or dealing so as directly or indirectly to affect the company in their business.

From this decision the defendant appealed.

Barber, Q.C., Cock, Q.C., and Russell Roberts, for the appellant.—That part of the covenant which provides that the defendant shall retire, "so far as the law allows," from the trade or business of the partnership in all its branches is too vague for the court to enforce, and is therefore void. The latter part of the covenant, in respect of which Kekewich, J., granted the injunction, and which provides that the defendant shall not "trade, act, or deal in any way so as to either directly or indirectly affect the plaintiff and E. Davies, is in unlimited restraint of trade, and is also void. Further, this part of the covenant is personal, and did not pass with the goodwill of the business to the plaintiff company.

Warmington, Q.C., and C. Walker, for the respondents.—The old common law rule that a covenant in general restraint of trade is bad no longer exists, but the test of the validity of such a covenant as the present is whether the restriction is reasonably necessary for the protection of the covenantee.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9.—COTTON, L.J. [after stating the facts and reading the covenant, continued:—] There is no difficulty as to the first part of the covenant, that the defendant should retire wholly and absolutely from the partnership; the difficulty arises upon the second and third parts. I will first deal with the second part of the covenant, and I must say that there is an example here which ought not to be followed. Where parties have entered into an agreement to execute a deed to contain certain covenants, they ought certainly to work out their agreement, and not come to the court simply to construe what was intended to be an executory agreement. For what the court is here asked is not to enforce specific performance of an agreement by directing a proper deed to be executed, but as a matter of construction to say what is the proper effect of this covenant. For my part I shall decline, when the matter comes before us in this way, to treat it as executory, and to consider how and in what way the court would direct an agreement with these words in it to be construed. But that is not the ground on which I intend to decide this case. Is this covenant one which the law will allow? That is the point I intend to take, because it was said that this might be a contract to retire from the trade or business in all its branches if and so far as the law allows. In my opinion, if that is the covenant, it is one which the law will not allow, because it is an absolute restraint upon the defendant during his lifetime from anywhere carrying on within England the business in which he was exercised. Kekewich, J., held that, in consequence of the change of circumstances which now exist in England, the old rule which was laid down from very early times, that covenants in restraint of trade are bad, was no longer to be considered as the law of the court, and, after the discussion which has taken place, and with my views of the covenant, we must consider that.

That that was the old law is undoubted, and I think in the Year Books in Henry V.'s reign there is a case which lays down generally that covenants in restraint of trade are bad; that it is contrary to public policy and to the interests of the public that any man should be restrained from carrying on an honest business for the best of his own advantage and for that of the public. That was originally the rule, but undoubtedly, to some extent, it has been modified, and it has been held that partial restraints might be good. Even when that was established, it was first of all said that the court must, when it is asked to enforce such a covenant, see whether the consideration was sufficient. Now that is gone, because, if there is valuable consideration, the court will leave the parties to consider whether that consideration is or is not sufficient. And where there has been a partial restraint only, the court has considered whether it was reasonably necessary for the protection of the covenantee. But has the court gone further than that? It is said there are cases which have laid down that the only thing to be considered in judging whether these covenants can be enforced or not, and whether they are valid or not (for it is not only a question of equity), is whether they are reasonable. Of course, Mr. Warmington contended that all that must be considered as regards the reasonableness was what was reasonably required for the protection of the covenantee. But it is very probable that the first rule which I mentioned, that absolute covenants in restraint of trade are bad is because they are not reasonable, and in that sense it may be that what we have to consider is whether they are reasonable. But, in my opinion, if we look at the cases on which Mr. Warmington relied, we see this, that, where there has been a limited restraint, and a limited restraint only, the court has considered, with reference to the validity of the covenant, whether, though the restraint is limited, it is reasonable, and, of course, that must be considered, even stating the rule, as I have endeavoured to do—namely, that an absolute restraint is bad, but that a limited restraint may be good, provided it is reasonable only, and such as is required for the protection of the covenantee. If we look at the cases which have been referred to by Mr. Warmington in argument, I think it will be found that they are really cases where the judges, though admitting the general rule, and sometimes doing so expressly, have considered, as regards a partial covenant which was before them, whether the case was one in which the restraint was reasonable.

The first case to which I will refer is Hitchcock v. Coker. That case got rid of the rule as to inquiry into the sufficiency of the consideration, but in other respects it deals with the question whether, in that case, the particular restraint was reasonable or not. That case, which was decided in 1837, was twice considered, once before the Divisional Court and again in the Exchequer Chamber. There the covenant was of the most limited description, because it purported to restrain the defendant from carrying on his business at Taunton or within three miles thereof. It was most limited as regards space, and therefore the observations of the judges which are relied on must be considered with reference to that covenant, and not generally with reference to covenants which are not so limited. What Tindal, C.J., says is this (at p. 456): "We cannot, therefore, hold the agreement in this case to be void, merely on the ground of the restriction being indefinite as to duration, the same being in other respects a reasonable restriction." That decision, I think, introduced the rule that if a covenant is in any way sufficiently limited either as regards space or as regards time, then it will not be considered as an absolute restraint of trade, but only a limited restraint, and then the question as to whether that limitation is reasonable or not will come into consideration.

To my mind that case showed no departure at all from the old rule, unless it was a departure from the old principle of considering the sufficiency of the consideration. I will not go through all the cases, but afterwards, in 1843, in Mallan v. May, 11 M. & W., at p. 664, the rule was laid down, as I understand it, most clearly by Parke, B., in these terms (at p. 664): "The rule, as laid down by Lord Macclesfield and Lord Chief Justice Willes, is that total restraints of trade which the law so much favours are absolutely bad, and that all restraints, though only partial, if nothing more appear, are presumed to be bad." That, I think, must be modified to this extent, that the presumption is not to be that such restraints are bad, but it is rather a matter for the court to consider whether, on the facts of the particular cases, they are or are not bad. "But, if the circumstances are set forth, that presumption may be excluded, and the court are to judge of those circumstances and determine whether the contract be valid or not." He then quotes a passage from the judgment in Mitchel v. Reynolds, and he does that undoubtedly, not as his own opinion, but as the rule that is laid down by earlier judges. He does not in any way deal with it as a rule to be departed from owing to the fact of there having been a very great alteration in the circumstances of the kingdom between the year 1843 and the time when Mitchel v. Reynolds was decided. Then Parke, B., continues: "Contracts for the partial restraint of trade are upheld, not because they are advantageous to the individual with whom the contract is made, and a sacrifice pro tanto of the rights of the community, but because it is for the benefit of the public at large that they should be enforced." And that he was considering when he entered into the question as to whether or not in that particular case the restriction was reasonable or not.

I have omitted to mention several cases in which there have been these considerations, but all of them are cases where there was a partial restraint to be dealt with, and the judges were applying themselves, not to the general rule, but to the general rule as applicable to restraints so limited.

But then it is said that not only are there these expressions of opinion, which, I think, in their application are misunderstood, but that there is authority which now leads to the conclusion that the old rule is gone, and is a thing of the past. Now what are those cases? I will take them in chronological order, because I think that that is probably the best way of dealing with them. Whittaker v. Howe, before Lord Langdale, was first in date, and undoubtedly that was a strong case, because the covenant there was an absolute one, restraining a solicitor from practising in any part of Great Britain for twenty years. I doubt myself whether the limit of time there being so large the covenant was rightly considered as a limited one. It was, however, so treated by Lord Langdale, and it was therefore open to him to consider whether or not the limit was a reasonable one. He held that it was; but that does not show a departure from the general rule.

The next case is that of The Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont, before James, L.J., when Vice-Chancellor. That undoubtedly was a strong case, having regard only to the expressions used by the learned judge when he decided the case. But, in fact, what really was in contest there was a contract as to the divulging of a trade secret, and the covenant not to carry on the trade was only connected with, and in order to give effect to, the contract not to divulge the trade secret; and although he does make general observations in his judgment, yet, in my opinion, the case must be considered so far as it is a decision only on a contract applicable to a trade secret, and not to a covenant generally in restraint or in prohibition of trade. I find that Wickens, V.C., in Allsopp v. Wheatcroft, does treat that case before James, V.C., as being a case of a trade secret, and not of an ordinary covenant in restraint of trade, because what he says is this:—"No doubt, in the case of The Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont, James, L.J., then Vice-Chancellor, threw some doubt on the existence of a hard and fast rule which makes a covenant in restraint of trade invalid if unlimited in area; but there were expressions in the instrument in that case limiting the generality of the covenant, and it was in substance a case of a different class from this, since the restriction against trading was only a consequence of a clearly lawful restriction against divulging a trade secret. In this point of view it may probably be thought to bear some analogy to Wallis v. Day. Assenting, as I do, to everything that was said in Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont, I can hardly treat it as authorizing me to depart from the recognized rule as to limitation of space in a case so different from it as the present is, and, unless that rule be departed from, the covenant here is clearly bad." Wickens, V.C., on whose opinion I lay great store, not only treats this case as I do, but, what is probably more important, he treats the old rule as still subsisting in the year 1872 and as the law of the court. I may observe here with reference to that observation of his that the covenant was limited to the period during which certain patents, the right to obtain which throughout Europe was granted to the plaintiff, were to last, and it may be that it was limited in time, though not in space, in such a way as to make it a limited and not a general covenant. With great respect to the late James, L.J., if he intended to express his view that the cases authorized him to say that on the ground of policy the old rule had been departed from, he could not, in my opinion, have sufficiently considered to what it was that the observations of the judges relied on by Mr. Warmington were addressed, which were not to the general question whether absolute covenants were good, but to the question whether limited covenants were in the particular cases good, and laying down the rule which ought to be applied to such cases. If, then, Wickens, V.C., was not aware that the old rule had been departed from (as I own I am not), I am confirmed in my opinion by what was said in Collins v. Locke by Sir Montague Smith when giving the decision of the Privy Council, because what he says (at p. 686) is this: "The numerous cases which have been decided on this subject" (covenants in restraint of trade) "are collected in the notes to Mitchel v. Reynolds in the 1st vol. of Smith's Leading Cases. It may be gathered from them that agreements in restraint of trade are against public policy and void, unless the restraint they impose is partial only, and they are made on good consideration, and are reasonable." He clearly, therefore, lays down the two requisites which are necessary to the validity of covenants in restraint of trade—viz., that they must not be unlimited, and then, if they are limited, it must be considered whether, even having regard to the limit, they are reasonable. In my opinion that old law, notwithstanding the opinion of Kekewich, J., of the change which has taken place in the country, still ought to be recognized and regarded by us as the law, and ought not to be departed from by us. If it is to be done it must not be by this court but by the House of Lords.

Then, if that be so and the covenant bears the construction which at one time was contended for by Mr. Warmington, in my opinion the covenant is bad, because the law does not allow an absolute covenant to give up trade. I need not go into the reasons why that is so, but there are plenty of reasons for it. No man ought to be prevented during his life from earning his livelihood by carrying on his trade, and the public ought not to be prevented from the benefit which they may get from a man who is skilled in a trade carrying on that trade.

There is one other case—Rousillon v. Rousillon—which I have omitted to mention, which was decided by Fry, L.J., in which I think, undoubtedly, he used expressions which showed that he took a somewhat wider view than I do of the law. In that case there was a limit of time which might have made the covenant a limited one, and not a general one in absolute restraint of trade, and, if so, it comes within what I think is now the true rule, that where there is a limited covenant you have to consider how far, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, that limit is a reasonable one. About that case I say no more after what I have said on the cases generally.

Then it is said that it is a covenant "not to carry on trade within such limits of time and space as the law will consider reasonable." Now, construing it in that way, which I hardly think is the right way of construing it, it is a covenant which the court, in my opinion, ought not to enforce. If parties wish to restrain those with whom they are dealing from breaking a limited covenant against carrying on a trade, they must, in my opinion, if they wish the court to assist them, themselves fix the limits within which there is to be no carrying on of the trade, and must do so at their peril. The law will determine whether that limit is a good one or whether it is one which is so unreasonable that the covenant must fail. It is entirely different from the covenant to settle property in a certain line or family "so long as the rules of law and equity will allow." They are certain definite and fixed rules laid down as regards the limitation of property which will prevent it from being so settled as to exceed the limits laid down by the rule against perpetuities. There is no definite fixed rule as to the limits within which trade can be restrained. That must depend upon the circumstances of each case, and in my opinion it is wrong to make a covenant in this form, and wrong for the court to enforce it, because it can be seen at once on the injunction which is granted what difficulties will arise.

Kekewich, J., has said that carrying on business in Old-street, in the City of London, is within a reasonable limit, but he has not defined what else will be so, and are we again and again to have this question arise on the covenant where the parties have sought to get the court, without risking the validity of their covenant, from time to time to say whether a particular space and a particular time is within the limits? Is it a limit of time, is it a limit of space which is here to protect the covenantee? In my opinion, if we look at it in that which is the modified form, the answer to it is this:—"There are no limits fixed by law which can be regarded as introduced into this covenant." A covenant in this form, indefinite as it is, in my opinion is one which neither a court of equity nor a court of law ought to enforce. The parties must make up their minds to say what they agree to as regards limit of time or space within which there is to be no trading.

We now come to the third branch of the covenant on which Kekewich, J., to some extent acted—namely, "not to trade, act, or deal in any way so as to either directly or indirectly affect E. Davies and E. A. Davies." Now Mr. Barber did not argue the point because he thought it was covered by a previous decision of the Court of Appeal, but in my opinion there is one great objection to it, which is that it is a covenant the benefit of which would not pass with the goodwill to the purchasers, the plaintiff company. The case to which he referred was a case where there was a contract not to trade within certain limits. That was evidently a covenant entered into in order to protect the business and the goodwill of it, and therefore it was one which would pass with the goodwill to a purchaser of the goodwill, but there is no such absolute covenant here. To my mind the covenant is one which points rather to the personal benefit of the father and of the half brother than to any protection of the goodwill. So far as the parties intended, the goodwill was defended by the previous covenant in restraint of trade, which in my opinion was an invalid covenant, and this could not have been intended as an addition to that which in their minds was absolutely provided for, but as something which the defendant covenanted for the benefit of his father and his half brother personally, and not that which was to affect the trade which he had parted with to them. In my opinion, having regard to the great indefiniteness of this covenant, and to my opinion that it is not one which the purchasers would be entitled to say passed to them with the goodwill, no relief ought to be granted on that branch of the covenant either. In my opinion, therefore, differing from Kekewich, J., in this, the action fails and ought to be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—We are asked to enforce the covenant, which the Lord Justice has read, which divides itself into three parts. The first part of the covenant provides that James Davies is to retire wholly and absolutely from the partnership; the second, that so far as the law allows he shall retire (I incorporate the words "he shall retire" from the previous section) or shall undertake to retire (because it is immaterial to my argument which it is from the trade or business thereof in all its branches and the third part of the covenant provides that "he is not to trade, act, or deal in any way so as to either directly or indirectly affect E. Davies or E. A. Davies."

With regard to the first part of the covenant—viz., that he shall retire from the partnership, there is no question but that it is a covenant which might be lawfully made and one that has been performed in the present instance. The difficulty arises with regard to the two further parts of the covenant, which I have endeavoured to divide, and which I will take separately.

First, with regard to the provision that, "so far as the law allows, he shall retire, or undertake to retire, from the trade or business thereof in all its branches." I think that must be equivalent to a covenant either to retire absolutely from the trade, if the law allows such a covenant to be made, or, if not, to retire from the trade so far as the law permits of such an undertaking. If it is to be construed in the first of those two ways—a covenant to retire absolutely from the trade or business—it seems to me to be against the common law, for this reason: the principle of the common law that covenants in restraint of trade which are unlimited altogether, whether in space or time, is that such covenants are void. They cannot be enforced. That was laid down as long ago as the Year Book of 2nd Henry 5, which was followed in the reign of Elizabeth, and which is alluded to in the Ipswich Tailors' case, 11 Co. 53a. What the court said in the latter case was, "At the common law no man could be prohibited from working in any lawful trade," for these reasons, that it is contrary to the wish of the law that all should not learn and practice lawful trades and sciences which are profitable to the commonwealth, "and therefore the common law abhors all monopolies which prohibit any from working in any lawful trade." Then the court proceed to consider the case in 2nd Henry 5, and they say that, "for the same reason, if a husbandman is bound that he shall not sow his land, the bond is against the common law," and the statute of 5 Eliz. c. 4, which prohibits every person from using or exercising crafts or occupations until they have been apprentices was enacted with intent of encouraging education in trade. "Thereby," said the court, "it appears that, without an Act of Parliament, none can be in any manner restrained from working in any lawful trade." That language must, of course, be taken with reference to the subject-matter of the case, but still I use it as showing that, broadly, the law sets its face, subject to exceptions which I shall have to consider, against restraints of trade. That is laid down in Mitchel v. Reynolds, a case which may be said to be the foundation of the recent decisions upon the point.

Now there may be limitations to be found in the covenants on the strength of which it is endeavoured to escape from this general doctrine. There may be such a limitation in respect of time, and the view taken by the court has been that a limit in respect of time is not indispensable in order to enable the covenant to be enforced where there is some other limit to be found which makes the covenant reasonable and necessary for the protection of the party who seeks to protect himself. These cases I need not discuss further. Then we come to another limitation which may be found— a limitation in respect of space, and as yet I think that there has been no decision that you may have a covenant altogether unlimited in respect of space, unless in the case of special limitations, which form the third class of limitations—the limitation which is to be found in the special case in the special character of the subject-matter which is sought to be protected. The last or third kind of limitation is a kind of limitation which I think James, V.C., thought he had found in the case of the Leather Cloth Co. v. Lorsont, though in that case also, as the Lord Justice has pointed out, there may also have been found a limitation in respect of time.

We have been asked by Mr. Warmington, in an extremely able argument, first of all to hold that a limitation in respect of space is not necessary if you can find that protection through the unlimited area of space is reasonably necessary for the protection of the covenantee. But Mr. Warmington has not confined himself to that minor proposition, he has gone further, and has asked us to consider generally whether the state of circumstances—the change in the character of the business of the world, the extension of the means of intercourse between one part of the kingdom and another and one part of the world and another—has not shaken to its core the original doctrine that covenants unlimited altogether ought not to be enforced. It appears to me that if there were to be any change made in the principle of the common law to which I have alluded and which has remained unassailable for centuries, it would better come from the House of Lords than from ourselves. But if there was to be an exception engrafted on the rule, or the rule was to be modified with reference to the requirements of modern society, as to which I will for a moment express no opinion, it could only be if the case in question ranged itself under one of these two heads, either that the covenant in its unrestricted form was one which was a benefit to the public, in which case it might be said that that would destroy the reason for insisting on the old rule which was derived from the public policy of the kingdom; or, secondly, if it was reasonably necessary for the protection of the covenantee. In the present case it seems to me that we have got no material upon which we can, without keeping in the dark, assume that the present covenant is a benefit to the public, for there is nothing to my mind which shows that the public would be benefited by allowing such a covenant as the one in this case to be enforced, nor have we the materials for deciding that such a covenant is reasonably necessary even for the protection of the covenantee. It appears, therefore, to me that it is not necessary in the present case to consider or to decide whether what I have called the old doctrine of the common law, that covenants absolutely unlimited both in respect of space and in respect of time, ought to be modified, having regard to the altered character of the commercial intercourse of the world. We ought to leave that to be discussed on another occasion when the facts really raise the point. For the same reason it appears to me that we are not bound in the present instance to decide even that an absence of limitation in respect of space may be excused or may be excepted if it is reasonably necessary for the protection of the covenantee, because there is nothing here which shows that it was reasonably necessary for the protection of the covenantee. For that reason, without denying that I have an inclination to think that the rule of the common law is too much engrained in its history to be changed at this moment at all events, except by the highest court in this country, I do not decide it, because it seems to me the materials do not enable us to do so. If, therefore, the part of the covenant which I am now discussing, which is that James Davies is to retire as far as the law allows from the trade or business in all its branches, is to be interpreted as being an absolute covenant, and we are asked to hold that the law will allow in such a case such a covenant to be made, I say there are no sort of materials upon which we could attempt to apply the modification of the general principle which Mr. Warmington asks us to accept of the old rule of the common law.

But, then, if we are to read, on the other hand, this branch of the covenant as something short of that, if it only means that the covenant in restraint of trade is not to be unlimited, but that the limit is to be found by an appeal to the law, then it seems to me that the obvious answer is that it is too vague for us to deal with. I think myself that it would have been too vague even if it had remained in the nature of an executory contract to execute a deed in that shape. The parties would still be asking the law to do for them what they had not made up their minds about themselves; they would, in fact, be asking the law to make a contract for them instead of making it for themselves. But, in any view, it seems to me that this covenant is too vague. This is a covenant, it is said, that Davies will retire as far as the law allows, and that we are to ask the law what is to be the restraint imposed upon the generality of the covenant. The law is absolutely incapable of answering a question so put. It is perfectly true that in many contracts where you want a measure to be applied to a particular subject-matter, you leave the measure to be applied by reason. There are many contracts, for example, which, instead of fixing the regular time for payment, provide that the time shall be fixed by what is reasonable in the trade or in the business. In those cases you introduce the consideration of what measure reason will apply, because the measure which reason will apply tends towards certainty, and, therefore, enables you to make up for the absence of distinction on the part of the contract by reference to a standard—the standard of reason which the parties had in their minds though they did not express it on paper—and you therefore say that that is certain which can be made certain, but that is where the introduction of the measure of reason tends to certainty. In the present case, what we are in search of is some definition which would limit what otherwise is a pure negative. In such a case as that you cannot ask reason to put a limit on a mere negative. You cannot get a measure out of it at all, and whatever reason says about it you remain still in want of the definition which is necessary to make the covenant a restricted one. The most obvious proof of the truth of that proposition is to recall to one's mind this, that, assuming the law will allow certain restrictions, there may be twenty different restrictions—all of which might serve the purpose of the parties, all of which would be absolutely inconsistent with each other, all of which the law would allow. How are we to know which of those particular restrictions the parties intended to impose. They leave it absolutely uncertain, and for the best of all reasons, because they have not made up their minds. Therefore, to ask us to apply reason at this particular point is to ask us to condescend upon some one of the twenty possible alternatives, though the parties themselves could not make up their minds which one they would take. A contract to do nothing that is unreasonable contains in itself no limitation, because there may be a hundred different reasonable courses all of which are inconsistent with one another. Suppose for a moment we take an illustration which was dealt with in the course of the argument: the law of England allows a man to contract for his labour, or allows him to place himself in the service of a master, but it does not allow him to attach to his contract any servible incidents, any elements of servitude as distinguished from service. In what sort of a position would a contracting party place the court who made this sort of contract for himself:—"I will undertake to serve you in every possible way which the law does not consider repugnant to the doctrine that servible incidents are not to be imposed upon a party." That is too vague. It gives you no sort of measure of service. In the same way, contracts in restraint of marriage are void except in certain specified cases, where, for instance, a definite period is imposed for the sake of the health of one of the parties. How could a man contract that he would never marry, subject, always, to such limitations as the law imposed? It would leave the contract absolutely vague. You would not know what he meant. For the same reason, if you read this contract in the secondary sense as an attempt to make a contract in partial restraint of trade, the answer is, We do not know what the parties mean. On that ground it seems to me that that part of the contract cannot be enforced.

Then we come, lastly, to the third branch of the covenant, that James Davies is "not to trade, act, or deal in any way so as to either directly or indirectly affect," whom? E. Davies and E. A. Davies. I doubt myself whether that contract is not an absolutely unrestricted covenant in restraint of trade in one view put upon it, and, if so, I think it is bad for the same reason as I said before with regard to the earlier branch of the covenant. But to read it in a less offensive or less rigid way, suppose it to be, "not to trade, act, or deal in any way so as to affect E. Davies and the plaintiff E. A. Davies in their business," it is a covenant that seems to me to be personal to E. Davies and E. A. Davies, and cannot be assigned. It is perfectly true that there is a class of covenants in restraint of trade which would affect established businesses which can be assigned. For instance, a covenant not to carry on business in a particular street or in a particular town. That may pass by assignment to the assignee of the business; but if the contract, on its true construction, is a personal one, it cannot be assigned. The rule of law is plain. You cannot assign the benefit of covenants which are purely personal. I think this is a purely personal covenant, that it cannot therefore be assigned, and cannot be enforced by the present applicants.

On these grounds it seems to me, with regret, that we must differ from Kekewich, J. As I said before, as far as I am concerned, I leave undiscussed and unsettled the great question as to how far modern changes in commerce affect the old doctrine of common law.

FRY, L.J.—In this case we are called upon to enforce, by way of injunction and by assessment of damages, a covenant contained in an executed contract. We have not before us an agreement which is intended to be afterwards developed into a deed, but we have a solemn and formal deed executed between the parties which contains this covenant. We are told (and I have no doubt with perfect truth) that the history of it is this. That the very formal covenant which we have to construe was part of an earlier executory and informal contract, and that the parties to it, not being able to develop that contract satisfactorily between themselves, inserted in the formal instrument the very words they had used in the informal one. That does not enable us to construe the covenant in any different manner from what we should if the contract was throughout a formal and an executed contract.

Now the covenant consists of three parts. It is, first, that J. Davies is to retire wholly and absolutely from the partnership. With regard to that no question arises. Secondly, J. Davies is to retire (for thus I read it), so far as the law allows, from the trade or business thereof (that is the partnership) in all its branches; and, thirdly, J. Davies is not to trade, act, or deal in any way so as to either directly or indirectly affect E. Davies or E. A. Davies. I deal first with the second branch of that covenant, that J. Davies will, so far as the law allows, retire from the trade and business of the partnership in all its branches. I think that covenant is too vague to be enforced. I think the object of the contracting parties was to leave the law to make the contract between them. I think that it is the function of the courts of law to interpret contracts; to say whether a contract is or is not reasonable; to say whether it is or is not void; but that it is not the duty of the courts to make contracts between parties. Whether these words would be capable of development if the court had directed an instrument to be executed to carry them into effect is a point upon which I need not express any concluded opinion. I entertain the greatest doubt whether the court could be called upon to interpret such words. The reason why I come to that conclusion is this, that whatever else may be in doubt about contracts in restraint of trade, this is plain and undisputed, that no contract in restraint of trade which is unreasonable—which is larger than is necessary to protect the interest of contracting parties—is good.

It appears to me that there may be a hundred forms of contract, each of which might be reasonable, and might therefore be good, but that the law cannot select which of those hundred forms is to be the contract between the parties. Let me assume for one moment (as is probably the case) that it is necessary, in order to make the contract reasonable, that there should be some limitation in respect of space. Is Wales to be left out, or the Eastern counties, or the Southern counties, or the Northern counties? No human being can tell. That is a matter which ought to have been settled between the contracting parties. Similarly, if a limitation in respect of time be necessary in order to make the contract reasonable, the court cannot lay down what length of time is requisite and what length of time is reasonable. When the parties to the contract have settled all those matters between themselves, then the court can attend to the suggestions of those who say that, looking at all the particulars of the contract, the contract is or is not unreasonable. I repeat that the substance of this document seems to me to throw upon the court the making of the contract between the parties. For that reason I think it is too vague to be enforced.

I have come to the conclusion which I have stated without reference to the larger question which has been so much debated in the course of this argument, and in my judgment it does not require adjudication from us on the present occasion. It is therefore probably safer that I should only say that I am not expressing any opinion upon it. I think, however, that it is not unreasonable that I should add that the inclination of my mind is still in the direction in which it was when I decided the case of Rousillon v. Rousillon. I think that the law with regard to public policy is one of a very different description from the law which is laid down in absolute terms for all times. It would be strange, and I think it would be unreasonable, if a contract which might now be for the public benefit were held to be void because in the reign of Henry 5 or in the reign of Elizabeth that contract was contrary to public policy. It is impossible to look at the history of the law and not to see that contracts which at one time were deemed—and I dare say justly deemed—to be contrary to public policy, at another time are deemed to be consistent with public policy and for the public benefit. A forcible illustration of that fact is furnished by the very case which is the foundation of this branch of the law, the case in the 2nd Henry 5 which excited the indignation of Hull, J., in a manner which has made his name immortal in the books. As was pointed out by Lord St. Leonards in Egerton v. Earl Brownlow, the general principle that a contract which is unreasonable in restraint of trade is void is still the law, but the particular conclusion at which he arrived, that that contract is against public policy, is entirely at variance with modern decisions. What Lord St. Leonards said was this: "Angry as the learned judge was at that infraction of the law, what has been the result of that very rule without any statute intervening? That the common law, as it is called, has adapted itself upon grounds of public policy to a totally different and limited rule that would guide us at this day, and the condition which was then so strongly denounced is just as good a condition now as any that was ever inserted in a contract, because a partial restraint created in that way with a particular object is now perfectly legal. Without any exclamation of the judge, and without any danger of prison, any subject of this realm may sue upon such a condition as Hull, J., was so very indignant at in that particular case." The same observation applies to the case of Mitchel v. Reynolds with more or less force, because, although that case is certainly perfectly sound as regards its great principle, that contracts in restraint of trade which are unnecessarily large are void, yet there can be no doubt that that decision has been more or less affected by the course of the law since. That case seems to have decided that the adequacy of the consideration was a matter to be investigated by the court. The courts have since repudiated their capacity to investigate that adequacy of consideration. The law as laid down in that case created a presumption of invalidity as against the contract. That burden of proof has since been shifted, as soon as it has been shown that the contract has been entered into for the protection of the interest of one of the contracting parties, and therefore I repeat, although that case in its broad features is still undoubtedly the law, the law has grown since that case. I may be wrong, but it appears to me that the ground on which in that case it was said that the condition must be partial in point of space was clearly this. The learned judge said:—"It can never be useful to any man to restrain another from trading in all places, though it may be to restrain him from trading in some, unless he intends a monopoly, which is a crime." The judge who decided that case seems, therefore, to have thought that a total restraint could never be necessary for the protection of the parties. If he was wrong in that assumption it would be a matter for future inquiry how far the limit which he created or imposed on that ground is or is not binding on the courts at the present day.

I desire not to decide that point, but to say that I think the inquiry is still one which is open and worthy of great consideration whenever it shall come up for decision before the courts. What I mean to indicate is this, that I am not convinced that there is any other rule of limitation except that the contract shall not be unreasonably large. If it be more than reasonably large then it tends to a monopoly without any corresponding good to the parties. If, on the other hand, it is not larger than is reasonable, then it still seems to me that it would be remarkable that something else should be imposed on the contract so that the contract would be required to be not only reasonable but something else. I rather incline to think that a reasonable contract ought to be enforced.

Then, leaving those observations—which, after all, are only by the way in my decision—I come to the last branch of the contract, which is, that J. Davies is "not to trade, act, or deal in any way so as to either directly or indirectly affect E. Davies and E. A. Davies." In order to construe these words we must have regard to the position of things between the contracting parties. J. Davies was a son by the first Mrs. E. Davies; E. Davies was carrying on the business with his younger son E. A. Davies. The assignment of the goodwill had (as was pointed out by Mr. Warmington) an implied contract for quiet enjoyment of the goodwill. We have, therefore, before we arrive at this covenant, a covenant for the quiet enjoyment of the goodwill, a covenant to retire from the business, a covenant to retire from every branch of the same business which the partnership carried on. Now, the covenant for quiet enjoyment has not been sued upon. Therefore, we have not to consider it, except for the purpose of construction, but I am bound to give this last covenant some real meaning in addition to all the previous covenants. I think, therefore, that it is something more than retiring from the business of the partnership, and not carrying on any branches of the same business. I think that, popularly speaking, it means this, that as long as the father and the half-brother are connected together J. Davies will not, in any way, annoy or interfere with them, but I think that is a contract not relating to business only, but reting to the two Davies so long as they have any common interest. I think it is therefore one which does not pass with the business, and which cannot be broken after the death of E. Davies.

But, further than that, I desire to say that the contract appears to me to be couched in such vague terms and doubtful words that I think it can be enforced neither at law nor in equity. Mr. Warmington, who undoubtedly felt the difficulty in the way, asked us to separate the words "directly or indirectly," and to hold, if the covenant could not be enforced with regard to its indirect affection with the Davies, that it might with regard to its direct affection. But that construction is not open in this case, because the words "either directly or indirectly" are only an amplification or explanation of the affirmative words "in any way." Therefore we have a contract not to trade in any way to affect the two Davies, not to act in any way to affect them, not to deal in any way to affect them. I think that no such vague and general covenant, which is not even in terms confined to injurious affection, could be enforced. As I have already said and think, it is a personal contract with the two Davies, and that after the death of the one it cannot be broken, and that it did not pass by the assignment of goodwill to the company.

For these reasons I am unable to concur in the conclusion arrived at by Kekewich, J., and I think that this action ought to have been dismissed, with costs, and must now be dismissed, with costs, here and in the court below.

COTTON, L.J.—As Fry, L.J., misunderstood me I think I had better state (what I thought I had done) that my first ground for deciding that the previous clause of this covenant is bad is that it is in restraint of trade generally, which, in my opinion, the law holds to be bad. The law does not allow that, and, therefore, it is not covered by that expression "so far as the law allows."

TUCK v. PRIESTER. (a.)

Copyright—Picture—Common law right—Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68). ss. 1, 4, 6, 11—Copies made before registration and sold after.

The defendant, at the request of the plaintiffs, executed numerous copies abroad of a picture, the property of the plaintiffs, before registration of the copyright. Some of the copies were sent to the defendant's agents in England before, and sold by them after, registration of the copyright.

Held, by Grove and Denman, JJ., that the plaintiffs could not recover against the defendant for an infringement of their copyright either under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68 or otherwise.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction and damages for breach of contract; and (dissentiente Lopes, L.J.) to an injunction, damages, and an order for delivery of pirated copies; but that they were not entitled to penalties.

(a.) Reported by A. H. TODD and SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

The action was brought by Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons for infringement of their copyright in a picture called "Sounding the Charge."

The plaintiffs, at the time of the action, were the registered proprietors of the copyright in this picture, and had, before the registration, employed the defendant, a printer at Berlin, to produce copies of the work. Some of these copies were sent by the defendant to his agents in England before, and sold by them to various persons after, the registration by the plaintiffs of their copyright. The plaintiffs' claim was for penalties under the 6th section of the Copyright Act, 1862, and for damages under the 11th section.

The jury found a verdict for £100 damages and £175 penalties, and Day, J., entered judgment for the plaintiffs for the damages only, as he considered that the defendant had not sold the copies knowing them to have been unlawfully made within the meaning of section 6 of the Act.

The plaintiffs had a cross-motion that judgment might be entered for them on the question of penalties also.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Kisch, for the defendant.—These copies were executed before registration. The registered proprietor of a copyright obtains protection from that time. There is no copyright at common law which could enable the plaintiffs to recover for acts done by the defendant before registration. The statement of claim is framed solely with regard to the statutory right.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., Cock, Q.C., and McCall, for the plaintiffs.—The recital in the Copyright Act, 1862, is not true, and the statute itself elsewhere admits it. For instance, in sections 6 and 11, where the words are, "in which there shall be a subsisting copyright." In section 6 there are two correlative expressions on which this action is based—viz., "subsisting copyright" and "unlawfully made." There was an unlawful making by the defendant in this case—that is to say, a making without the consent of the plaintiffs. That there was a subsisting copyright before publication the case of Turner v. Robinson, 10 Ir. Ch. Rep. 510, shows: Miller v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2303; Donaldson v. Beckett, 4 Burr. 2408. That view has been adopted in Scrutton on the Law of Copyright, p. 100. There is no distinction in this respect between literary and artistic works: Prince Albert v. Strange, 2 De G. & Sm. 652; and the judgment of Lord St. Leonards in Jefferys v. Boosey, 4 H. L. Cas. 815, 3 W. R. Dig. 155, and the language of section 4 of the Act. See also Hole v. Bradbury, 28 W. R. 39, 12 Ch. D. 886. The right to delivery up of copies made without the consent of the author existed before the Act; Prince Albert v. Strange; Mayall v. Higby, 10 W. R. 631; Turner v. Robinson; Murray v. Heath, 1 B. & Ad. 804. Day, J., ought to have entered judgment for the plaintiffs on both the claims. The defendant had to make a definite number of copies, and he made more than were sufficient to satisfy the order, and sold the surplus.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., in reply.—I admit that there is a common law right as to literary and artistic work to this extent, that a man may prevent his property from being interfered with, as in Prince Albert v. Strange. In Jefferys v. Boosey the judges point out that this is very different from copyright proper. Here there is no proof that the multiplication and sale by the defendant took place before publication by the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 27.—GROVE, J.—This was an action for penalties and damages brought for the infringement of copyright in certain engravings. The plaintiffs were possessed of a design or picture called "Sounding the Charge," and asked the defendant to print off certain copies, which the defendant did, and sent them to England before the registration required by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68. After the registration certain of the copies so sent to England were sold by the defendant, which is the alleged infringement. The action was tried before Day, J.; the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for £175 penalties and £100 damages. We have to decide whether Day, J., was right in entering judgment for the plaintiffs on that verdict for £100 damages.

The Act which regulates the matter is 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68. The preamble to that Act is as follows:—"Whereas by law as now established the authors of paintings, drawings, and photographs have no copyright in such their works, and it is expedient that the law in that respect should be amended."

It was contended by the Solicitor-General that that preamble is wrong in fact, and that there is a copyright at common law, and that the designer of works of art had a right in them combined with certain prohibitory powers. Substantially the whole of the argument turned on the meaning of the word "copyright," and the question whether the copyright dealt with in the Act included copyright at common law, or whether the word in the Act refers only to the copyright given by the Act. Day, J., entered judgment for the defendant on the question of the penalties because he considered that, under the terms of section 6 of the Copyright Act, the defendant was not liable, as there was no evidence that he knew that these copies had been unlawfully made; but as the words "knowing them to have been unlawfully made" do not occur in section 11 of the Act, Day, J., thought that the plaintiffs could recover damages, which were assessed by the jury at £100.

After hearing the arguments we think that the defendant is entitled to judgment on both grounds. It was ably contended by the Solicitor-General that this Act included in its provisions a copyright at common law—namely, a right in the proprietor of anything capable of copyright to prohibit his property being made use of for publication. I think that the term as used in the Act simply applies to the statutory copyright—i.e., copyright after publication. It is a privileged monopoly given by the statute to enable persons to sell their own drawings, &c., made by their own skill; and I think that "copyright" is confined to that, and not extended to any common law right. The term has, no doubt, been applied to that right, but I think it did not exist in the early times when the common law grew into existence. That view of the application of the term has been taken by many learned judges. Supposing that the word copyright in the statute merely refers to the right conferred by the Act and not to the common law right, there would be no misrecital. It seems to me that the statute would be inconsistent if construed otherwise. The question was largely discussed in Jefferys v. Boosey, the marginal note to which sets out the result of the judgments to be that copyright is the creature of statute. That is the view I have always held. Lords Brougham, Cranworth, and St. Leonards use the term copyright as a right in published works, and do not apply it to unpublished matter, a right to prevent the pirating of which existed at common law. The learned judges who gave their opinion on the case explain the difference which had existed in the use of the word. Erle, J., says:—"The nature of the rights of an author in his works is analogous to the rights of ownership in other personal property, and is far more extensive than the control of copying after publication in print, which is the limited meaning of copyright in its common acceptation."

The definition of Parke, B., is in accordance with this; and Jervis, C.J., says:—"Copyright here means the exclusive right of multiplying copies, which right does not attach to personal chattels." The Lord Chief Justice further says that copyright in the sense of the right to the individual copy has no application to the subject under discussion. The judgments of the law lords are to the same effect—viz., that copyright is the creature of the statute; that there is no copyright at common law after publication; and that this common law right is a species of private property, and not like the statutory monopoly. That seems to me to show that the statute was intended to apply exclusively to the copyright given by it.

With regard to the 6th section of the Act, which says: [his lordship read the section]. The Solicitor-General urged that the term "subsisting copyright" in this and the 11th section applies to the common law right, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to an exclusive right of multiplying the drawing, though they had not registered it. At the common law monopoly was given by the Crown, and, no doubt, wrongly given, as the statute of James declares, but no monopoly existed apart from the grant of the Crown.

The preamble proves what was meant by the framers of the Act; they considered that authors, painters, and designers had at that time no copyright such as the Act proceeded to confer. Again, section 2 says, "Nothing herein contained shall prejudice the right of any person to copy or use any work in which there shall be no copyright," but there ought to be copyright in everything if the Solicitor-General's argument is right. Section 4 must be the main guide to our decision in this case. It is there enacted for the first time that a register of proprietors should be kept, the object being that there should be a record open to the public in which persons claiming to be the owners of copyright in artistic productions should be enumerated. There has been much criticism expended on the words "such copyright" in this section, and it has been contended that they cannot apply to the copyright conferred by the Act. No doubt there is much difficulty in construing them, but that I think arose from the way the Act was framed; it is an Act not very carefully worded. But the section says that no action shall be maintained nor penalties recovered in respect of anything done before registration. Now what was done in this case? The copies in question were made and imported into England before registration. Therefore, if this action was maintainable the statute must be read so as to affect something that was lawfully done before registration. If a person was allowed to delay registration for a considerable time and allow the public to get possession of the article intended to be afterwards registered, and invest money in dealing with it, and then by registering the article prohibit the public from dealing with the article, the result would be most unsatisfactory. I certainly do not think the Act can be read in that manner. In my opinion the Act only makes unlawful anything done after registration, and I think, further, that a sale, to be unlawful within the meaning of the Act, must be a sale of works of art unlawfully made or obtained within the meaning of the Act. These copies of the plaintiffs' picture were not unlawfully made, because at the time the defendant made them there had been no registration of the principal picture. I admit that there seems to have been a breach of faith on the part of the defendant, but I must construe the Act with regard to the conduct of others who may act in all good faith. I think the defendant is entitled to judgment.

DENMAN, J.—GROVE, J., has dealt so fully with the questions raised by this case that it is only necessary for me to add a few words. I agree that judgment should be entered for the defendants, for I am clearly of opinion that this action is founded solely on the statute. The statement of claim states that the defendant, without the consent of the plaintiffs, as such registered proprietors, reproduced and sold copies of this picture, but I do not think that it was proved that, after the time at which the plaintiffs had become the registered proprietors of the copyright, there was any copy made or any multiplication for sale took place. It seems to me that the 4th section of the Act, when properly construed, is clearly against the right claimed for the author or proprietor of a painting to say that, though he has not been registered until after the making of copies, he has the right to sue for penalties and damages in respect of a sale of copies made before registration. That contention would violate the last part of the section. It seems to me that by suing after registration in respect of acts done before registration such author or proprietor would obtain without registration all the benefits that the Act confers after and in consequence of registration.

Aug. 5.—The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and T. E. Scrutton (McCall with them), for the appellants.—The damages recoverable under section 11 of the Act apply to both the proprietary rights and statutory rights of the copyright holders. The fact of registration after the production of the article, the subject of copyright does not affect this right to sue, because the statute gives them proprietary rights before registration. That is only the condition precedent to the form of remedy. An assignment of copyright before registration has been held good, and the Copyright (Books) Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), has been held to give a general copyright apart from the special remedies: Ex parte Walker, In re Graves, 17 W. R. 1018, L. R. 4 Q. B. 715, and Novello v. Ludlow, 12 C. B. 177.

Reid, Q.C., and H. Kisch, for the respondent.—The plaintiffs lost their proprietary right by what amounted to publication before registration. There was no express contract to bind the defendant not to publish copies on his own account. The plaintiffs seek to recover penalties under section 4, which they are not entitled to previous to registration: Ex parte Beal, 16 W. R. 852, L. R. 3 Q. B. 387.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case there was a contract in writing between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and in my opinion it is clearly implied from it that the defendant was to make the copies of the picture for the plaintiffs, to return the picture to them, and not to make any copies for himself or for anyone else. The defendant committed a breach of this obligation, and is entitled in equity to an injunction and to damages. The plaintiffs are thus entitled to judgment independently of the statute. As to the Copyright Act, 1862, section 1 standing alone gave a copyright the moment the picture was painted, and would give a right to sue for breach of that copyright. The next two sections support that view, and then we come to section 4. By that section it is provided that a register of copyrights shall be kept, and that no proprietor of any copyright shall be entitled to the benefit of the Act until registration. The statute, after conferring the benefit, bridles the proprietor with this, that he shall not reap the benefit until registered. But directly he is registered he may take the benefit. He might have brought an action or recovered penalties even in respect of acts already done if the section had stopped there; but it proceeds, "and no action shall be sustainable, nor any penalty be recoverable, in respect of anything done before registration." Even after registration, although there is a right to bring an action and recover penalties, that does not extend to damages or penalties for acts done previously to the registration. As to section 6 it does not deal with the right to sue. By "subsisting" copyright it means copyright that is not lost. If the author has sold the work and retained the copyright it is subsisting in him, but if he has sold the copyright it subsists in someone else. The section proceeds to enact that if such person import or sell any copy made without the consent of the proprietor, such proprietor may recover damages and enforce the delivery of unlawful copies, or obtain damages for the retention of them. May any person sell after registration a copy made without the proprietor's consent before registration? What is the breach? If it is making the copy he cannot sue for it. But the section says "or" sell, not "and." He has sold after registration copies made without consent. He has sold copies in which there was a copyright when he produced them, and he did not obtain consent to their production or sale. It is true that there was a defect in the remedies of the proprietor when he produced them; but it was wrong in him to make them. Therefore the plaintiffs may recover damages for the sale, and have delivery of "unlawful copies." That phrase is not well considered, but it means copies wrongfully made—that is equivalent to being made without the necessary consent. Having section 1 in view it appears that he has really pirated the copyright before the registration. He cannot be sued for it then, but if he goes on, by selling, publishing, letting for hire, or doing any one of the things mentioned after registration, he can be sued, except that damages for any act done before registration cannot be recovered.

The plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to damages and an injunction; are they also entitled to penalties? We must look at the Act with different eyes in so far as it imposes penalties. If section 6 is capable of the milder construction we must adopt that, and there is some doubt whether, when a copy is made, not in England, but in a foreign country, it can be said to be unlawfully made. In the country in which they were made the making of them was not unlawful, and it would seem that making abroad and importing to and selling in England is not meant to be penal. The words in section 6 are different from those in section 11, from which the qualification, "knowing that they are unlawfully made," is omitted. The words of section 6 are capable of the more lenient construction, and it is safer to say that in this case there can be no penalty. Damages and an injunction are, therefore, the proper relief, and the order of the Divisional Court will be altered accordingly.

LINDLEY, L.J.—Whether the plaintiffs had a copyright or not, the defendant, in my opinion, did that which exposed him to an injunction. The employment which he undertook carried with it that he should not produce copies to sell to others, and to do so was a gross breach of faith and confidence. In Morrison v. Moat, 9 Hare, 241, 21 L. J. Ch. 248 (on appeal), where the defendant had been intrusted with a secret in the course of his employment by the plaintiff, it was held that he could be enjoined from divulging it, and Turner, V.C., said that it did not follow that, because there was no patent, there might not be a breach of contract entitling to an injunction. That carries the right to an injunction beyond controversy, but the case was fought out before Day, J., on different lines, and the equitable view was lost sight of. The statute with which we have to do is one of a group of statutes dealing with copyright in literature, the drama, designs, and music, of which the statutes dealing with patents and trade-marks form another group. Copyright is the exclusive right to multiply, and in my view the preamble, which recites that the authors of paintings, drawings, and photographs had no copyright before, is correct. What is called copyright at common law is an incident of property, as appears from the decision in the House of Lords of Jefferys v. Boosey. We find the right created and defined by statute. It is made personal estate and assignable. Subject to section 4, it is plain that under the first three sections the right of exclusive publication is capable of assignment before registration. This is nothing new, as it is recognized in Ex parte Walker, In re Graves. There were two assignments in that case, and each assignor had acquired copyright capable of assignment before registration. Apart from section 4 they had the full right of property conferred by the Act. Under that section registration is the foundation of the remedy. The word "benefit" is ambiguous. One construction is, that benefit includes copyright; but the result of this would be that when you cannot have copyright unless you register, you have no copyright to register. It must be remembered that in 1862 suits in equity were not called "actions" to which the second clause applies, so that the word "benefit" would prevent resort to equity as well, before registration. Looking, not at this Act alone, but at the Literary Copyright Act, it seems plain that there is a copyright before registration. There was, therefore, a copyright vested in the plaintiffs, but it was confined to this country. There was nothing unlawful in copying their picture in Germany. They had no rights abroad. The right to damages conferred by section 11 extends, in my opinion, to the sale after registration of copies made before, and the case is brought literally within that section. As to the penalties, I should consider that "unlawful" in section 6 means without consent, but I do not like to substitute an equivalent. If the copies are made in England the section applies, but unlawful means contrary to law, and it would be difficult to say that copies made abroad were unlawful, especially as the defendant is required to have known that it was unlawful. The other view would be dangerous, and the sounder view of a penal section is to say that it does not apply to the case. It seems to follow that there is a hole in the Act, because from section 10 it was obviously intended to prevent importations. That section allows the importation to be stopped, but the importer escapes penalties.

LOPES, L.J.—I am sorry to be obliged to differ from the opinions that have been given. The preamble, in my opinion, is correct, and there is no copyright at common law. It is given to the persons named in the first section. I agree in the construction which has been put on that section, but I differ as to the meaning of the concluding part of section 4. I presume that the words there appearing were inserted with care, and it was intended that they should carry their meaning. It says that "no proprietor of any such copyright shall" be entitled to the benefit of this Act until such registration; and having dealt with "benefit" it goes on to forbid an action in respect of anything done before registration. The effect, to my mind, of those words is that the person is to be in the same position before registration as if the Act had not passed. As soon as he registers he has the benefit of the Act, and not till then. These copies were therefore lawfully made, and to bring an action in respect of them is to bring an action "in respect of something done before registration," which is forbidden by section 4. As to the injunction, I agree with the rest of the court. I think it is impossible to contend that the defendant has not been guilty of a breach of contract.

TETLEY v. GRIFFITH (a.)

Practice—Statement of claim—Married woman—Contract — Separate estate — Motion for judgment — R. S. C., ord. 27, r. 11.

Where a married woman is the defendant to an action on a contract, and has made default in the delivery of a defence, the plaintiff's statement of claim must contain an allegation that the defendant has separate estate; otherwise the court will refuse to make an order against the defendant on the statement of claim under R. S. C., ord. 27, r. 11.

Short cause.

This was an action for the specific performance of an agreement for a lease. The plaintiff was the intended lessor and the defendant the intended lessee.

The defendant was a married woman, and, after entering an appearance to the action, put in no defence, and the action now came on upon motion for judgment upon default of the defendant in delivering a defence (ord. 27, r. 11).

The statement of claim contained no allegation that the defendant had separate estate.

W. D. Rawlins, for the plaintiff.

CHITTY, J.—The plaintiff is only entitled to such judgment as, upon the statement of claim, the court considers he is entitled to. The plaintiff does not allege that the defendant, who is a married woman, has any separate estate. Primâ facie a married woman cannot enter into a contract, but if she has separate estate she can do so. I decline, therefore, to make any order at present, but the plaintiff can mention the matter again, and take liberty to amend his claim, in which case he must serve the defendant again.

R., the lessee of some property, with an option to purchase, told E., the lessor's solicitor, that he intended to purchase the property and should require some money on mortgage. E. put R. into communication with M., and a loan was arranged between them, E. taking no part in the negotiation. A week after the date fixed for the completion of the purchase and mortgage, E. sent R.'s solicitor a bill "for negotiating and preparing mortgage as per scale, £20," and demanding completion on the following day. On the day of completion R. and his solicitor objected to E.'s charge; but afterwards R.'s solicitor said that, if E. would accept R.'s cheque and hold it for a week before paying it in, R.'s solicitor would advise R. not to dispute E.'s charge. This was agreed to. R.'s cheque was dishonoured on presentation, and the amount recovered after an action had been brought.

Held, on a summons by R. for taxation after payment, that E. had overcharged, as he had not negotiated the loan nor investigated the title for the mortgage, and was not entitled to fees for that work, which was included in the charge of £20; and that R. would have had a right to taxation after payment, but was bound by the agreement not to dispute E.'s charge in consideration of E. taking R.'s cheque and holding it for a week.

In re Norman, 34 W. R. 313, 16 Q. B. D. 673, discussed.

By an agreement dated the 23rd of November, 1883, made between W. Johnson and G. S. Miller of the one part, and W. Rumming of the other part, Rumming agreed to take the lease of certain property at Wandsworth, with an option of purchase for £1,100, W. Eley being the solicitor of the lessors.

On the 17th of August, 1886, after a previous letter to Eley in reference to the matter, Rumming called and stated that he intended to purchase the property and to erect buildings upon it, and that he should require to borrow some money on mortgage of the property. There was some conflict of evidence as to what took place at the interview, but it appeared that Eley mentioned to Rumming that Miller, one of the lessors, would advance some money on mortgage of the property, and put Rumming and Miller in communication with each other.

In December, 1886, Rumming called upon Miller, and it was ultimately arranged between them that Miller should lend Rumming £800 on the security of the property, Eley taking no part in negotiating the loan.

The 25th of December, 1886, was the day originally fixed for the completion of the purchase and mortgage of the property. Eley acted as solicitor to Johnson and Miller in respect to the purchase; and as solicitor to both Miller and Rumming in respect to the mortgage. On the 31st of December, 1886, Eley wrote to the solicitor acting for Rumming in the matter of the purchase requiring completion on the day following, and stating that his clients would object to a further extension of time, and also inclosing a bill of costs as follows:

"Charge for negotiating and preparing mortgage as per scale. . . .	20	0	0

On the 1st of January, 1887, Rumming's solicitor wrote to Eley objecting to the charge in his bill.

On the 6th of January, 1887, completion took place. There was a discussion as to Eley's bill of costs, Rumming and his solicitor objecting to the charges, and Eley refusing to complete without payment. Eley in his affidavit, which was uncontradicted, stated that after the discussion Rumming and his solicitor left, that the solicitor afterwards returned and had a private conversation with him, in which the solicitor stated that his client did not know how his bank account stood, and asked Eley to accept a cheque for the amount of his costs and for a quarter's rent due to the vendors, and hold it for a week before paying it in to his bank, and added, in order to induce him to accept the proposal, that he (the solicitor) should advise Rumming not to object to Eley's charges; and that this proposal was subsequently agreed to, and the completion then took place.

The cheque was dishonoured. An action was brought in the Lord Mayor's Court, and the amount of the cheque was paid by Rumming before judgment.

This was a summons by Rumming for the taxation of Eley's bill of costs, notwithstanding the payment.

T. Terrell, for the summons.—The applicant is entitled to taxation notwithstanding payment, on several grounds. The document delivered was not in reality a bill at all, it was merely a claim for charges not according to the scale, and, therefore, no special circumstances need be shown for the taxation: In re Street, L. R. 10 Eq. 165, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 130. But there are special circumstances. Eley required completion without delay, and yet refused to complete without payment, thus exercising pressure: In re Bennett, 8 Beav. 467; In re Boycott, 34 W. R. 26, 29 Ch. D. 571. Then there is overcharge. The amount charged can only be made up by including the scale fee of £1 per cent. for negotiating the loan, and 30s. per cent. for investigating title and preparing and completing mortgage. But W. Eley did not negotiate the loan or investigate the title for the mortgage, as that was done on the purchase of the property. Therefore he is not entitled to make the charge: In re Lacey & Son, 32 W. R. 233, 25 Ch. D. 301; In re Pybus, 35 W. R. 770; In re Harris, Powell, & Goodale, W. N., 1887, p. 29.

E. W. Byrne, for Eley.—There are no special circumstances in this case which would justify taxation after payment, even if the charge made was too great. There was no undue pressure. The completion did not take place until a week after Eley's letter enclosing his bill and requiring completion. To justify taxation after payment there must be pressure and overcharge amounting to fraud. [North, J., referred to In re Norman, 34 W. R. 313, 16 Q. B. D. 673.] Eley's bill was objected to at the time of completion, and there was an agreement that the objection should be abandoned in consideration of Eley taking a cheque and holding it over for a week. That agreement holds good, and is a sufficient answer to the application for taxation. The cheque was dishonoured. An action was brought on it, and the amount was paid before judgment, and no objection to the amount was made. Eley brought the mortgagor and mortgagee into communication, and this justified the fee for negotiating. The court will not go into the question of how much negotiation there was. The introduction of the parties to each other has been decided to be sufficient in the case of auctioneers and house agents.

Terrell replied.

North, J.—This is an application for taxation of a bill of costs after payment. The first argument in support of the application is that no bill was delivered, because the bill delivered was not properly a bill at all. [His lordship read the bill set out above, and continued:—] Looking at the scale, there is a fee allowed to the mortgagee's solicitor for negotiating a loan, so, if the bill had been "mortgagee's solicitor for negotiating loan, £8," it would have been right. There is also a fee of 30s. per cent. allowed to the mortgagee's solicitor for investigating title and preparing and completing mortgage, so, if the bill had followed these words, it would have been right. If the amounts were wrong, it could not have been said there was no bill. And, as both the items charged by Eley are such as might under proper circumstances be charged, I cannot say that no bill has been delivered.

Is there anything in the circumstances to justify taxation of this bill after payment? According to the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Norman, I must not only examine whether there has been pressure and overcharge or overcharge amounting to fraud, but exercise a discretion. The headnote to that case states:—"The 'special circumstances' which, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37, allow a solicitor's bill of costs to be referred for taxation, although twelve months have elapsed since it was delivered to the client, are not merely pressure and overcharge or overcharge amounting to fraud. A judge has a discretion in ordering the bill of costs to be taxed, if it contains items unreasonably large, or charges requiring explanation, or gross blunders. Semble, that the same principle ought to be applied to the taxation of a bill of costs which has been paid." That headnote is quite borne out by the judgments, and Lindley, L.J., refers to In re Robinson, 16 W. R. 110, L. R. 3 Ex. 4; which he states thus: "In that case it was the unanimous opinion of the judges present on the bench that 'an unusual charge of a large amount requiring explanation to justify it was sufficient ground for referring the bill to taxation, even after the expiration of twelve months.'" Both in that case and in In re Norman the question was as to taxation after twelve months had elapsed since delivery; but it appears that the court was of opinion the same rule ought to be applied to taxation after payment. I have to consider, then, whether there are in this bill any charges which are unreasonably large. To my mind the charge of £20 for the work done in respect of this mortgage for £800 is outrageously large. To justify it according to the scale there must have been an investigation of the title; but there was not. The respondent cannot say more than that he investigated the title as far as was necessary, which means not at all. There must also have been a negotiation of the loan; but the respondent is not entitled to charge for that, as what he did was to mention Mr. Miller's name to Mr. Rumming, and so bring them into communication. Mr. Rumming afterwards called upon Mr. Miller, and all the negotiation which was done they did themselves. That is not enough to justify a solicitor in charging the fee for negotiating the loan. The cases of auctioneers and others depend upon the custom of trade, and can have nothing to do with the right to charge a negotiation fee as between solicitor and client.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the applicant would have a right to have this bill taxed if there were no agreement to the contrary; but Eley has given in his affidavit certain details of what happened on the day of completion which are not denied. [His lordship read the portion of Eley's affidavit stated above]. I do not lay much stress on what took place in respect to the action in the Lord Mayor's Court; but Eley's evidence, which is uncontradicted, shows that there was a special negotiation and bargain as to holding over Mr. Rumming's cheque. Under the circumstances I come to the conclusion that a bargain was made at the time of completion, that, if the cheque was held over, Eley's charge should not be disputed, and from that bargain Mr. Rumming cannot draw back. The summons must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

Oct. 25.—From this decision the applicant appealed; but when the appeal came on for hearing no one appeared in support of it, and it was dismissed.

BAINES v. GEARY. (a.)

Contract in restraint of trade—Reasonableness—Limit as to time—Severable—Partial enforcement.

An agreement for the employment of a servant contained an undertaking that he would not, after leaving the employment, serve or interfere with "any of the customers served or belonging at any time to" the master.

Held, that, whether or not the agreement might be construed so as to extend to persons who became customers of the master after the servant left his employment, it was at any rate good as to persons who were customers of the master during the employment of the servant, and that it was severable and enforceable as to such last-mentioned persons; and an injunction was granted to restrain the servant from serving or interfering with such last-mentioned persons.

By an agreement dated the 16th day of February, 1885, and made between Clement Baines, a dairyman, of Twickenham, of the one part, and Thomas Geary of the other part, Thomas Geary agreed to serve Clement Baines, his successors or assigns, as milk-carrier and general servant on the terms therein expressed, and the agreement proceeded as follows:—"In consideration of the wages paid to him, he undertakes that he will not, either during such service or after being discharged or quitting such service, serve or cause to be served with milk or any other dairy produce for his own benefit or that of any other person or persons, or, either directly or indirectly interfere with, or cause to be interfered with, in any way, any of the customers served or belonging at any time to the said Clement Baines, his successors or assigns."

In February, 1887, Baines agreed to sell his business of a dairyman to S. H. Edelsten, who entered upon the business on the 7th of March, 1887.

On the 5th of March, 1887, Geary quitted the service of Baines and set up as a dairyman on his own account in partnership with his brother at Twickenham. He both served with milk and solicited the custom of persons who were customers of Baines.

This was a motion by Baines and Edelsten for an interim injunction to restrain Geary from serving or interfering with the customers of Edelsten, or the former customers of Baines, in breach of the undertaking.

R. F. Norton, for the motion, stated the facts.

MacSwinney, for Geary.—The undertaking is void as being unreasonable. It extends to persons who became customers of the business after the servant left.

He referred to Rannie v. Irvine, 7 Man. & Gr. 969; Rousillon v. Rousillon, 28 W. R. 623, 14 Ch. D. 351.

R. F. Norton, in reply.—The undertaking construed as referring only to customers of any time during the employment of Geary is reasonable, and should be enforced.

nt's book, and the restraint was virtually limited to a given number of persons ascertained and agreed upon by the parties at the time." It is argued that the covenant ought to have been limited to persons who were customers of Baines at the time when it was entered into, or who became such during the period of the defendant's employment. The terms of the covenant in the present case are larger than those of the covenant in Rannie v. Irvine, and it is said that they are too extensive, and that therefore the covenant must fail altogether. A covenant in restraint of trade is good if it does not go further than is necessary to give reasonable protection to the covenantee; but it is unreasonable if it imposes a larger restraint than is necessary for that purpose. The courts, however, treat such a covenant as divisible, and enforce it so far as it is reasonable, while declining to enforce such part as is unreasonable. There are many cases in which covenants in restraint of trade have been held to be divisible as regards space. I will refer to one—Price v. Green, 16 M. & W. 346. There the defendant covenanted not to carry on the trade of a perfumer within the cities of London or Westminster, or within the distance of 600 miles from the same respectively, and the court held that the restriction was reasonable as to London and Westminster, and enforceable to that extent, but unreasonable, and therefore not enforceable, as to the 600 miles. But no case was cited in which such a covenant had been held to be divisible as regards time, and I postponed my judgment to see if any such case had been reported. I have found the case of Nicholls v. Stretton, 7 Beav. 42, where the defendant, on being articled for five years to the plaintiff, who was a solicitor, covenanted that he would not during the five years, nor at any time after the expiration of that term, either directly or indirectly, interfere or intermeddle with, or be concerned as attorney, agent, or otherwise for any person who had already been, or should from time to time thereafter become or be, the client or correspondent in business of or with the plaintiff, or any partner or partners he might admit to a share or shares with him, or any person or persons to whom he might sell or assign the whole or any part of his business or profession of attorney, solicitor, and conveyancer. Lord Langdale, M.R., held that the covenant was not too extensive, and granted an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant from interfering or intermeddling with, or being concerned as an attorney, agent, or otherwise for any client or correspondent of the plaintiff, or of the plaintiff and his partners in the plaintiff's business of an attorney, solicitor, or conveyancer. A note to the report states that an appeal was presented from this decision, and that a case was stated for a court of law. Either that case, or an action for damages for breach of the covenant, came before the Court of Queen's Bench in Nicholls v. Stretton, 10 Q. B. 246. Two sets of breaches of the covenant were relied on by the plaintiff. The first was in respect of persons who had been clients of the plaintiff before and at the time of the defendant's entering into the covenant; the second was in respect of persons who became clients of the plaintiff afterwards while the defendant continued articled to him.

Mr. Bramwell, for the defendant, who had demurred, argued that "such a covenant almost puts it in the power of the plaintiff to exclude the defendant from business whenever; and it is much more extensive than can be required for the protection of the plaintiff in no limitation as to time or space. . . . It would have been fully secured against the loss of from the opportunities which he gave the defendant a covenant that the defendant should not be for anyone who had been the plaintiff's client at the time of the defendant being with him. But it will be argued that the covenant good, and that the good part may be separated. Now, here, the contract is a covenant on one side is in consideration of every covenant on the other; and if any part is void the whole is void.

Mr. Cowling, for the plaintiff, argued that [illegible] out separating the different parts of the covenant [illegible] was no more protection than the particular [illegible] required, the defendant only being restrained [illegible] persons and not as to place or time.

In re WILLIAMS' TRUSTS. (a.)

Appointment of new trustees—Death of sole trustee in lifetime of testator—Death of testator's heir intestate—Form of vesting order—Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), ss. 32, 34—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 30.

The sole trustee of freehold land, appointed by will, died in the lifetime of the testator. The testator's heiress-at-law died intestate (after the Conveyancing Act, 1881, had come into operation), and there was no legal personal representative of her estate.

A petition, which was served on the testator's heir, was presented for the appointment of new trustees and a vesting order.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to appoint new trustees and to make an order vesting the trust property in the new trustees for such estate as was vested in the heiress-at-law at the time of her death.

Petition.

Thomas Williams (who died on the 4th of June, 1876), by his will dated the 22nd of September, 1862, devised and bequeathed all his real estate and the residue of his personal estate unto his brother David Williams, his heirs, executors, and administrators, upon the trusts therein mentioned, and also appointed him his executor. The will contained no power to appoint new trustees.

David Williams died on the 21st of October, 1865.

At the time of the testator's death his heiress-at-law was Mary Jenkins. She died on the 13th of March, 1882, intestate, leaving her son, D. W. Jenkins, her heir-at-law, who thereby became the testator's heir-at-law.

At the time of his mother's death D. W. Jenkins was under twenty-one, and limited administration to her estate was granted until he should attain twenty-one.

This petition was presented under the Trustee Acts for the appointment of new trustees and for a vesting order.

The trust estate consisted of freeholds and certain stock.

The petition was served on D. W. Jenkins, who had attained twenty-one, so that there was no legal personal representative of his mother.

Bardswell, for the petitioners.—As the testator's heir is before the court there is jurisdiction under the Trustee Act to appoint a new trustee: Gunson v. Simpson, 16 W. R. 782, L. Easement—Ancient lights—Obstruction by lessee of public body—Public undertaking—Land injuriously affected—Compensation—Injunction—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68—Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. ccxxxv.), ss. 2, 4, 7, 25, 33—Metropolitan Street Improvements Act (1877) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. ccxxii.), ss. 1—3.

By the Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1877, which incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the Metropolitan Board of Works were authorized to acquire land for the purpose, amongst other things, of widening Gray's-inn-road, and to purchase easements for that purpose. The board were also empowered, by section 33 of the Act, to let or sell certain portions of land for the purpose of building labourers' dwellings for the accommodation of labourers displaced by the improvements, the erection of which dwellings was imperatively required by the section. By the Amendment Act, 1882, the board were required to erect a certain number of labourers' dwellings on certain portions of land, without being expressly empowered to let or sell for that purpose, and section 33 of the principal Act was repealed.

The board sold a building lease of portions of the land for the purpose of the erection of the required labourers' dwellings, and the tenants of the board, in erecting the dwellings, obstructed the ancient lights of adjacent owners.

Held, that the remedy of the adjacent owners was compensation under the 68*th section of the Lands Clauses Act*, 1845, and that they were not entitled to an injunction.

Motion.

The action was brought for an injunction to restrain the defendant from erecting labourers' dwelling-houses so as to obstruct the ancient lights of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs were the owners and tenants of houses situate on the north side of Portpool-lane, Gray's-inn-road. The defendant Fryer was a sub-lessee of the executors of Thomas Pink (since deceased), the purchaser from the Metropolitan Board of Works of a building lease of a piece of land situate in Gray's-inn-road, and abutting on the south side of Portpool-lane, immediately opposite to the plaintiffs' houses, which piece of land was, together with other land, acquired by the board under the Metropolitan Street Improvements Acts, 1877 and 1882, which required the erection of labourers' dwellings upon the piece of land.

The building lease was sold by the board "subject to the obligations imposed by the said Acts, and to all rights and easements (if any) existing in or over the said piece of land," and "subject to the rights (if any)" of adjacent owners. The form of lease contained a covenant to submit plans to the board for approval, and after such approval to build in accordance therewith, and not, during the first eighty years of the term, to add to or alter the character of the dwellings without the consent of the board in writing. The sub-lease to the defendant contained provisions similar to those in the lease from the board.

The defendant, in erecting labourers' dwellings in accordance with the approved plans and specifications as required by his under-lease, interfered with the ancient lights of the plaintiffs.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs for an interim injunction until the trial of the action.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question to be decided was whether the plaintiffs had a right to an injunction, or whether their only remedy was by compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 68.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Byrne, for the plaintiffs.—We are entitled to an injunction to restrain the obstruction of the ancient lights, and are not restricted to compensation under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. The cases of Clark v. School Board for London, 22 W. R. 354, L. R. 9 Ch. 120, and Duke of Bedford v. Dawson, L. R. 20 Eq. 353, 24 W. R. Dig. 236, in which it was decided that the persons entitled to ancient lights which were obstructed had no remedy by injunction, do not apply, because the public bodies in those cases differ from the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the public buildings erected by them differ from labourers' dwellings. Here the dwellings are being built by the defendant, who is a private individual, and not by the Metropolitan Board of Works or any public body, and the privileges of a public body do not extend to a private individual. The board had no power to grant the building lease, as the 33rd section of the Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1877, which gave such power, is repealed by the 3rd section of the Amendment Act of 1882. The plaintiffs could not obtain compensation under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, from the defendant, who is a private individual. Besides, the terms of the lease provide for the rights of adjacent owners, which include the ancient lights of the plaintiffs.

Gifford, Q.C., and Creed, for the defendant.—This case is governed by Clark v. School Board for London and Duke of Bedford v. Dawson, and the plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction, but his remedy is compensation under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. The Metropolitan Board of Works having no means of erecting labourers' dwellings themselves, were of necessity entitled to grant the building lease, and the 3rd section of the Amendment Act of 1882 does not take away that right by repealing the 33rd section of the Act of 1877. The rights and privileges of the board, including their immunity from injunction, extend to persons who erect for the board the labourers' dwellings which the Act requires. The terms of the lease granted by the board cannot take away the statutory immunity from injunction, and do not give to adjacent owners remedies to which they would not otherwise be entitled.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J.—I should have thought, independently of authority, that an easement of light over a neighbouring property was an easement which the board might purchase, under the 7th section of the Metropolitan Street Improvements Act, 1877, in the usual way, by notice. But it has been held, in Clark v. School Board for London and Duke of Bedford v. Dawson, that the interference by the board with the access of light over the premises required by them to the neighbouring premises, is a matter for which the person injured may obtain compensation under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, by applying for compensation for the injury done at any time, even after the works are completed, and that he has no remedy by way of injunction to restrain the work being done. I said the "board," but neither of those two cases related to the Metropolitan Board of Works. One related to the School Board for London, and the other to the Clearing House. I have looked at those two cases and the sections of the Acts on which they were founded, and I see no substantial distinction between the cases of those bodies under their Acts, and the case of the Metropolitan Board of Works under the present Acts.

Now the paramount object of the 33rd section of the Act of 1877 is to have the lands on which artizans' dwellings were intended to be erected devoted to the purpose of building such dwellings for the labouring classes, and the Metropolitan Board of Works are merely an instrument, with considerable discretion and control, but not the absolute owners of the property, because they are subject to the control of the Secretary of State. The question is, what is the meaning of the 3rd section of the Amendment Act of 1882 as applicable to the Act of 1877? Is the Act of of 1877 to be read, for the present purpose, as if that section had not been contained in any way whatever within that Act, as that section of the Amendment Act would seem to imply; or is it to receive some other modified meaning, having regard to the language of the Act, the state of things existing immediately before the passing of the Act, and the duties imposed upon the Metropolitan Board of Works by the Act itself?

It is clear that the erection of these additional buildings for the labouring classes was required by the Act of 1877. It is clear, also, that by the Act of 1882 similar buildings were also required. Nothing in the Act of 1882 removes the obligation of erecting such buildings, although the mode of doing it may, no doubt, be modified by the later Act. It is suggested that the 33rd section of the Act of 1877 is to be taken, so far as relates to the Gray's-inn-road improvement, as if it had never been enacted. Under those circumstances, how was the erection of artizans' buildings, required by the Act of 1882, to be carried out? I do not see how it could be done.

I have looked at other Acts which have been passed with reference to the erection of artizans' dwellings. I cannot find that under those Acts the board has any power to erect any buildings on this land. The principal Act is the Act of 1875 amended in 1879. Under that Act it is clear that the Metropolitan Board of Works have power to erect buildings under certain circumstances. But in the first place that Act is confined to what are called unhealthy areas, and there is no suggestion that the land upon which these houses are, falls under that category; and, in the next place, it is only to be put in force by means of certain machinery pointed out by the Act. It is clear that in the present case what has been done has been to follow the powers given, or purported to be given, by the two Acts I have been reading, and no appeal is made to the powers of the other Acts which I have just mentioned.

Then, even under those Acts the paramount object is that the Metropolitan Board of Works shall let or sell the property they take, and although there is a power given to them to construct houses themselves in certain cases, yet it is only to be done by means of powers authorizing them to raise money for the purpose, and there is nothing of that sort in the present Act.

Looking, therefore, at the Acts, I find nothing that would enable the Metropolitan Board of Works, outside of the two Acts now before me, to build on this land the buildings which the Act of 1882 contemplates shall be erected on the land for the purposes mentioned in that Act. It seems to me, therefore, that section 33 of the Act of 1877 is not wholly out of the case. It may be that in terms it is to be read as not being in the Act; but then the powers given to, and the obligation imposed upon, the Metropolitan Board of Works, seem to me to be such that they cannot have effect given to them unless by this Act itself. Powers—I do not say in the same terms precisely, but to the same effect—are by implication conferred upon the board such as were, in express terms, conferred by the Act of 1877.

Then the recommendations contained in the report of the select committee, so far as it is recited in the Act of 1882, are of the utmost importance in considering its effect. They state what the difficulties are. Then the Act of 1882 recites that certain obligations in relation to the removal of existing houses and the accommodation of the labouring classes were imposed upon the board by the Act of 1877; that, by reason of those obligations, the board have been prevented from carrying into effect certain of the purposes of the Act; and that they recommend that, subject to certain conditions, the board shall be relieved of the obligation imposed by section 33, as far as the same is applicable to the Gray's-inn-road improvements, and that it is expedient to give such relief by this Act.

Now, what obligations are they relieved from by the Act of 1882? They are not relieved from the obligation of taking the land in question in the Gray's-inn-road. It is clear it must be taken, and it must be employed, for the purposes intended. It seems to me, therefore, that the obligation of taking it and doing what that section authorizes—namely, selling it or letting it for the purpose of erecting suitable dwelling-houses for the labouring classes—is continued by this Act, and is imposed upon them, notwithstanding that the 33rd section of the Act of 1877, giving express power, is taken to be out of the Act for the present purpose. It is clear, therefore, that they must, under the implied powers of the Act (I suppose that is the proper way of considering it) be authorized to take land and to deal with it accordingly; that is, using the language of the Act, it shall be appropriated exclusively to the erection of buildings of a certain class. Inasmuch as they have not, as far as I can find out, any power themselves of applying the moneys raised by rates for the construction of such buildings, it can only be done by doing what the Act of 1877 contemplated should be done in the Gray's-inn-road, and what the Act of 1877 still contemplates should be done, so far as it has not been done, in carrying out the improvements in various other parts of the metropolis to which the Act of 1877 still applies. It seems to me, therefore, that there is an implied power in the board to do what they could have done under the 33rd section of the Act of 1877 under the express direction contained there.

Well, then, what are the purposes for which the repeal of that section, so far as the Gray's-inn-road is concerned, takes effect? It says: "After the passing of this Act the provisions contained in section 33 shall cease to be in force." That looks rather as though it were intended to apply to the various provisoes that follow upon what I may call the enacting part; but I have great doubt whether that can be the meaning of it, because the language of the section is, "And in relation thereto the Act of 1877 shall be read as though the section were not contained therein." But it is unnecessary for me to deal with that, because, although there are certain provisoes in the 33rd section as to which I see no reason why they should not continue to apply to what has to be done under the Act of 1882, it is not material for the present purpose, and, therefore, I say no more about them, excepting that I do find that the proviso in section 33—that not more than fifteen houses are to be taken until accommodation has been provided for such numbers of persons as would be displaced by such taking—is one which clearly created a great difficulty in the matter, and to remove which the Act of 1882 was intended to apply. Putting the best construction I can upon the Act, it seems to me that the obligation on the board to appropriate the land coloured green to the erection of artizans' dwellings, is at least as strong under the Act of 1882 as it was under the Act of 1877. It must be carried out in the only way in which it can be done. It cannot be done by the board erecting the buildings themselves; it can only be done by letting or selling to some person who is to do the same thing. It seems to me, therefore, that the power of letting or selling expressly contained in the 33rd section of the Act of 1877 is to be implied as still existing in the board as regards the land referred to in the 2nd section of the Act of 1882.

If the board could have built the houses, any remedy the plaintiffs might have for interference with their lights could not be maintained by getting an injunction to restrain the building, but must be obtained by compensation under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act. The plaintiff's right previously to the Act was a right to an easement of light. The effect of the Act was to extinguish that right and to convert it into a right to be compensated for the injury he has sustained by reason of that light being taken away.

It is important, next, to consider whether there can be any injunction against the defendant Fryer, who is now erecting the buildings for the board. It appears to me that the persons who act for the board are in the same position as if the board themselves had been building. If this land had been taken for a railway, and the promoters of the undertaking had entered into an agreement with contractors that they should construct the line, and have a lease of the line, and work the line when made, it seems to me that those persons would be in precisely the same position as the promoters of the undertaking as regards the relative rights of the persons whose land was taken from them by the promoters. As the Metropolitan Board of Works cannot build themselves, and as they are entitled to let or sell for the purpose of building, the rights conferred by the Act upon them apply to persons to whom the land may pass for the purposes of the Act, who must have the like privileges and freedom from obligations as the board would have had if they themselves had been erecting the buildings, which are not only authorized but bound to be erected under the Act.

Then it is said there is a difference, because the sale to Mr. Pink and the lease to Mr. Fryer are subject to existing easements. That does not appear to me to alter the case as regards the plaintiffs. It would be depriving the Metropolitan Board of Works of the power which they are intended to have under the Act if they could limit their rights in that way by recreating an obligation on land of this sort and attaching to it certain liabilities from which the Legislature intended it to be freed in passing the Act and authorizing them to acquire land for these purposes under the Act. It seems to me that they could not set up again those easements and obligations from which the land is to be free for the statutory purposes for which it is to be taken. But it does not follow that those words are without meaning. They are matter of express bargain between the Metropolitan Board of Works and the purchasers from them; and, again, as between Pink's executors and the defendant. There may be certain rights arising out of those stipulations between the parties who enter into them, wholly unimportant as regards the owners of the land, the persons who did have the easements, now at an end, to which the land was subject. I have formed an opinion about those words, but I do not intend to say anything on the subject, as I have only one of the parties interested before me. It is obvious that Pink's executors and the Metropolitan Board of Works may still have a great interest in the construction of those documents.

Then, further, it is said that what is being done leaves the plaintiffs without remedy, because, whatever right of compensation they might have had against the Metropolitan Board of Works under the Acts, if the Metropolitan Board of Works had taken the land, and had themselves proceeded to erect buildings and blocked out the access of light from the plaintiffs, yet the Metropolitan Board of Works are not doing it, they have parted with all their interest, and they are doing nothing whatever of which the plaintiffs can complain.

Now the right to compensation under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845—to take only the material words—is this:—It is compensation "in respect of any lands which shall have been injuriously affected by the execution of the works." The works mean those for which the lands were taken under the Act, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of the Act. Therefore, as far as those words go, it appears to me that this is land which, if the plaintiffs are right as to the obstruction of light (which I assume for the present purpose), is injuriously affected by the execution of the works. There is nothing limiting the obligation to make compensation during the execution of the works authorised by the Act, pending the works done by the promoters of the undertaking themselves. As I have already pointed out, the promoters of a railway would be bound, so far as any act injuriously affecting neighbouring land is done by the contractors with whom they have entered into an obligation to make the line and take a lease of it, corresponding mutatis mutandis with the provisions of the agreement in the present case.

It seems to me, therefore, that the contention that, by the board's disposing of the property, the right against them has ceased, and that there can be no right against Mr. Fryer for compensation, and therefore there must be a right for an injunction, cannot be sustained. In the first place, although the work has been done by the lessee, that of itself is not sufficient to exclude a right to compensation. In the next place, this is to be borne in mind, which is a very important matter: the Metropolitan Board of Works are not mere passive agents in the matter. They have not got the land in lease, yet they have got it under an obligation and have recognized that obligation. They have insisted on that obligation being performed by the persons to whom they have sold the land, and they have taken express covenants and provisions that the land shall be dealt with exactly in the way in which it has been dealt with by the persons claiming to build thereon. They have reserved the power to re-enter in case the works are not performed in accordance with the proposed plans.

It seems to me, therefore, that, as between the plaintiffs on the one hand and the Metropolitan Board of Works on the other, it cannot be said that all right to relief or all liability to give relief had passed away from the Metropolitan Board of Works to the persons who are the actual erectors of the building which causes the nuisance.

Then, again, the plaintiffs were not consulted about or parties to the arrangements the board made with respect to the land; and I do not think that the board has the power of depriving the plaintiffs of any remedy the statute gives against the board by any private arrangements that the board make with the persons to whom they sell or lease for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the Act.

Under the circumstances, I am of opinion that the remedy of the plaintiffs, if they are injured, is by obtaining compensation, and not by injunction; and I refuse the motion.

JUDGE v. BENNETT. (a.)

Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), s. 7—Intimidation—Threatening to "watch and beset."

An intimation conveyed in a letter to an employer that his shop would be picketed, in language so threatening as "to make such employer afraid," amounts to "intimidation" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, whether the picketing amounts to an unlawful "watching or besetting" within sub-section (4) or not.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the borough of Leeds under 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

The appellant, Judge, was secretary to the Leeds National Union of Operative Boot and Shoe Rivetters and Finishers. He had been summoned by the respondent, Mrs. Bennett, a boot and shoe manufacturer, under the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, s. 7, in that, "with a view to compel the aforesaid Mrs. Bennett to do a certain act which she had a legal right to do or abstain from doing—namely, in refusing to take back certain workmen into her employment—the said Judge did intimidate the said Mrs. Bennett." The facts found were as follows. There had been a strike among the rivetters in Mrs. Bennett's employ, whereupon the appellant wrote the following letter to the respondent:—"I have to inform you that the rivetters in your employ have determined not to again start work unless you are willing to start the whole of them. Should you refuse to start them all, the finishers will also be stopped and your shop picketed until such time that you comply with the conditions above stated. . . . . If you are agreeable to take back all your hands the matter is settled. If not, then we shall fight it out to the end." The respondent refused to take back the men, and her shop was ordered by the Union to be picketed. Two men paraded in turns before the front of the shop for three days. It was admitted that the picketers behaved in an orderly manner and did not personally interfere with the workpeople going in and out of the respondent's shop, but a crowd of four to five hundred people assembled in the roadway outside the shop, and the police were called upon by the respondent to protect her shop from, as she alleged, a well-grounded fear on her part of personal violence. The magistrate found that, on the above facts, "intimidation" was proved "on the ground that the statement contained in the above letter, that the shop would be picketed, was a threat to watch and beset the house or place where a person carries on business, and therefore amounted to intimidation; and that if the letter was not intended to intimidate it ought to have been couched so as merely to show the writer's wish to obtain or communicate information, but that a person receiving such a letter as this must have looked upon it as a threat to watch and beset the premises within sub-section 4 of section 7 of the Act."

R. Wright (Rentoul with him), for the appellant.—The magistrate has not distinguished the different offences detailed in the separate sub-sections of section 7 of the Conspiracy Act, 1875. "Using violence or intimidating" is an offence under sub-section (1). This was a charge of "watching and besetting" under sub-section (4). A mere announcement, or even a threat to watch and beset, is not "intimidation" under sub-section (1). Picketing in a certain way was legalized by this Act. It was only restrained so far as it amounted to an "unlawful watching and besetting" of the hous or place of the employer or other workmen. Here it is admitted that the picketers behaved in a regular and orderly way, without interfering with the other workmen, and only attended for purposes of information on behalf of the Union. An announcement to picket, however forcibly expressed, does not amount to intimidation within this Act. As to what was illegal picketing before the Act see Reg. v. Shepherd, 11 Cox C. C. 325.

Longstaffe, for the respondent, was not called upon.

STEPHEN, J.—Intimidation is to use violence so as to make a person afraid. It is not brought about by actual threats of violence to a person or his property, but by attempting by any means to make that person afraid—in this particular instance, of doing or not doing that which such person has a legal right to do or to refuse to do. If a man expresses his intention to picket in such terms as to make the person addressed afraid, that is sufficient to bring his action within the meaning of intimidation. I can imagine that such intention to picket might be conveyed in such terms as to show that there was no intention to do anything within the terms of this Act. Here this determination was conveyed in such a way as to cause fear. That is equivalent to intimidation, and this conviction must be upheld.

A. L. SMITH, J.—Intimidation is not merely to use violence or to threaten to use violence. Sub-section (1) of section 7 shows this. It says, "Everyone . . . who uses violence or intimidates." What is the meaning of "intimidates"? Why, the using of language which causes another man to fear. I think this conviction was right.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ., sitting as a Divisional Court). — July 27.

THOMAS v. MIREHOUSE. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Sheriff—Notice of claim for arrears of rent—Removal and sale of goods without payment of rent—Forced sale—Measure of damages—8 Anne, c. 14, s. 1.

In an action brought by a landlord against a sheriff, under 8 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, for the removal and sale of goods taken in execution, without paying a year's rent, it is not sufficient for the defendant to show, in mitigation of damages, that the goods realized less than the amount of the rent, but he must prove that their actual value to the landlord at the time of removal was less.

Appeal from the Pembroke County Court.

This was an action brought by the landlord of a house in Hill-street, Issels, Pembroke, against the sheriff of the county to recover, under section 1 of 8 Anne, c. 14, the sum of £30, being the amount of one year's rent due from the tenant at the time that an execution was levied upon his goods.

It appeared that, although the plaintiff had given notice of his claim, as required by the statute, the goods were removed and sold by the defendant without payment of the rent. The goods, when sold, realized only £21 17s. 3d. From this sum the defendant claimed to deduct £6 4s. 6d. for the expenses of the sale, and contended that he was liable to the plaintiff for the balance only, amounting to £15 12s. 9d.

The county court judge found a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at £30.

T. Terrell, for the defendant.—The measure of damages is not the amount of rent due, but the value of the goods seized, or what, with reasonable care, they would sell for. The sheriff is liable to the landlord for the proceeds of the sale only, after deducting his lawful charges: Henchett v. Kimpron, 2 Wils. 140.

The following cases were also cited: Palgrave v. Windham, 1 Str. 212; West v. Hedges, 1 Barnes' Notes of Cases, 211; Green v. Austin, 3 Camp. 260; Foster v. Hilton, 1 Dowl. 35; Calvert v. Joliffe, 2 B. & Ad. 418; Riseley v. Ryle, 11 M. & W. 16; and the remarks of Patterson, J., in Wharton v. Naylor, 12 Q. B. 673.

Wilfred Allen, for the plaintiff.—The measure of damages is the sum due in respect of arrears of rent: Arnitt v. Garnett, 3 B. & Ald. 440; Colyer v. Speer, 2 Brod. & B. 67. Until the rent is paid there are no goods out of which the sheriff is bound to levy: Cocker v. Musgrove, 9 Q. B. 223.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The law appears to be as follows. When notice has been given by the landlord to the sheriff that rent is due it becomes the duty of the sheriff under the statute not to sell anything upon the demised premises till the rent has been paid, although there may be goods upon the premises of a value many times exceeding the amount of rent due. He must, therefore, before he proceeds with the execution, apply to the execution creditor for the necessary sum. If the execution creditor provides it the sheriff pays the landlord and proceeds with the execution. If the execution creditor does not provide it the sheriff cannot be called on to infringe the statute, and may either return nulla bona and withdraw from possession, or may himself pay the rent, looking to the execution creditor for reimbursement, and proceed to sell. This is the position of the sheriff under the Act. If he commits a breach of duty by a wrongful sale—i.e., a sale which takes place before the rent is paid—the statute appears to me to state by implication that he will be liable to compensate the landlord by paying him the amount of rent which is due. The cases, however, show that though the amount of the rent is primâ facie the measure of the damages, it is open to the sheriff, after the landlord has proved his case by giving evidence of the tenancy, the amount of rent due, and notice, to show, in mitigation of damages, that the value of the goods removed was not sufficient to pay the rent. In such a case the loss to the landlord by the removal of the goods, or, in other words, their value to him at the time of the removal, becomes the measure of damages.

Here the defendant has failed to show that the value of the goods to the landlord at the time of the removal was less than the rent. He has merely shown that they produced less on a forced sale. This does not necessarily represent their value to the landlord unless he were bound to distrain, and to distrain at the same time, under the same circumstances, and employing the same auctioneer as the sheriff when the wrongful sale took place. The appeal will therefore be dismissed.

LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ., concurred.

ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET CO. (LIMITED) v. ENGLISH BANK OF RIO DE JANEIRO (LIMITED). (a.)

Shipping—General average—Partial discharge of cargo before taking of extraordinary measures for safety of the ship—Effect of.

A steamer carrying, among other things, a large amount of specie on board ran aground and was in a position of danger. The specie was immediately landed by the master of the steamer and conveyed by land to another port. Subsequently part of the cargo on board was jettisoned for the purpose of getting the steamer off.

Held, that the losses and expenses incurred in getting the steamer off and the expenses incurred in landing and conveying the specie were not general average to which the owners of the specie were liable to contribute.

This was a special case.

The plaintiffs were owners of the British steamship Tagus, and the defendants were bankers at Rio de Janeiro and in London. On June 22, 1886, the defendants delivered to the plaintiffs £25,000 specie in boxes to be carried on board The Tagus from Rio de Janeiro to Southampton. The bill of lading was an ordinary one, and by one of its clauses the plaintiffs were empowered to "tranship or land" the goods shipped; by another of its clauses "average, if any," was "to be adjusted in England and according to the practice of English average adjusters." The Tagus left Rio de Janeiro on June 24, 1886, with passengers, mails, and a general cargo, in addition to the specie referred to. On June 27 The Tagus ran aground on a coral reef off Aritubа, on the Island Itaparica, about fifteen miles from Bahia. The majority of the passengers were landed at Itaparica the same evening, as soon as the sea was calm enough to admit of it. The next day the remaining passengers, with their effects, and all the specie, including that belonging to the defendants, were landed. On June 29, owing to the "tremendous rollers from the southward prevailing, the master deemed it expedient, as the only means of saving the vessel, to throw overboard the cargo and ballast." This was accordingly done, and the ship came off on the morning of July 2 and proceeded under her own steam to Bahia, and from thence to Southampton without the necessity of repairs. Meanwhile the specie had been conveyed to Bahia under military escort, and was eventually forwarded to Southampton by agreement with the various shippers in another vessel called The Elbe. But it was agreed that, for the purposes of this case, it should be treated as having been carried by the plaintiffs to Southampton in The Tagus. The losses and expenses in respect of which the plaintiffs claimed from the defendants a general average contribution were the losses by and incidental to the jettison; the cost of the hire of the tugs, lighters, and other salvage expenses; and the cost of landing, protecting, conveying, and warehousing the specie at Itaparica and Bahia. The court had power to draw inferences of fact.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Sir C. Russell, Q.C., and Inches with him), for the plaintiffs.—The specie was landed at Itaparica, guarded while there, and sent on to and warehoused at Bahia as part of a continuous salvage operation undertaken for the common preservation of ship, cargo, and freight, of which the jettison, and the employment of tugs formed another part. If the specie had been kept on board or placed in a ship's boat or a lighter while the jettison and towing continued, it would clearly have been liable to contribute. The fact that it was landed can or ought to make no difference. It was landed with a view to being again taken on board and conveyed to its destination. There was no real severance of the adventure. The true inference to be drawn from the facts is that all the extraordinary measures taken from the stranding of the vessel until July 3, when both ship and specie reached Bahia, had reference, not to a single, but to the common interest. Among these extraordinary measures must be included landing of the specie, because although the master was justified in bestowing upon it a special degree of care on account of its value, it really had the effect of enabling him to use his best efforts to get the ship off. He would not have been justified in prosecuting a dangerous salvage operation while an article at once so valuable and so easily removed remained on board. But even after the landing the specie remained in danger, and was liable to be taken by force or stolen, as the employment of a military escort proves. This, too, was a common danger to the general adventure and continued till the voyage was resumed at Bahia, so that the specie must, like the rest of the cargo, contribute to the extraordinary losses and expenses incurred in consequence. The case of Moran v. Jones, 5 W. R. 503, 7 E. & B. 523, which closely resembles this case, is supposed to be inconsistent with Job v. Langton, 4 W. R. 641, 6 E. & B. 779, and Walthew v. Mavrojani, L. R. 5 Ex. 116, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 93, but the cases may be reconciled. In all three cases part of the cargo, which it was sought to make contributory, had been taken out before the efforts to get the ship off commenced, but in one case the court drew the inference of fact that the removal was part of a general salvage operation, and in the other two that it was a special operation undertaken for the preservation of the goods themselves. In this case the former inference should be drawn, the captain, who is agent for all, ought not to have the power of exonerating part of the cargo from liability to contribute, and on the other hand it is inexpedient that a captain should be tempted improperly to keep valuable cargo on board and exposed to risk in order to preserve its liability.

He cited, further, Beavan v. Bank of United States, in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 4 Wharton, 300, and Nelson v. Belmont, in Superior Court of New York, 5 Duer, 310.

Bigham, Q.C. (J. Gorell Barnes with him), for the defendants. — The removal of the specie did not appreciably lighten the vessel or assist the salvage operations; the gold was placed in safety for its own protection just as the passengers were landed for theirs, and not with a view to, or as a part of, the salvage operation. The jettison and towage were of use to the ship and the cargo remaining on board, but were of no use to the specie, which was already safe on shore. The fact that the ship was thereby enabled to continue the voyage is irrelevant to a question of general average: Walthew v. Mavrojani, Svensden v. Wallace, 13 Q. B. D. 69, 32 W. R. Dig. 191. The true criterion is given in Kemp v. Halliday, 14 W. R. 697, 6 B. & S. 723, where Blackburn, J., cites as a "perfectly accurate statement of the law" the following passage from Arnould on Marine Insurance, 2nd ed., vol. 2, p. 931:—"A stranded vessel is in most cases in danger of being lost unless speedy steps be taken for her preservation, either by unloading the cargo to lighten her, or by endeavouring to float her by means of buoys, &c., with the cargo in her. The remuneration which the shipowner is obliged to pay for the services thus rendered gives a claim to general average contribution, provided such services shall appear to have been incurred for the joint benefit of ship and cargo, which will be the case if ship and cargo are both exposed to common danger, and both saved by the exertions employed for their rescue." Here the common danger to the ship and the specie ceased as soon as the specie was removed from the ship, and the specie was safe and exposed to no peril in common with the shid when those exertions began for which contribution is now sought. In Walthew v. Mavrojani, in the Exchequer Chamber, Bovill, C.J., thus applied the principle to a similar case:—"Whereas to ground a claim for general average there must be a danger, actual or impending, common to both ship and cargo, here the cargo was safe, and the ship only in peril; it was indifferent to the owners of the cargo whether the ship floated or not, and there was, therefore, no sacrifice made or extraordinary expense incurred to save both ship and cargo, or for the common benefit of both." If the captain had left the gold on board to run the risks incident to that position and to the salvage operations, the shipowner would have been liable to an action for negligence: Notara v. Henderson, 20 W. R. 443, L. R. 7 Q. B. 225. In Svendsen v. Wallace Brett, M.R., expressed the opinion that Moran v. Jones cannot be sustained. The American decisions are no authority, because American law has adopted the criterion of the continuation of the voyage, which is repudiated by English law.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 23.—The following judgments were delivered:—

WILLS, J.—In this case the owners of The Tagus claim contribution, by way of general average, from the owners of specie carried by her on a voyage from Rio to Southampton under the following circumstances:—

The Tagus grounded off the island of Itaparica, about fifteen miles from Bahia, at 2.30 a.m. on June 27, 1886. She grounded on a coral reef, on one part or another of which, with slight variations of position, she remained till the evening of July 2. The sea was running high, and very shortly after she struck seas broke over her which continually swept the decks and washed away the cutter. She was exposed to the unbroken force of the Atlantic rollers, and I cannot doubt that she was from the first, and remained till the last, in a position which threatened destruction alike of ship and cargo, and which made it necessary that extraordinary sacrifices should be made and extraordinary expenses incurred to save the ship and cargo. In the forenoon of the day on which she struck (June 27) the master began to land his passengers and their baggage, and completed this operation on the 28th. About ten o'clock on the 28th he landed the specie, of which 25,000 sovereigns belonging to the defendants formed part.

The vessel lay about two and a-half miles from the shore, and very nearly opposite to a fishing village called Aritubа, consisting of a few huts. The island is from twelve to fourteen miles long, mostly uninhabited, but about four miles off is a small town called Catu, on the Western coast of the island. A small steamer plies several times a week between Catu and Bahia, distant about twenty miles. The specie was landed at Aritubа, and placed there in a hut hired for the purpose, and remained there in charge of the purser and doctor from June 28 to July 2, when the purser handed it over to a Brazilian custom house officer, under the charge of whom, accompanied by the purser, it was on July 3 taken across the island to Catu, and there put on board a small steamer sent from Bahia by the plaintiffs' agent. A file of soldiers had been sent from Bahia by the president of the province on July 1 and placed at the disposal of the captain, and they guarded the specie from their arrival till it left Catu, and escorted it on the steamer to Bahia, where it was handed over to the plaintiffs' agent, and by him forwarded to Southampton by The Elbe, under an agreement between the plaintiffs and defendants by which the defendants agreed to pay general average as if it had come by The Tagus.

The master of The Tagus, finding her immovable, sent away the second officer with the mail boat about eight a.m. on June 27.

Her position on the reef had been ascertained at 3.30 a.m., when she had four fathoms of water under her bow and three and a-half under her stern, so that she must have been resting on the reef somewhere between bow and stern, and there can be no doubt that she was in a position of great peril. The plaintiffs' agent at once proceeded to engage lighters and tugs at Bahia to proceed to the assistance of The Tagus, and I have no doubt from this fact that the master had sent him word that it would be necessary to lighten the vessel in order to get her off. The mail boat, with the officer in charge, returned to the ship about eight p.m. on the 27th. The first steamer sent by the agent arrived near The Tagus in the forenoon of the 28th; but the weather appears to have been too heavy to admit of her rendering any assistance, or even to allow communication between the agent's clerk who was on board her and the stranded vessel, and about midday she steamed back to Bahia.

In the night between the 28th and 29th very heavy rollers set in from the south, and about 5 a.m. the master came to the conclusion that the only means of saving the vessel was to jettison the cargo, and the crew worked at getting the cargo overboard the whole of that day. A tug arrived in the evening of the 29th, and on June 30 and July 1 several other tugs followed. The work of jettisoning cargo and coals went on till the evening of July 2, the tugs hauling on to the ship and the ship's engines working at each high water. The hawsers parted repeatedly, and it was not till the evening of July 2 that the steamer floated. Lighters had been sent out to the ship to save, if possible, some of the cargo that had to be taken out, but the weather was too heavy to permit of their being used, except one, which carried some of the passengers' effects ashore. The steamer proceeded the next morning (July 3) under her own steam to Bahia, where she arrived a few hours before the small steamer with the specie. A portion only of the cargo had been jettisoned, and The Tagus was so far uninjured that she proceeded without repairs to Southampton with the remainder of her cargo on board, which she delivered in good order. She could have carried on the specie, but it was carried by The Elbe at the request of the defendants and under the agreement hereinbefore referred to.

The plaintiffs contend that the specie is liable to contribute, by way of general average, to the loss by jettison, and the expense of getting the ship afloat, and the cost of landing, guarding and transporting, warehousing and reloading the specie. No attempt has been made on either side to draw a distinction between the claim in respect of jettison and that in respect of the cost of tugs and the like, and for the purposes of this case I treat these two heads of claim as standing on the same footing.

The case is in one important respect peculiar. There is no question as to circumstances having arisen which gave rise to a general average loss. It is not suggested that cargo generally is exempt, nor is it denied that the goods remaining on board and the goods jettisoned alike must bear their share of the common loss, but it is said that, so far as the specie is concerned, it was in a place of safety before any of the loss or expense was incurred, and that the expenses of landing, guarding, transporting, warehousing, and reloading the specie are particular average chargeable on the specie alone, and are not general average at all.

The question is not, therefore, whether the circumstances are or are not such as to make cargo, as distinct from ship and freight, liable to general average, nor whether, granting that cargo is liable to general average, the liability extends to this or that head of damage or expenditure, but whether one particular parcel of the cargo is exempt from the general burden. It is true the question is raised whether the specie is liable, by way of general average contribution, to bear its share of the expenses incurred for landing and guarding it and for transporting it to Bahia, but this seems to me to come pretty much to the question whether the specie is or is not liable to contribute to general average. If it be so liable, these expenses can hardly be particular average. If it be not, they certainly cannot be general average. The cases, therefore, which deal with the liability of the cargo as a whole, differ so materially in their circumstances from the present case that they can hardly be said to govern it, and it is to the principles they lay down and illustrate rather than to actual precedent, of which there is a singular dearth, that we must look for the solution of the question.

I take it to be settled now that the circumstances which impose a liability in the nature of a general average must be such as to imperil the safety of ship and cargo, and not merely such as to impede the successful prosecution of the particular voyage: Svensden v. Wallace; Harrison v. Bank of Australasia, 20 W. R. 385, L. R. 7 Ex. 39. I take it also to be settled that if the cargo as a whole be landed, and in safety, the expenses of getting the ship afloat thereafter are not general average: Job v. Langton, a case with which Moran v. Jones, has been supposed to conflict, does not seem to me, so far as principles are concerned, to be open to that observation. It is the decisions if anything, which are at variance, not the principles upon which they are based. The Master of the Rolls has stated in Svensden v. Wallace, at p. 80, that the decision in Moran v. Jones cannot be supported, and I refer to the case, therefore, only to show that it has not been overlooked. Where the cargo as a whole is safely landed, the shipowner has his ship as she lies, either supposed to be worthless, in which case she will be left where she is, or supposed to be worth something to him, in which case he will be held to spend the money necessary to rescue her on his own account, and for his own purposes only, in which case the expenditure cannot be the subject of general average. These principles, though they deal with different epochs, so to speak, in the chain of events which give rise to general average, the first dealing with the state of things at the commencement of the liability, and the other with a state of things at which the liability has terminated, have this in common: both point to the necessity, in order to establish a case of general average, of the existence of common danger of destruction at the moment when the liability is incurred. This necessity is laid down as the cardinal element necessary to establish a general average contribution in Arnould on Insurance, p. 917, 1st ed., p. 934, 2nd ed., where the learned author says, "All which is ultimately saved out of the whole adventure—i.e., ship, freight, and cargo—contributes to make good the general average loss, provided it has been actually at risk at the time such loss was incurred, but not otherwise, because if not at risk at the time of the loss it was not saved thereby." This, however, is not a complete statement of what things are liable to general average, for goods jettisoned themselves contribute, and after they are thrown overboard they are no longer at risk; and yet no one ever contended that, as each parcel or bale went over the side and was swallowed up by the waves, its liability to be carried into the account of future general average ceased, leaving the burden to be borne in a continually increasing ratio by the ship and its continually decreasing contents. It seems to follow that the loss spoken of must be regarded as a whole, and as that resulting from a continuity of operations. Mr. Arnould's proposition, to make it complete, must be amplified. Property, I think it may be said, whether ultimately saved or jettisoned, actually at risk at any time during which the operation causing oss has been going on (comprehending under that phrase all such acts as may be properly considered as forming together one whole), is liable to contribution, provided that in consequence of that operation the whole adventure be preserved from destruction, because if it was not at risk during any part of that time, no adventure of which it formed one of the constituents was saved by the operation. It is clear that Mr. Arnould's "loss" includes both jettison and expenditure to save ship and cargo from destruction.

It is obvious that if, in such a case, portions of a cargo, removed from the ship instead of being jettisoned, are carried on shore in lighters, and put in a place of safety, or are kept in the lighters and ultimately replaced in the ship, questions may arise whether such treatment is to be considered as the equivalent of jettison, or as the equivalent of remaining on board the ship, in either of which cases, as it seems to me, the liability to general average must ensue, or as a removal of a totally different character, not subjecting the goods to contribution.

If the object of the removal has been the lightening of the ship for the common safety, and the object of effecting the removal in such a fashion as to avoid jettison has been to do to that which must be got overboard something less wasteful than actual jettison, there seems to be no reason whatever for drawing a distinction between such a case and that of actual jettison so far as liability to general average is concerned. But if the lightening of the ship formed no part, or no appreciable part, of the purpose for which the removal was effected, if the object of the removal was not to minimize the cost of jettison but to get out of harm's way the thing removed, and to prevent it from being or remaining at risk at all, it seems to me that a different result may very well ensue, and that a portion of cargo landed under such circumstances may well be regarded as separated from the adventure, and no longer liable to contribution. There is authority for saying that the purpose for which an act causing loss is done may determine whether it constitutes general average or not. It is said in Abbott on Shipping, 7th ed., p. 479, to have been "considered" that where bullion was thrown overboard to escape capture by an enemy the loss was not general average, and the author gives as the reason that the jettison in case of pursuit by an enemy, in order to constitute a case of general average, must be for the purpose of saving ship and cargo by lightening her and increasing her speed. A reference is given to Butler v. Wildman, 3 B. & Ald. 398. The question in that case was whether such a loss was covered by a policy of insurance. It was said incidentally by Holroyd, J., that jettison, under these circumstances, would not be general average, and the observation is but an obiter dictum, but it is adopted by Lord Tenterden, and shows that the purpose for which an act causing loss is done must be regarded in determining whether it gives rise to general average contribution, and it illustrates the principle that, if the act be not done to avert some danger common to ship and cargo, it does not constitute a case of general average.

Mr. Lowndes has some pertinent observations in a passage dealing with the case where the ship and cargo are placed in a situation which may probably, but not certainly, result in total wreck. In the earlier stages he points out the difficulty of saying whether what is done is for the common safety or for the rescuing of the property piecemeal, and expresses the opinion that the purpose rather than the result shall govern the allowance adding a warning against the natural tendency "to accept accomplished facts," and to settle the question of purpose by reference to the result (Lowndes on General Average, 3rd ed., p. 147). Cases, no doubt, may occur in which it may be difficult to say whether the purpose for which goods are removed is that of lightening the ship or of saving the goods, and there will, no doubt, from time to time be instances in which it is impossible to separate the one purpose from the other. "The mere fact that the cargo is unladen, although it is done in part for the purpose of saving the goods, yet if it is also done for the purpose of lightening the vessel, and as a means of causing her to float, and of saving her from the common peril, will not necessarily divest the transaction of its character as an act performed for the joint benefit of ship and cargo": McAndrews v. Thatcher, 3 Wallace, at p. 370, in the Supreme Court of the United States. It is impossible with reference to such a matter to lay down any rigid or inflexible rule. The question will be one of circumstances and degree, and each case must depend upon its own facts. In the present instance, however, there seems to me to be no room for reasonable doubt that the predominant and probably the only object aimed at in sending the specie ashore was to put it beyond the reach of the peril to which the ship and the rest of the cargo remained exposed.

From the fact that the master sent the mail boat to Bahia as early as possible, and that the agent there immediately set to work to hire tugs and lighters, I have no doubt that it was present to the mind of the master very soon after the ship grounded that it would be necessary at all costs to lighten her, and that the jettison was delayed only because he hoped to be able to substitute for it the less disastrous expedient of getting the cargo ashore or into lighters. But I have equally little doubt that the specie was sent ashore, not to lighten the vessel, but to put such valuable property beyond the reach of possible danger by reason of the ship's breaking up or going to the bottom when she came off. What is the first step we always hear of when a vessel is wrecked? That the passengers and specie are put ashore. Specie is seldom aboard in quantities large enough for its removal to make any appreciable difference to the ship's chances of getting off when aground. The whole of the specie in this case weighed, we are told, about a ton and a half. The Tagus is a vessel of some 3,000 tons burthen. The ease to the vessel could be nothing at all. The combined value and smallness of total weight would be certain in any case to save the specie from jettison. Its value, and the facility with which it could be got ashore, would be certain in any case, where it was possible to land it, to save it from being left on board, and I cannot doubt that its removal was carried out, not in any sense or degree as a means of securing the common safety of ship and cargo, but simply for the purpose of saving the specie itself.

I think, therefore, that, when the general average loss was incurred, in whatever sense, restricted or enlarged, that can be properly used, the specie had ceased to be at risk, and that upon no reasonable view of the facts can its removal be considered as a part of the means taken for saving any common adventure. I am consequently of opinion that it is not liable, using the words of the special case, "to contribute to the jettison or to any of the expenses of getting the ship off the ground incurred after it was landed."

It is objected that the master has no right to prefer one part of the cargo to another, and to favour it at the expense of the rest. I make two answers. First, it is not a question of what the master had a right to do, but of what was done. He may have acted wrongly, but it is none the less the fact that the specie was landed, and was landed with the object of putting it out of the way of danger and not of helping the general adventure. Secondly, I do not see any reason to suppose that it was favoured at the expense or to the detriment of the chances of the rest of the adventure. The objection, moreover, is founded, I think, upon an erroneous view of the master's duty in such a case. It was laid down in the very learned and elaborate judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, delivered by Willes, J., in Notara v. Henderson, that a shipowner is a bailee of the goods intrusted to him for carriage in his ship, and that, although exempt under the bill of lading from the absolute liability of a common carrier, he is yet bound to use reasonable care in respect of the goods he carries, and it follows that if the master, when it was easy to land the specie, neglected so to do, and it was lost in consequence of his neglect, the shipowner would be liable. The master of a ship is under the same obligation as everyone else having duties to perform to act as a reasonable man in performing them. Specie, owing to its small bulk, can be placed in safety with exceptional facility. Its great value makes it exceptionally desirable to save it if possible. Suppose that two boxes of equal bulk and equal weight lay side by side in the ship's hold, and that one was filled with gold and the other with iron, and that only one could be saved, would anyone contend that a master who saved the iron in preference to the gold would be acting reasonably? It is pointed out in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Notara v. Henderson that many of the Continental codes expressly recognize and enforce the duty of the master in such a case to place the more valuable article in safety before the other.

This observation answers another objection that was raised. To decide that the specie was not liable to general average contribution would, it was said, be to hold out an irresistible temptation to the master to leave the specie at all events on board, so as to insure its contribution to general average. A jury or any other tribunal having to determine whether the specie had been lost through the negligence of the master would, I should think, make very short work of it if it were shown that, when it was easy to save the specie without adding to the difficulties of either ship or cargo in general, the master had forborne to do so in order to make certain that it should not escape contribution to general average. Moreover, there are two sides even to that question. The specie might in the end be lost, though the ship and the cargo in general, or a substantial portion of it, were saved, and then the amount of general average to be made up in part by the ship and the cargo would be enormously increased. I cannot but think that the danger suggested is chimerical, but, whether it be real or imaginary, it is no reason for departing from the clear and well-established principles which appear to me to govern this case. I am, therefore, of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendants.

GRANTHAM, J.—I also am of opinion that our judgment must be for the defendants. It was admitted by the Attorney-General that, unless he could distinguish this case from the cases of Job v. Langton and Walthew v. Mavrojani, our judgment must be against him; and I am of opinion that, although the facts are not identical, yet that, on the principles of law deducible from those cases, the defendants, as owners of the specie landed from The Tagus under the circumstances set forth in the special case, are not liable for general average for the losses and expenses subsequently incurred in getting the ship off the reef on which she had struck. The law as applied in the English courts seems to differ materially from the law applied in the American courts, and, although there may be, on grounds of general policy, some advantage in adopting the American view, yet there can be no doubt that our English courts have followed more closely the original principles of the doctrine of general average contribution.

According to the decisions of our English courts, if the cargo sought to be made liable for general average contribution has been at the time of the loss and expenditure removed to a place of safety, and is not subject to the particular peril which causes the special loss and expenditure, then such cargo is not liable to general average contribution in respect of such charges. The only difficulty that arose in this case arose from the apparently conflicting cases of Moran v. Jones, and Job v. Langton, because the Attorney-General was, in one aspect of the case, able to bring the facts of the case nearly within the law as applied in the former case; but as that case has not been since followed, even if it has not been overruled, we could not act upon that decision unless the facts were absolutely identical.

Looking at the log-book, and at the protest of the captain and crew of The Tagus, I have come to the conclusion that the landing of the specie was not done in pursuance of the common purpose of lightening the ship to get her off the reef, and so enabling her to continue her voyage, but was done for the same purpose that the passengers and their baggage were landed for—viz., for safety to the persons and things landed, they being respectively the most important parts of the cargo on board. The captain, having thus freed himself from his responsibility for the immediate safety of the passengers and specie, waited to see what turn events would take, and his subsequent action was the result of a subsequent judgment formed by him as to the best course to adopt' and was not the result of a single and original intention partly carried out by landing the passengers and specie as mentioned in the case. This view of his conduct is, I think, completely justified by the language of the protest, from which the difference in the action of the captain on the 28th and 29th fully appears. "The forenoon," he writes, "was spent in landing the remainder of the passengers' effects. At 7 p.m. a moderate breeze blowing," &c. Apparently, therefore, nothing more was done on the 28th after the passengers' effects were landed, and no idea was then formed of throwing cargo overboard. But the protest tells us "at 5 a.m. on the 29th" (the day after the landing of the specie) "the master of the said vessel deemed it expedient, as the only means of saving the vessel, to throw overboard the cargo and ballast." "The cargo" does not include the specie, which was already landed. What other interpretation can be put upon this language than that, having landed the passengers and specie, he waited to see what the next morning would bring forth, and finding when it came that the ship was in greater peril he determined to incur the expense and loss which is the subject of the general average claim?

But in Moran v. Jones the ship had become a wreck before the cargo was got out, and there can be no doubt that the cargo was got out not only for the safety of the cargo but for the purpose of lightening the ship. The Attorney-General very adroitly confused the term safety of the cargo as applied to its safety from perils of the sea with the safety of the cargo as applied to the necessity of protecting it from pillage on shore, and argued that, as it remained on shore under the charge of the officers of the ship, therefore unity of control was the same as unity of danger; but a little examination of the facts soon exposed the fallacy of this argument, because, if it were allowed to hold good, then, in case no further loss or expense had been incurred to the ship or rest of the cargo, but a guard of soldiers had been paid by the captain to look after the specie and save it from pillage by the islanders, the ship and cargo would have been liable to contribute for such expenses under the head of general average loss. For these reasons I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the defendants.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ., sitting as a Divisional Court.) — July 25.

BLAIR v. CORDNER (No. 2). (a.)

Solicitor—Bill of costs—Interest—Demand from client—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44), s. 5—General Order, clause 7.

By clause 7 of the General Order made in pursuance of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 "a solicitor may charge interest at four per cent. per annum on his disbursements and costs, whether by scale or otherwise, from the expiration of one month from demand from the client."

A solicitor delivered a bill of costs to his client, but without any express demand of payment or claim for interest. The bill was taxed, the amount allowed on taxation paid, and the solicitor then claimed interest.

Held, that the sending in of the bill constituted a demand within the meaning of clause 7, and that he was entitled to such interest.

Appeal from the City of London Court.

The action was brought by a firm of solicitors to recover interest on a bill of costs, at the rate of four per cent. per annum, commencing one month from the date of delivery of the bill to the defendant. The facts were as follows:—On December 3, 1886, the plaintiffs delivered a bill amounting to £133 18s. 3d., but without any express demand for payment or claim for interest. This bill was taxed down to £89 13s. 10d., and, on April 21, 1887, the defendant, in compliance with the order of the taxing master, paid the latter sum to the plaintiffs. On April 22 the plaintiffs claimed interest on this amount at four per cent. from January 3 to April 21, and the judge found a verdict in their favour.

Gould, for the defendant.—The right of the plaintiffs to interest under clause 7 of the General Order depends upon a "demand from the client." There was no demand here. Mere delivery of a bill does not constitute a "demand."

De Sausmarez, for the plaintiffs.—The delivery of the bill of costs constitutes a statutable "demand." Clause 7 does not make it necessary to claim interest.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question is as to the meaning of clause 7. The contention that the sending in of a bill does not constitute a demand is hypercritical and fanciful. The words "from demand" mean "from sending in the bill," and from the date of the sending in of the bill a solicitor becomes entitled, under the order, to interest at four per cent. on the true amount as ascertained by taxation. I do not say what might have been the result if he had postponed claiming interest for an unreasonable time, but he practically claimed the interest as soon as it had become due, that is as soon as the amount on which it was payable had been taxed, and had become payable under the master's order.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that, under clause 7, a solicitor may claim interest on the taxed costs at any time before they have been paid. Here, practically, the claim was made when the amount was tendered.

LOPES, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Lord ESHER stated that the COURT had conferred with COTTON, BOWEN, and FRY, L.JJ., who agreed with the decision.

MOORE v. MOORE. (a.)

Divorce — Judicial separation — Desertion—Separation deed after two years' desertion—Deed not pleaded in bar—No covenant not to sue.

After a husband had deserted his wife for more than two years, a separation deed was executed, but it did not contain a covenant by the wife not to sue. The husband filed a petition against the wife for dissolution, on charges which were not sustained. The wife, by her answer, prayed for a judicial separation. The husband did not, by his pleading, set up the deed as a bar to the wife's remedy, but his counsel relied on it at the trial.

Held, that the wife was entitled to a decree for judicial separation.

Further consideration.

In this case the husband had filed a petition on April 27, 1887, for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery. His wife denied the charge, and by her answer prayed for a judicial separation on the ground of desertion for two years without reasonable excuse. The parties were married on November 14, 1866, and lived together until November, 1884, when the husband left his wife and had never since cohabited with her. There were six children of the marriage. On January 5, 1887, a deed was executed by which the husband and wife agreed to live apart, he allowing her £2 10s. a month for her maintenance as long as the separation continued, she agreeing to refrain from all annoyance, importunity, and molestation, and to maintain herself out of the allowance and her own earnings, and not to pledge her husband's credit or to take any of the children out of his custody.

July 16.—The issues were tried before Butt, J., and a common jury. No evidence was given in support of the petition, and the jury found on all the issues in favour of the wife. The case was postponed for argument.

Bargrave Deane, for the wife.—The desertion was completed at the date of the deed, and the deed does not condone it; it contains no covenant not to sue.

Middleton, for the husband.—The deed itself is condonation. It is an accord and satisfaction of the wife's claim.

Tress v. Tress, 35 W. R. 672, 12 P. D. 128; Rose v. Rose, 30 W. R. 736, 7 P. D. 225, affirmed 31 W. R. 573, 8 P. D. 985; Buckmaster v. Buckmaster, 17 W. R. 1114, L. R. 1 P. & D. 713; Parkinson v. Parkinson, L. R. 2 P. & D. 25, 18 W. R. Dig. 7; Brown v. Brown and Shelton, L. R. 3 P. & D. 202, were cited.

BUTT, J., after stating the facts, said:—The question is whether the deed of separation of January 5, 1887, ought to operate as a bar to the decree which the wife claims, and to which by the finding of the jury, she is otherwise undoubtedly entitled. I had some little doubt about the matter at the trial, and therefore I adjourned my decision for further consideration. The conclusion to which I have come is that I ought not to hold that that agreement is a bar to the wife's remedy. In the first place it is not pleaded, and that is a serious matter, because there may be many defences to a deed which appears at first sight to be valid and binding. And there is authority for saying that the court is not bound to take notice of a deed which is not pleaded. But if that were not so I should hold that it is no bar to a decree for judicial separation because it contains no covenant not to sue, nor anything approaching such a covenant. There is no condonation or any expression pointing to condonation. In the cases cited there was either an agreement to live apart before the desertion had been continued for two years, or there was condonation or a covenant not to sue. Therefore, under all the circumstances of the case, I pronounce a decree for judicial separation.

"THE VIVIENNE." (a.)

Restraint—Special form of bail-bond—Shares owned by defendants transmitted to third parties—Cancellation of bail-bond on terms.

Where, in an action of restraint, the defendants put in bail, consenting that execution might issue against the bail if the vessel proceeded against should not safely return to a port within the jurisdiction from as many voyages as she should sail upon before notice should be given by the plaintiffs of the withdrawal of their claims for security, the court, about two years after the execution of the bail-bond, on its being proved that the vessel was in safety within the jurisdiction, and that the defendants had parted with all their interest in her to third parties, ordered the bail-bond to be cancelled in three days unless the vessel should have passed out of the jurisdiction before she be arrested by a further warrant, otherwise the bond to remain in force until the return of the vessel from her next voyage.

This was an action of restraint instituted on behalf of the owners of 43-64th shares in the steamship Vivienne against the said steamship Vivienne. The remaining owners of The Vivienne intervened as defendants, and, in order to obtain the release of The Vivienne, two sureties, at their request, executed a bail-bond, of which the portion material to this report was in terms as follows:—

"Now, therefore, we . . . jointly and severally submit ourselves to the jurisdiction of the court, and consent that, if the aforesaid steamship Vivienne shall not safely return to a port within the jurisdiction of this honourable court from as many voyages as she shall sail upon before notice shall have been given to the defendants by the plaintiffs that they withdraw their claims for security for the value of their shares in the said steamship, execution may issue against us for a sum not exceeding £3,000, being the value of the plaintiffs' shares in the said steamship." This bail-bond was duly filed in the registry on the 27th of October, 1885.

On or about the 6th of July, 1887, notice of motion on behalf of both the defendants and the bail was given that the judge would be moved in court to order the bail-bond to be cancelled. In support of the motion an affidavit was brought in, which stated that The Vivienne was at the date of the affidavit lying at Cardiff loading for an outward voyage, that the plaintiffs had parted with all interest in her, and that the persons by which she was then being managed were not the persons by whom she had been managed at the date of the institution of the suit or of the execution of the bail-bond.

The motion was now heard before Butt, J.

Barnes, for the defendants and the bail, in support of the motion.—The court has full power over bail taken in actions before it, and on equitable principles would ever allow the bail-bond in the present case to be enforced now that the circumstances which led to its being given no longer exist. The plaintiffs obtained security because they dissented from the employment of the vessel by the defendants, but the defendants no longer own any interest in her, and she is not now managed by the same persons who formerly managed her. As it would thus be inequitable to enforce the bail-bond, the sureties now ask to be dismissed from the suit and that the bail-bond be cancelled.

J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs.—The bail-bond is not in terms confined to the duration of the ownership of the defendants in the vessel, and the condition of the bail-bond being in such plain language the court ought not to interfere to relieve the sureties from what they have undertaken, but should leave them to come to terms with the plaintiffs. At any rate, the plaintiffs have a right to arrest the vessel under a fresh warrant, and the court ought to secure this right to the plaintiffs and refuse to cancel the present bail-bond until the second arrest has been effected.

Butt, J.—I think it would be unreasonable to keep the sureties to the bail-bond in this action under a liability in perpetuity. It could not have been in their contemplation to undertake so indefinite a liability, and on behalf of other than those by whom they were requested to be parties to the bail-bond. I shall therefore order the sureties to be released, and the bail-bond cancelled on such terms as will be fair to the plaintiffs.

The minute of the order drawn up in the registry was as follows:—"The judge, having heard counsel on both sides, ordered that the bail-bond filed in this action on October 27, 1885, be cancelled in three days unless the steamship Vivienne shall have passed out of the jurisdiction of the court before she be arrested by a further warrant; otherwise the bond to remain in force until the return of the vessel from her next voyage. And the judge further ordered that if the bond be cancelled the defendants should pay the costs of this motion; otherwise the said costs to be reserved, and that either party be at liberty to apply."

The Cargo ex "Laertes." (a.)

Salvage—Exemptions in contract of carriage exonerating shipowner from liability for loss or delay in consequence of unseaworthiness through latent defect in machinery—Award for salving cargo carried in vessel belonging to owners of salving vessel.

A steamship having become disabled at sea by the breaking of her flywheel shaft, was taken in tow by another steamship belonging to the same owners, and, after a tow of more than 700 miles, was placed in safety. At the time these services were rendered the disabled steamship was carrying cargo under three different forms of bills of lading, of which one form stated that the vessel was warranted seaworthy only so far as ordinary care could provide; another form provided that the vessel was warranted seaworthy only so far as due care in the appointment of agents, superintendents, pilots, masters, officers, engineers, and crew could insure it; whilst in the third form there was a stipulation that the shipowners were not to be liable for loss, detention, or damage if arising from latent defects in machinery even existing at time of shipment, provided all reasonable means had been taken to secure efficiency.

In an action of salvage brought by the owners, master, and crew of the salving vessel to recover salvage remuneration for salving the cargo shipped under those forms of bills of lading, and valued at £116,400, the court found as facts that the flywheel of the disabled steamship had broken down from a latent defect, that such latent defect existed when the voyage commenced, but could not have been discovered by the exercise of any reasonable care on the part of the owners, and that the steamship had been seaworthy to the extent required by the bills of lading.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to £1,200 salvage remuneration for the services rendered to the cargo, and that of this amount £250 must be awarded to the crew of the salving vessel, £50 to her master, and the remainder to the shipowners.

This was an action of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the screw steamship Achilles valued at £15,000, against the owners of certain cargo valued at £116,400, which had been lately shipped on board the screw steamship Laertes on a voyage from Shanghai and other ports to Amsterdam, and was being carried in The Laertes on the same voyage, when on the 10th of March last that vessel broke her fly-wheel shaft in latitude 5° 57′ N. and longitude 91° 30′ E., and was two days later fallen in with by The Achilles, taken in tow by her and towed by her in safety to the harbour of Colombo a distance of about 720 miles.

The action was brought to recover for the services rendered by The Achilles on this occasion, and the owners of the cargo against which the suit had been instituted admitted that the salvage services proceeded on had been rendered, but raised the defences that the owners of The Achilles were the owners of The Laertes; that the act of the owners of The Achilles in towing and assisting The Laertes was done only in fulfilment of the contracts in pursuance of which the cargo of The Laertes had been shipped to be carried to its destination, or for the purpose of avoiding their liability for the non-delivery of the said cargo to the defendants, or for the sake of bringing their own vessel safe into port, and was in any case an act for the sole behalf and advantage of the owners of The Achilles, and was not, so far as they were concerned, a salvage service; and, further, that The Laertes had not, as required by such contracts, been seaworthy for the voyage or reasonably fit to carry the cargo at the commencement of the voyage, inasmuch as her screw-shaft was defective and unsound and in consequence thereof broke down, and The Laertes for this and no other cause received assistance from The Achilles, and her owners were not entitled to claim in respect of such assistance. The defendants, also, by way of counter-claim, claimed as damages for breach of the contract in the bills of lading for non-delivery of their cargo except subject to certain claims, and for The Laertes having been unseaworthy so that the assistance of The Achilles was required—whatever sum might be awarded to the master and crew of The Achilles for salvage. The plaintiffs, the owners of The Achilles, in their reply, alleged, inter alia, that the shaft of The Laertes had broken through a latent defect not discoverable by means of any ordinary care, and, further, that if they had contracted to carry the defendants' cargo, they had done so on the terms of certain bills of lading containing certain excepted perils, causes, or matters, and exemptions or restrictions, and that the breaking of the shaft of The Laertes was an excepted peril, cause, matter, or thing, or was within the said exemptions and restrictions.

June 18, 20.—On these days the action was heard before Butt, J., and two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, and on the 25th of June the arguments of counsel on the questions of law arising on the bills of lading of the cargo belonging to the defendants were concluded before Butt, J.

The result of the evidence appears from the judgment, where also will be found set out the exemptions in the bills of lading relied on by the plaintiffs.

Cohen, Q.C., and Barnes, for the plaintiffs.—The owners of The Achilles are not claiming for salving the freight of The Laertes, but they contend that by reason of the terms of the contracts under which the defendants' cargo was shipped they are exonerated from liability for the consequences of The Laertes having broken down, and therefore are entitled to claim as salvors for their services to such cargo. In other words, they claim to have contracted themselves out of the decision in the case of The Glenfruin, 33 W. R. 826, 10 P. D. 103, and to have rendered themselves free from responsibility to the defendants even if The Laertes was unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage.

They referred to The Chartered Mercantile Marine Bank of India v. The Netherlands India Steam Navigation Co., 31 W. R. 445, 10 Q. B. D. 521; Gilson v. Small, 4 H. L. Cas. 353; Worms v. Storey, 4 W. R. 115, 11 Ex. 427; The Rona, 30 W. R. 614, 7 P. D. 247.

Myburgh, Q.C., and Raikes, for the defendants.—The exemptions relied on in the bills of lading apply only to protect the owners of The Laertes from liability for unseaworthiness arising during the voyage, and do not exonerate them from liability for a breach of the implied warranty that The Laertes was seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage: Steel v. The State Line Steamship Co., 3 App. Cas. 72, 26 W. R. Dig. 216. The owners of The Achilles were, therefore, when they salved the cargo of The Laertes, merely doing an act for their own benefit in order to save themselves from being responsible to the cargo owners for the non-delivery of the cargo. This was clearly so, for the latent flaw, in consequence of which the shaft of The Laertes broke, must have existed at the time of her sailing.

Cohen, Q.C., replied.

BUTT, J.—This is a case of salvage services rendered by the steamship Achilles, of 2,359 tons gross register, her master and crew, to The Laertes, a steamship of 2,148 gross register tonnage, and to the cargo on board her. It is the cargo on board The Laertes, or rather the greater portion of that cargo, which is proceeded against in the present suit. The Laertes had broken down in the course of a voyage from Shanghai to Amsterdam with a cargo of tobacco and other goods on board. The Achilles fell in with her when she was so in distress and towed her a distance of about 700 or more miles to Colombo. Now The Achilles and The Laertes belong to the same owner, and this circumstance has given rise to the several questions which I have now to decide.

The salvage services were rendered in fine weather. There was little or no danger to the salvors or to their ship, and no immediate danger to the cargo on board the salved ship, though, as The Laertes had broken down, if she had been left to her own resources serious danger might have followed. It is said that the owners of The Achilles, being also the owners of The Laertes, should, in order to avoid circuity of action, be held barred from recovering salvage in this suit, because, having undertaken to carry the cargo on board The Laertes to its destination, and the vessel having broken down, if they recovered salvage from the owners of the cargo they would be immediately liable to an action for breach of their contract to carry, and that in that action the cargo owners would be entitled to recover back the same amount. The whole case, therefore, resolves itself into the question whether the owners of The Laertes have been guilty of a breach of contract for which they would be liable to the cargo owners. No doubt the ordinary rule is that, at the commencement of the voyage, there is an implied warranty that the ship is seaworthy, not that the owner will use his best endeavours to make her so, but that she is, in fact, seaworthy. The Laertes broke down from a latent defect, which I find, as a fact, could not have been discovered by the exercise of any reasonable care on the part of the owners, but the flaw in the shafting which led to the breakdown existed when the ship started, and, therefore, she was not seaworthy for the voyage. If the implied warranty existed, or was not limited by the contract in the bills of lading, then the owners of The Laertes, being the owners of The Achilles, could not sue as salvors. The cargo was shipped under three different bills of lading, and it is said on the part of the defendants that the stipulations in these bills of lading had no effect whatever in limiting the warranty of seaworthiness. The first of these bills of lading contains a provision to the effect that the vessel was only warranted seaworthy so far as ordinary care could provide. Mr. Myburgh contended that this provision only amounted to a stipulation that the shipowner would keep his vessel seaworthy during the voyage, but I think the words apply, and were intended to apply, as a limitation of the original implied warranty, and that they do, in fact, for present purposes, abrogate the warranty of seaworthiness, which would otherwise be implied. The second form of bill of lading in this case contains the following clause:—"The vessels of the Ocean Steamship Co. are warranted seaworthy only so far as due care in the appointment or selection of agents, superintendents, pilots, masters, officers, engineers, and crew insure it." I cannot follow Mr. Myburgh in his view that the exception in the second bill of lading is only limited to the period subsequent to the loading of the cargo; and I think the provision in the third form of bill of lading, that "the owners are not to be liable for loss, detention, or damage if arising directly or indirectly from latent defects in boilers, machinery, or any part of the vessel in which steam is used, even existing at time of shipment, provided all reasonable means have been taken to secure efficiency," if it does not abrogate, at all events limits, the warranty which the law would otherwise imply, that The Laertes was seaworthy at the beginning of the voyage. I am aware of the decision in the case of Steel v. The State Line Steam Navigation Co. That decision was that, under ordinary circumstances, the stipulations in a bill of lading apply after the warranty of seaworthiness of the vessel on which the goods were shipped has come into effect. In the bills of lading which were before their lordships in that case there were no such stipulations as those I have referred to in the present case, and, in my opinion, I am not departing from the decision in that case in holding, as I do, that the clauses in the bills of lading now before me limit the implied warranty of seaworthiness of The Laertes.

With regard to the facts which must be established in order to give effect to the limitations in these bills of lading, I find as facts (1) that The Laertes was seaworthy as far as ordinary care could make her so; (2) that she was seaworthy as far as due care in the appointment and selection of agents, superintendents, pilots, masters, officers, engineers, and crew could insure it; and (3) that the accident occurred from a latent defect in her machinery existing at the time of shipment, though all reasonable means had been taken to secure efficiency. It follows that there is no reason why the plaintiffs should not recover salvage from the owners of the cargo on board The Laertes. The court is always reluctant to make a large award against cargo when the claim is made by the owners of the ship itself, but, having regard to all the circumstances of the case and looking to the size of both ships, and bearing in mind that the portion of the salved cargo proceeded against is valued at £116,400, I award £1,200 to the plaintiffs as salvage remuneration, and, as I am asked to apportion, I direct £50 of this to be given to the master, £250 to the crew, and the remainder to the owners of The Laertes.

Mortgagor and mortgagee—Fixtures—Mortgage by sub-demise—Trade fixtures.

Words which are sufficient when used in a conveyance in fee to pass trade fixtures, are also sufficient to pass them when used in a demise.

By a mortgage by sub-demise, a corn mill and other leasehold premises, together with certain fixtures specifically mentioned, and constituting the motive power of the mill, were conveyed by sub-demise to the mortgagees, to secure a sum due to them by the mortgagors. The deed contained the following general words:—"Together with all buildings, fixtures, rights, lights, easements," &c.

Held, that the word "fixtures" in the general words was not restricted to fixtures ejusdem generis with those previously specifically mentioned, but was intended to extend and enlarge that class.

Held, therefore, that the trade fixtures in the mill passed by the sub-demise to the mortgagees.

Decision of Bristowe, V.C., reversed.

Appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 26th of January, 1882, and made between the Appley Bridge and West Lancashire Corn Mill Co. (Limited) (thereinafter referred to as "the Corn Mill Co.") of the one part and the Southport and West Lancashire Banking Co. (Limited) (thereinafter referred to as "the Banking Co.") of the other part, the Corn Mill Co., as beneficial owners, demised to the Banking Co. (1) a plot of land in Wrightlington, in Lancaster (therein more particularly described), with the appurtenances (except mines), "and also all and every the corn mill and the warehouse and other buildings adjoining thereto, or used in connection therewith, recently erected by the Corn Mill Co. upon the said plot of land or some part thereof: And also all and every the steam-engines, steam-boilers, main and cross shafting and gearing, steam, gas, and other pipes, pillars, and all other the fixtures and fixed machinery therein which, either by itself or in conjunction with other machinery, supplies, or assists to supply, the motive power to the said corn mill and works": (2) Another plot of land (therein more particularly described) in Wrightlington aforesaid, and two semi-detached villa residences thereon, with the appurtenances (except mines): and (3) a plot of land at Appley Bridge, with the appurtenances (except mines), "together with all buildings, fixtures, rights, lights, easements, advantages, hereditaments, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said premises hereinbefore firstly, secondly, and thirdly described respectively, belonging or appertaining (except as is respectively reserved by the lessees thereof respectively)," to hold "all and singular the plots or parcels of ground, corn mill, buildings, easements, hereditaments, and premises hereby respectively demised, or expressed so to be, unto the Banking Co., their successors and assigns," for the residue of the terms for which the Corn Mill Co. held the same respectively, except in each case the last day thereof. The deed contained a power for the Banking Co. to sell "the several plots of ground, corn mill, buildings, easements, and premises hereby demised, or any of them, or any part thereof," and provided that they should have all the powers which by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, were annexed to the power of sale given by the Act to a mortgagee. The deed did not contain any recital of the intention of the parties.

Both the Corn Mill Co. and the Banking Co. were now in liquidation.

On the 28th of December, 1887, the liquidator of the Banking Co. received from the liquidator of the Corn Mill Co. notice that on the 5th of January, 1887, he intended to sell the machinery belonging to the latter company in and about the mill, "other than the steam-engines, steam-boilers, main and cross shafting and gearing, steam, gas, and other pipes, pillars, and all other the fixtures and the fixed machinery which supplies, or assists to supply, the motive power to the corn mill and works."

The Banking Co. thereupon commenced the present action against the liquidator of the Corn Mill Co. and the company for foreclosure or sale and for an injunction to restrain the sale or removal of any machinery, articles, or things affixed or fastened to the freehold of the premises comprised in the mortgage, or any part thereof, during the continuance of the security.

On the 3rd of January, 1887, the plaintiffs obtained an interim injunction, which was subsequently continued till the trial.

On the 8th of March, 1887, Bristowe, V.C., held that the word "fixtures" among general words operated to pass to the mortgagees only fixtures ejusdem generis with those which had been specifically enumerated, and that the "trade machinery," as distinguished from the "power machinery," did not pass to the mortgagees.

From this decision the Banking Co. appealed.

R. Neville and P. O. Lawrence, for the appellants.—The trade fixtures passed by the mortgage to the plaintiffs. The operation of the general words in the mortgage is not restricted by the specific description of things which may be called the motive machinery in the former part of the deed.

Rigby, Q.C., and Maberly, for the respondents.—The trade fixtures did not pass by the mortgage. By the word "fixtures" in the general words all that were intended to pass were fixtures ejusdem generis with the fixtures mentioned in the former part of the deed.

pass by the mortgage. To a considerable extent I think the Vice-Chancellor relied on what was said by Lord Blackburn, then Blackburn, J., in Hawtry v. Butlin. Mr. Rigby, in his argument before us, did not really rely upon that case; but as I think the Vice-Chancellor relied upon it to some extent we ought to state our own opinion about it. That decision was said to be in point in this way, that it was there laid down by Blackburn, J., that as regards trade fixtures there was a difference between a conveyance in fee and a conveyance by sub-demise, where the mortgagor had himself only a certain interest. Did Blackburn, J., intend to lay down any such distinction? I cannot see myself how it can be supposed that he did, because if words in a conveyance in fee are sufficient to pass trade fixtures, I do not understand why they should not be sufficient to pass trade fixtures when used in a demise. What are trade fixtures? They are fixtures passing with the freehold interest if that is conveyed, or passing with the leasehold interest if it is the leasehold interest that is assigned. But as between the landlord and tenant they are removable at the expiration of the term, and therefore as between landlord and tenant they are in a different position from that in which fixtures are which are not so removable. As regards, however, the parcels of a conveyance, whether it is of the fee simple or for a term, they pass either by a conveyance of the fee simple or by a demise of the land for a term. There is, I think, a little ambiguity in the language of the judgment of Blackburn, J., in one respect. If the mortgagee is seeking to remove the fixtures and sell them he must have express power given him by the mortgagor to do so, otherwise he can only take them with the land without any right of removing them. That right of removal and of selling will remain in the mortgagor, the tenant, unless he expressly assigns that right to the mortgagee, who takes by demise from him. Now, in the case I have referred to Blackburn, J., after stating that the mortgagee in that case was a mortgagee in fee (at p. 293), proceeds: — "But when a person has a limited interest in land, such as a term of years, and on the land there are fixtures in which he has an absolute property, and he mortgages his interest in the land by way of under-lease, I should think that the property in the fixtures would not pass by the mortgage, and the right to sever them would still remain in the mortgagor." He does not mean that they will not pass by a grant of under-lease, but that the absolute property in them will not pass, so as to enable the person entitled by demise to say:—"This is only a demise of the land, and I can do whatever the mortgagor could do with them—namely, remove them and sell them as separate chattels." That is plain from what follows, because he goes on to say:— "Unless there is a clear intention, to be gathered from the terms of the mortgage deed, to convey the absolute interest in the fixtures as well as the limited interest in the land." He does not there mean that the mortgagor could remove them while the mortgage was still unsatisfied during the term granted by way of under-lease, but only that the right to remove them will remain in the mortgagor, and that the right to the fixtures will only pass to the mortgagee during the term demised, but that he will not be able to deal with them as his absolute property because that right is left in the mortgagor after the mortgage term is satisfied. I mention this because, when we look first at it, it does seem difficult to understand. But, as I have said, counsel for the respondent here did not rely really upon that. What I understand as the contention of the respondent was this. There are two classes of fixtures; one of which the Bills of Sale Act of 1878 says is to be considered as chattels personal; the other is not. This deed enumerates certain fixtures, but it does not enumerate any of those which the Bills of Sale Act says are to be personal chattels—personal chattels only for the purposes of that Act.

But then it is said, although a mere demise of this mill would have granted all the fixtures, both those which are enumerated and those which are not enumerated, yet as there is an enumeration of one particular class there is an intention expressed on the face of the deed to exclude chattels not of the class which those enumerated are. That, in my opinion, was merely based upon this fallacy—that you must show an intention to pass the chattels where there is a demise of the land which will carry and pass the chattels. That would be the law undoubtedly, having got rid of the distinction between the demise and the fee simple: and it is absurd to say that there is an expressed intention on the face of the instrument, because they cannot do anything more to exclude the other class. Just see what an absurdity it would be to hold otherwise with regard to that expressed intention. This is a mortgage of a flour mill. Here are trade fixtures worth, we are told, something like £4,000; and though the mill would not be entirely reduced to bare walls by their removal, yet it would not be workable without them. And we are to suppose that this mortgage, which is a mortgage to a bank to secure their account, is intended to exclude from the security to the bank that which alone practically made the property valuable. If there were express words of course we should have to deal with them, but there are no express words at all. All that is relied upon is the implication arising from the fact that certain chattels are enumerated and others are not.

I do not intend to dive into the mind of the draftsman and to say why it was he only enumerated these particular fixtures—whether he did so because he supposed they were the most valuable, or because he was afraid of enumerating the personal chattels for fear it should be said that this was a bill of sale. Although I do not rely upon the words "fixtures," &c., in the general words as in any way including the fixtures which would not be included without those words, to my mind they cannot be disregarded, as showing that the draftsman did not intend that the enumeration of the chattels or fixtures which were specified should be an exclusive enumeration, so as to show that nothing else was to be comprised in this conveyance.

I think that the words here are sufficient to carry, by the demise of the land and the mill, these trade fixtures, and that there is no sufficient expression of intention to exclude those fixtures which are not enumerated.

In my opinion, therefore, the decision of the Vice-Chancellor was erroneous, and must be reversed.

I think it unnecessary to go through the other cases which have been cited—Mather v. Fraser and the others—in which it has been held that an enumeration of certain things was not sufficient to exclude others, because a deed must be construed by itself; and one really cannot get much light by looking at the terms of another deed which has been construed in another way by the court when we have once got the principle for our decision, that this demise is sufficient to carry these trade fixtures unless there is sufficient expression of intention on the face of the deed to exclude them; and in my opinion there is not sufficient in this deed to exclude these trade fixtures.

LINDLEY, L.J.—So far as I can gather from the reasons given by the Vice-Chancellor he has been a little misled by the reasons given, according to the report, by Blackburn, J., in his judgment in the case of Hawtry v. Butlin. Undoubtedly there are words there which at first sight appear to warrant the notion that he was of opinion that where a mortgagor demised land of which he was tenant for a term of years, and fixtures of which he was absolute owner, a mortgage in ordinary form would not pass the fixtures. But I do not think he meant that at all. What he meant, as I understand, was that, unless there was something in the deed to warrant it, a mortgagee under a deed of that sort might sell the fixtures only so far as they were chattels separately assigned. If that was what he meant—and undoubtedly there is an expression in his judgment which would seem to show that it was—no doubt the chattels would pass. Any such opinion as to his meaning is fortified by his language in the case of Holland v. Hodgson, where he again adverts to the same point, showing that what he meant was that a mortgagor might demise, in the absence of express words, so as to sell the fixtures and treat them as chattels. The Vice-Chancellor, in arriving at the conclusion he here did, was, I think, a little misled by those observations.

Now if we look at the matter apart from that difficulty, or with that obscurity cleared away, it appears to me that, unless it can be shown that any fixtures were intended to be excluded, there is ample in this deed to pass them. In the first place, if the fixtures are intended to pass with the land, they are conveyed by a grant of the lease, or in any other way. Then we have here got, curiously enough, this, that the grantor or lessor goes out of his way rather to say what he means. First of all, when he demises the first part of the property, he says expressly, "I mean this part to include the moving property," and when he has done with all those moving lots, he says he means to include the motive parcels; and when he states in that way that he means both, we are asked to say he intended to exclude one. We cannot see anything at all to justify it. The words are, of course, most important, as showing what was intended, and whatever doubt there might be about his intention, they may be useful as removing that doubt. We are really asked to exclude the rest of the fixtures because, it is said, of the trouble the mortgagors took to enumerate only a portion of them. But let us consider the nature of this security. What was it? It was a security for money; and can it be conceived that the parties intended to exclude that which, if excluded, would render the security worthless for the very purpose for which the parties intended it? It is really almost impossible to arrive at the conclusion that the parties intended to exclude that which was an essential part of the security. If that intention were plainly expressed, well and good; but without that we cannot approach this deed with the feeling that, from the nature of the security, their intention was such as to have that result. I cannot possibly follow the argument which was addressed to us by Mr. Rigby, that because the parties have taken the trouble to say twice over what they meant, therefore they meant to exclude these fixtures.

I think the conclusion arrived at by the Vice-Chancellor in the court below was erroneous, and that the decision, therefore, should be reversed.

Lopes, L.J.—In a mortgage of freehold property all things which are annexed to the place are part of the mortgage security, and then, therefore, the deed contains no mention of the fixtures. That is so unless a contrary intention can be collected from the deed. That, no doubt, is the law with regard to freehold property. But it has been said a different rule applies when the mortgaged property is not freehold, but leasehold. In my opinion there is no such distinction. The learned Vice-Chancellor seems to have relied upon certain expressions of Blackburn, J., in the case which has been referred to, and I cannot help thinking that he has misapprehended what that learned judge meant. According to my view, what Lord Blackburn meant was this: that in case of a mortgage of leasehold property the mortgagee was only entitled to use the fixtures for a term, and that the right to sever the fixtures remained in the mortgagor at the end of the mortgage term. I think that is the proper construction to be placed on the expressions used by that learned judge in the case referred to.

But it is said here that these trade fixtures do not pass because a contrary intention is to be collected from this deed, and the way in which that point is put is this. It is said that a contrary intention is to be found in the deed, and that the ordinary inference that the trade fixtures pass is rebutted, because there is an enumeration of one particular class which is to be regarded as an exclusion of the other class. It is to be remembered that in this deed there appear among the general words the words "all fixtures." With regard to those words it is said they are not in any way to enlarge the specific description of the articles enumerated beforehand, but that they are to be interpreted as merely including things ejusdem generis with those. I cannot accept that view. I think the words "all fixtures" were put in intentionally, and were intended to extend and enlarge that which had been previously specifically described. It seems to me a most unreasonable thing to say that an intention is to be collected from this deed not to pass these trade fixtures when it is remembered that this is a mortgage of a mill, and that, if these particular articles, trade fixtures, were excluded, it would be rendering that which was intended as a mortgage security absolutely unworkable as a mill.

I think for these reasons that the decision of the learned Vice-Chancellor is wrong, and that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Witt v. Banner. (a.)

Bill of sale—Schedule—Pictures—Inventory—"Specifically described"—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 4.

A bill of sale which purported to assign pictures described them in the schedule as so many oil paintings and so many water-colours in gilt frames.

Held, that the bill of sale was void in respect of the pictures for non-compliance with section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, which requires that the schedule shall contain "an inventory," and that the chattels comprised in it shall be "specifically described."

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (35 W. R. 761, 19 Q. B. D. 276) affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Wills and Grantham, JJ.) on an interpleader issue between bill of sale holder and execution creditor, reported 35 W. R. 761, 19 Q. B. D. 276. The execution debtor, who was a picture dealer, had granted a bill of sale "of all and singular the several chattels and things specifically described in the schedule hereto annexed."

The part of the schedule on which a question was raised was "At 77, Mortimer-street, aforesaid, 450 oil paintings in gilt frames, 300 oil paintings unframed, 50 water-colours in gilt frames, 20 water-colours unframed, and 20 gilt frames."

By the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 4, "Every bill of sale shall have annexed thereto or written thereon a schedule containing an inventory of the personal chattels comprised in the bill of sale, and such bill of sale . . . shall have effect only in respect of the said personal chattels specifically described in the said schedule and shall be void except as against the grantor in respect of any personal chattels not so specifically described."

The county court judge, before whom the issue was tried, held the bill of sale to be void in respect of the pictures on the ground that they were not "specifically described," and the Divisional Court affirmed his decision.

The claimant appealed.

Candy, Q.C. (H. J. Broun with him) for the appellant.—The description is sufficient. The Act does not require an accurate or true catalogue. This description sufficiently gives the species of chattels assigned, which is all that is required: Roberts v. Roberts, 32 W. R. 605, 13 Q. B. D. 794.

Channell, Q.C. (Thornton Sharp with him), for the respondent.—The bill of sale does not purport to assign all the pictures at 77, Mortimer-street. How is it possible to identify which pictures are assigned out of the stock there?

Candy, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I do not think I can say anything plainer as to the meaning of "specifically described" than I said in the case of Roberts v. Roberts, and I cannot agree with my brother Grantham in the view he took of that case. The word "specifically" is used in the Act in its ordinary business meaning as applicable to an inventory. The bill of sale is, in my opinion, hopelessly bad as to these pictures. The section is a business section and not a philosophical or dictionary section. Its requirements are an inventory and specific description of the chattels. The term inventory is well known to business men and "specifically described" means so accurately or minutely described as is usual in an ordinary business inventory of such chattels and in such a place as they are. I do not think the description in this schedule was such as would amount to an ordinary business inventory at all. I do not think it would have been an inventory even if the pictures assigned were the whole of the pictures at 77, Mortimer-street. It does not describe the pictures with such speciality as is usual and customary in describing pictures at such a place.

BOWEN, L.J.—In order to see whether there is a compliance with the terms of the section the circumstances of each case must be regarded. The question first arises whether there is any inventory within the ordinary meaning of the term as applied in such circumstances as here existed. I think that there was no inventory, for, in my opinion, that cannot be an inventory which only identifies pictures as so many oil paintings in gilt frames, &c. I agree entirely with what was said in Roberts v. Roberts on this question, and I think the true test of whether chattels are specifically described is whether they are sufficiently described for the ordinary purposes of business.

FRY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think there was neither an inventory here nor were the chattels "specifically described." It is not easy to say what in all cases is required for specific description, and obviously what is sufficient with regard to one class of chattels or in one state of circumstances would be insufficient in another; but I think there ought to be a sufficient description to distinguish the chattels assigned from other chattels of the same class.

Appeal dismissed.

GLOUCESTERSHIRE BANKING CO. v. EDWARDS. (a.)

Sheriff—Liability of under-sheriff after death of high sheriff—Action for money had and received—3 Geo. 1, c. 15, ss. 8, 11.

Where, after the death of a high sheriff and before the appointment of his successor, the under-sheriff sold goods which had been taken in execution before the death of the high sheriff,

Held, that the under-sheriff was accountable for the proceeds to the execution creditor, and not to the executors of the deceased high sheriff; and that, therefore an action for money had and received would lie against him or his executors.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (35 W. R. 842, 19 Q. B. D. 575) affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court Day and Wills, JJ.), reported 35 W. R. 842, 19 Q. B. D. 575.

The plaintiffs, having recovered a judgment, issued a writ of fi. fa. to the High Sheriff of Monmouthshire, who at once seized under it. On January 2, 1884, the high sheriff died, and on January 11 the goods were sold by the under-sheriff, who received the proceeds and paid over a portion of the money to the plaintiffs. A new high sheriff was appointed in March, and in November the under-sheriff died without having paid over the balance. The action was then brought against his executors, the claim being both for negligence and extortion in the under-sheriff, and also for money had and received. Lord Coleridge, C.J., before whom the case was tried, nonsuited the plaintiffs, but the Divisional Court ordered a new trial, on the ground that the action for money had and received would lie, and that, as that action did not require the same evidence to support it as the action for tort, it was not necessary to waive the tort.

The defendants appealed.

Cohen, Q.C., and Ram, for the appellants.—The only question is whether there was any duty on the under-sheriff to pay over this money to the execution creditors. If so, it is admitted that an action will lie against his executors. The action has been wrongly brought. The under-sheriff does not receive the money for the execution creditors, but for the high sheriff, and, after his death, for his executors. The action ought, therefore, to have been brought against the executors of the high sheriff. That was certainly the case before 3 Geo. 1, c. 15: Longdill v. Jones, 1 Stark. 345; Cooper v. Chitty, 1 W. Bl. 65. No action can be brought against the under-sheriff during the lifetime of the high sheriff for money had and received as under-sheriff: Watson on Sheriffs, 2nd ed., p. 38. The true construction of section 8 of 3 Geo. 1, c. 15, is that the under-sheriff is bound to continue in office during the interval between the death of a high sheriff and the appointment of his successor, and is liable for those wrongs for which he would, before the Act, have been personally liable, but not for anything for which the high sheriff would have been liable.

They cited Doe v. Donston, 1 B. & Ald. 230; Clerke v. Withers, 6 Mod. 295.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and Gwynne James, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the only question for us is whether there was any duty on the deceased under-sheriff to pay over the money to the plaintiffs. It is contended for his executors that there was no such duty, and that, therefore, the action must fail. It is said that he received the money as agent for the executors of the deceased high sheriff and that his duty was to pay it to them, and that the action ought to have been brought against them, and not against him or his executors. The whole question depends on the construction to be put on section 8 of 3 Geo. 1. c. 15. Formerly the under-sheriff was the deputy of the high sheriff, who had appointed and could remove him. On the death of a high sheriff during his term of office, the under-sheriff's office also came to an end, as his deputation terminated by the death of the person deputing him. While the high sheriff lived he was liable, and the under-sheriff was not liable for acts done by him as under-sheriff but done wrongly. It is unnecessary now to inquire on whom the duties and liabilities of the high sheriff fell when he died during his term of office. It is certain that they did not fall on the under-sheriff, who could do nothing after the sheriff's decease, and could no longer act at all as under-sheriff. Then came the statute of George I., which said that great inconvenience had been occasioned by this state of circumstances, and it therefore enacted that if the high sheriff should die while he was high sheriff the under-sheriff should continue in office, and should execute the same, that is, should do all the duties of his office in the name of the deceased high sheriff until another sheriff should be appointed, and the section proceeds to say that the under-sheriff shall be answerable for the execution of his office in all things, and to all respects, intents, and purposes, during such interval as the high sheriff would have been if he had lived. This puts him, therefore, in exactly the position of the high sheriff with regard to his liability for all things done in his capacity of under-sheriff. It is plain that if the high sheriff had lived he would have been answerable for this claim to the execution creditor, therefore the under-sheriff, after the death of the high sheriff, was liable. It follows that an action for money had and received would lie against him, and, therefore, against his executors. The appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree, and for substantially the same reasons. Was there any duty on the part of the under-sheriff to pay over this money to the execution creditors? It is suggested that when the sheriff's functions terminated before his year of office had expired his executors had to complete what he had begun. We are not concerned to consider now whether that was so prior to the statute of George I. The language of that statute is, in my opinion, express, and it makes an under-sheriff directly responsible during the interval between the death of the high sheriff and the appointment of his successor. I think it is impossible to take any other view of section 8, and it is confirmed by the language of section 11. Therefore, I think there was a duty on the under-sheriff to pay the money to the execution creditors, and that this action will lie.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot read section 8 in any other way than that it imposes a direct liability on the under-sheriff.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. v. POULTER. (a.)

Compensation—Injurious affection—Light—Termination of lease by claimant—Prospective injury—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), ss. 6, 16.

Compensation cannot be claimed under the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, for prospective injurious affection of property.

The claimants held their premises under a lease for seventeen years, terminable at their option at the end of three years by a six months' notice. Six months before the three years came to an end, they perceived that certain buildings which had been commenced by a railway company on land adjoining their premises would so darken their premises as to make them useless, and they consequently gave notice to their landlord to determine the lease at the end of the three years.

Upon a claim for compensation being made by them,

Held, that it must be limited to the damage from injurious affection sustained by them before the date on which the lease actually determined, and must not be assessed on the basis of the lease having fourteen years to run.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Denman, J.), refusing to bring up by certiorari and quash an inquisition held by the sheriff under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845.

Messrs. Poulter carried on business at Whitechapel as colour printers. They held their premises under a lease for seventeen years from November 11, 1883, terminable by them at the end of three years by giving six months' notice. Early in 1885 the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Co., having acquired the adjoining premises, began, under the powers of their Acts, to erect warehouses upon them after demolishing the previously existing buildings. Messrs. Poulter being informed that the warehouses would be carried up to a height of 100ft., perceived that this would so seriously interfere with their rights of light and air that their premises would no longer be available for the purposes for which they were used, and accordingly, after informing the company of their intention, they gave six months' notice on May 6, 1886, to terminate their lease at the end of the three years—that is to say, on November 11, 1886, and proceeded to procure other premises, for which they were obliged to pay an increased rent. They then claimed against the company for an injurious affection of their premises, and an inquisition was held before the under-sheriff. The jury gave a verdict for £3,000 damages. The under-sheriff then put the following question to them:—"Assuming that the claimants are not entitled to claim beyond the 11th of November, 1886, what sum are they entitled to in respect of their occupation of the premises up to that date." The jury answered this question, "£450. No land was taken from the claimants. The Divisional Court held that the claimants could recover the larger sum, and that their claim for compensation was not limited to the damage actually sustained before the determination of the lease on November 11, 1886, and refused the application to bring up and quash the inquisition.

The railway company appealed.

R. S. Wright (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Charles Haigh with him), for the appellants.—The verdict for £3,000 was wrongly given. The injury done to the claimants when their term expired was of a trifling character. The claimants by their own act put an end to the lease. If the verdict stands, the company will have to pay twice over, for they will also have to compensate the landlord, who is now in possession, for the injurious affection of the premises when these buildings are completed. The claimants cannot get compensation for being frightened into giving notice. There must have been an injurious affection before the right to be compensated for it arises: Burkinshaw v. Birmingham and Oxford Junction Railway Co., 5 Ex. 475; Ford v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 34 W. R. 426, 17 Q. B. D. 12; In re Wadham, 33 W. R. 215, 14 Q. B. D. 747; Becket v. Midland Railway Co., 16 W. R. 221, L. R. 3 C. P. 82; Ricket v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 15 W. R. 937, L. R. 2 H. L. 175; Metropolitan Board of Works v. M'Carthy, 23 W. R. 115, L. R. 7 H. L. 243.

Moulton, Q.C., and G. M. Freeman, for the respondents.—The verdict for £3,000 was right. The damage sustained by the claimants directly flowed from the act of the railway company. The claimants naturally gave notice to quit when they found these premises would become valueless. This was both the necessary consequence of the acts of the railway company and also was the course most beneficial to the railway company.

They cited Eagle v. Charing Cross Railway Co., 15 W. R. 1016, L. R. 2 C. P. 638; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Walker's Trustees, 30 W. R. 569, 7 App. Cas. 259; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Lockhart, 8 W. R. 373, 3 Macq. 813; Croft v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 11 W. R. 360, 3 B. & S. 436.

R. S. Wright, in reply, cited Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Glasgow Railway Co., 12 App. Cas. 315.

Lord ESHER, M.R. (after stating the facts).—The question that we have to decide is, To what compensation were the claimants entitled? Were they entitled to compensation as lessees for fourteen years or as lessees of a term which would expire in six months? If the giving of notice were an actual and necessary result of the injury done to the claimant's light by the railway company, the case would be different. But how could it be said that the natural consequence of what the company had done was that the claimants should give notice? Even supposing that their light was partially interfered with, was it otherwise than by their own free will that they gave notice? The notice was given at their own option, and it was no result of what the company had done that they should exercise their option as they did. But it is said that by exercising that option they benefited the railway company, and that if they had not done so they would have been able to recover larger damages from them. If that is so, and they have prevented themselves from getting greater damages than they can now recover, it is by their own act that such is the case. I cannot agree with the view expressed by the Lord Chief Justice that the claimants are entitled to compensation on the basis of a fourteen years' lease. They ceased to hold such a lease solely at their own will, and not as the necessary result of any act of the railway company, and therefore, they are reduced to the position of persons holding a lease which must expire in six months' time. In my opinion, therefore, the finding of £3,000 must be set aside, and the alternative finding must be upheld. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed, and judgment for £450 entered for the claimants.

BOWEN, L.J.—I concur.

FRY, L.J.—The great question in this case is whether the claimants could recover by way of compensation for prospective injury to result to their property from future exercise of the powers of the company, or whether they could only recover for damage arising from the injury already done. The Railways Clauses Act, 1845, provides for full compensation for the value of land "taken or used," and for all damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the statutory powers conferred on railway companies. The words relate, in my opinion, to damages sustained at or before the date of the claim, or (at the latest) at or before the date of the inquisition, and do not relate to any future injury resulting in future damage. The word "damage" is, I think, used in the Act as synonymous with injury. It is suggested that it intended to give compensation for all damages sustained, or hereafter to be sustained, by reason of the exercise, whether present, past, or future, of the powers of the company. It appears to me that such a construction would give two grounds for a claim for compensation—first, for some damage actually sustained, and then for some damage which might be sustained in the future. These two claims might quite possibly overlap, so that it would be possible for two persons to recover for the same injury, the one prospectively, and the other when the injury actually happens. I do not think that the cases of Caledonian Railway Co. v. Lockart and Croft v. London and North-Western Railway Co. which have been cited support such a contention. In them, where future injury was considered and compensated it was by the express convention of the parties, and the question whether a claim could be made for prospective damages was not raised, and was certainly not decided. If the right of the claimants to compensation depends on whether an injury has been sustained by them, I must ask whether there is any evidence that any injury had been sustained by them on May 6. If no injury had been sustained it is impossible that the notice given by them on that day could be the result of that injury. It might be the natural result of their fear of injury; but, in my judgment, the Act gives no compensation quia timet. That really determines the case, since it follows that the act of the claimants in giving notice was not due to any action on the part of the company which would give rise to a claim under the Act. Even if on May 6 some injury had been sustained, there is nothing, in my opinion, to make the giving of notice the natural result of that injury.

I agree, therefore, in thinking that the appeal must be allowed.

the testatrix, and then to give it to E. H. if she should remain in her service until her death. E. H. was informed of the note soon after it had been handed to C. E. H. remained in the service of the testatrix until the latter's death, and the note remained in the possession of C.

Held, that C. was constituted a trustee of the note for E. H., in case she fulfilled the prescribed condition.

Adjourned summons.

This was an action to administer the estate of Louisa Richards, who died on the 27th of July, 1881.

Louisa Richards by her will, dated the 12th of February, 1873, bequeathed a legacy of £150 to Ellen Harris, who was then in her employment as housekeeper.

On the 11th of August, 1877, the testatrix consulted her solicitor, William Cottrell (whom she had appointed one of the executors of her will), as to further benefiting Ellen Harris beyond what she had given her by her will. Ultimately the testatrix handed to Cottrell a promissory note signed by her for £200 payable on demand to Ellen Harris, and desired him not to mention the note to anyone except the said Ellen Harris, but to retain it until the death of the testatrix, and then to give it to Ellen Harris if she should remain in her service until that event happened. The note did not contain the words "value received."

Ellen Harris was informed of the note soon after it had been handed to Cottrell, and she remained in the service of the testatrix until the latter's death. Cottrell retained possession of the note from the time when it was first handed to him.

Ellen Harris (who had married Robert Brock after the death of the testatrix) carried in a claim against the testatrix's estate for £200, the amount of the promissory note. The chief clerk disallowed the claim, on the ground that there was no sufficient delivery of the note.

This was a summons by Mr. and Mrs. Brock to vary the certificate by allowing the claim.

Ellen Harris in her evidence stated that the testatrix on several occasions assured her that she had provided for her by her will, and promised her that if she would continue in the service of the testatrix until the latter's death, and would not during that time marry, she, the testatrix, would leave in the care of Cottrell a present for her beyond what she might leave for her by her will.

Druce, in reply.—The testatrix did all she could under the circumstances to divest herself of the property in the note. The testatrix wished the person to be benefited to be able to sue on the note at her death, and therefore she made it in the donee's name, but did not deliver it. The case is governed by Hall v. Palmer and Bonfield v. Hassell.

North, J. [after stating the facts, continued:—] It has not been—and, indeed, it could not be—disputed that if the testatrix had placed the sum of £200 in cash in the hands of Mr. Cottrell for the purpose and with the directions mentioned by him in his affidavit, there would have been a good trust created in favour of Mrs. Brock. It is not necessary for the completion of a voluntary gift that the money should have been actually paid over in cash into the hands of the person who was intended to receive it; it is sufficient if there was either a complete transfer of the property in the note, or a declaration of trust of it. The testatrix might have made a declaration of trust making herself trustee. It was equally competent to her to make a third person trustee for that purpose. It appears to me that the note was handed to Mr. Cottrell for the purpose and with the intent, as was expressed by the testatrix at the time when it was given, of making him a trustee, and this intention was never altered down to the time of her death, and that enough was done to constitute him a trustee of the note for Mrs. Brock in case she should fulfil the prescribed condition. If the note had been made payable to Mr. Cottrell himself, he would have been able to sue the testatrix upon it immediately, which was not what was intended. It appears to me that the note was placed by the testatrix in his hands as a trustee in order that he might hand it over to Mrs. Brock upon the happening of the particular event mentioned by the testatrix. It is not necessary to consider what the power of the testatrix might have been in the meantime if she had changed her mind, because she did not do so. The claim must be allowed, with interest from the death of the testatrix, and costs.

Gas Light and Coke Co. v. South Metropolitan Gas Co. (a.)

Metropolis Gas Act, 1860, s. 6—District—Meter the point of supply of gas.

The Nine Elms Station of the London and South-Western Railway Co. lies partly in the district of the Gas Light and Coke Co. and partly in that of the South Metropolitan Gas Co. Each gas company had, until 1886, supplied the portion of the station situated within its own district, but in that year the defendant company placed meters within their own district from which gas was supplied by pipes to that portion of the Nine Elms Station lying within the plaintiffs' district. Section 6 of the Metropolis Gas Act (which applied to both companies), after defining the limits of each company's district, enacted that "No other company or person than the company to whom such limits are for the time being assigned . . . shall supply gas for sale within the said limits, unless authorized by Parliament so to do."

(a.) Reported by J. W. Greig, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that gas is supplied within the meaning of the Act at the meter, which is the point of supply, and that, so long as the meter is within the district of the supplying company, no injunction would issue to prohibit them from supplying gas by means of pipes passing into the district of another company.

Trial of action.

The plaintiff company was formed by the amalgamation of several gas companies, including the London Gas Light Co., and the district supplied by the plaintiff company coincided with that of the constituent companies of which it was composed. The Metropolis Gas Act, 1860, governed the supply of gas to the district in question. The defendant company, in like manner, was the result of an amalgamation carried out in March, 1860, between the South Metropolitan Gas Co. and the Phœnix Gas Light and Coke Co., and was also subject to the Act of 1860.

The premises of the London and South-Western Railway Co. at Nine Elms, consisting of extensive locomotive and other works, are situate partly in the district assigned by the Acts to the plaintiff company and partly within that assigned to the defendant company.

In 1885 the secretary of the London and South-Western Railway wrote to the Gas Light and Coke Co. requesting them to allow a discount on the price of the gas supplied to them. This the Gas Light and Coke Co. declined to do.

The South Metropolitan Gas Co. allowed a discount of £5 per cent. upon the quantity supplied by them to the London and South-Western, and the intention of the railway company to take the whole of the supply they required from the South Metropolitan Gas Co. if the Gas Light and Coke Co. did not allow the discount was communicated to the latter company.

On the 25th of June, 1886, the London and South-Western Railway finally decided to take their gas supply from the South Metropolitan Gas Co.

The South Metropolitan Gas Co. then laid down mains and supplied gas through three meters placed within their own district to the South-Western Railway Co., but the gas was admittedly used outside the limits of the district of the South Metropolitan Gas Co.

The material parts of the Act of 1860 are as follows:—

After reciting that the following gas companies:—The Gas Light and Coke Co., the City of London Gas Light and Coke Co., the Commercial Gas Light and Coke Co., the Equitable Gas Light Co., the Great Central Gas Consumers' Co., the Independent Gas Light and Coke Co., the London Gas Light Co., the Phœnix Gas Light and Coke Co., the Ratcliff Gas Light and Coke Co., the Surrey Consumers' Gas Co., the South Metropolitan Gas Light and Coke Co., the Western Gas Light Co. (Limited), the Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co., were respectively incorporated under the authority of Parliament for the purpose of supplying several districts of the metropolis with gas; and that the said companies, instead of supplying gas by several mains in the same district, had agreed, as far as possible, each one to confine its supply to a separate district, in order to economize capital and avoid the too frequent opening of the public streets, and subject to the provisions and restrictions of the Act, that it was expedient that such districting should receive the sanction of Parliament.

Section 3 enacts: "This Act applies to the several gas companies and to all persons already or hereafter supplying gas within the metropolis, except as hereinafter excepted."

The interpretation clause contained, amongst others, the following definitions:—

The word "Consumer" means a person receiving or entitled, in accordance with this Act, to receive a supply of gas from any gas company.

The word "District" means, with respect to every gas company supplying gas wholly or in part within the metropolis, the district, so far as it is within the metropolis, within which the gas company are from time to time authorized to supply gas and means, with respect to any person or persons not being a gas company, but supplying gas wholly or in part within the metropolis, the district within the metropolis within which he or they shall from time to time as a trade or business supply gas.

Section 6, omitting immaterial parts, enacted, "The limits of each of the said companies shall be the respective districts supplied with gas by such companies as the same are defined upon four duplicate maps, signed by the Right Hon. T. H. S. S. Estcourt, and no other company or person than the company to whom such limits are, for the time being, assigned or shall hereafter be assigned, shall supply gas for sale within the said limits, unless authorized by Parliament so to do."

Section 14 was in these terms: "Every gas company from time to time supplying gas within any district, shall, as to any premises or street within such district not already supplied with gas, and which shall lie within fifty yards of any existing mains, at their own expense, on being required by the owner or occupier of any premises within the district or in part within the district, who shall contract for not less than two years to pay gas rates in respect of such supply, to an amount equal to twenty per cent. upon the outlay, provide and lay all proper and sufficient communication, service, and other pipes up to the premises of such owner or occupier, to communicate with the gas company's mains, and shall, if so required by the owner, occupier, or local authority, furnish him or them, at the rate prescribed by this Act, with a supply of gas for the purpose of being used in or on the premises, or for lighting the street, and if so required by the owner or occupier, furnish him with one or more meters for ascertaining the quantity of gas consumed; provided that the gas company shall not be bound to supply more than one meter for each consumer occupying a separate dwelling or apartment, nor any meter exceeding a five-light meter; provided also that the meter-rent, which the said company shall be entitled to claim for such meter, shall not exceed ten per cent on the net cost of such meter.

Section 54.—Nothing in this Act contained shall avoid, prejudice, or impair any of the powers now exercised by or vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works, or in the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London and the liberties thereof, or any powers now vested in any local authority within the metropolis, or any powers now exercised or possessed in respect of the manufacture or supply of gas within the metropolis by any railway company, or by any other person or persons making or supplying gas to the public as a trade or business.

The plaintiffs' claim was for an injunction and damages.

Sir H. James, Q.C., Sir C. Russell, Q.C., Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., R. S. Wright, Danckwerts, and Haldane, for the plaintiffs.—The question in this case turns on the construction of section 6 in the Act of 1860. The defendants have invaded the territory of the plaintiffs. The meters through which the gas is supplied are admittedly within the defendants' district, and they contend that the meter is the point of delivery. If that contention is upheld, they could supply gas anywhere throughout the kingdom, and drive through all the gas Acts. Section 15 of the Act of 1847, which applies in this case, says: "The clerk, engineer, or other officer duly appointed for the purpose by the undertakers may at all reasonable times enter any building or place lighted with gas supplied by the undertakers in order to inspect the meters, fittings, and works for regulating the supply of gas and for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity of gas consumed or supplied"; thus the power of entry applies not merely to the meter, but the place where the gas is supplied and consumed.

Sir R. Webster, A.G., Michael, Q.C., and Prior, for the defendants.—The proper construction of the section is that anyone having a source of supply in the area of the supplying company may take the gas whither they like and use it where they like. There is no illegality in giving discount, and we have not attempted any evasion of the law in giving it. Since 1860 the law has been that anyone having property within the district of a gas company can call for a supply of any amount, and may use it where they like. The gas is supplied at the meter where it is delivered to be used as the consumer likes, there the obligation to supply ends, and the rights of the consumer begins. Assume a manufactory with a doorway abutting into the district of a gas company, the owner of the manufactory could call for a supply of gas for the whole factory, and that is similar to the case here. Gas is sold when it leaves the meter. Section 6 gives only a right of exclusive sale within the district, and does not preclude user of gas obtained elsewhere. The point has actually been decided on in a case of the Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co. v. The West London Junction Gas Co. (Limited) and the Great Western Railway Co., reported in The Journal of Gas Lighting, Water Supply, and Sanitary Improvement, vol. xvii. (1856), p. 14. Lord Cairns in his judgment in that case (p. 17) says: "This is a question which does not admit of any serious doubt, because, although gas is a very intangible article to our apprehension, still gas is a manufactured article which is sold and delivered like any other manufactured article, and the question is to determine when and at what part this manufactured article is delivered. Certainly as I understand it, with regard to gas, wherever the point is that the meter of the company is fixed, and the gas leaves the meter and is delivered to the consumer, that is the point where the risk of the company ends and the risk of the consumer begins. In a dwelling-house the pipe on both sides of the meter may or may not belong to the company, but where the meter is which tells what gas has passed through and been delivered on the premises that is the place where the risk of the company ends and the risk of the consumer begins; and so I say, in my opinion, the gas company in this case delivering gas through these two metres which are altogether out of the district of the Imperial Co., the gas is there sold and delivered to the Great Western Railway Co., and if there be, which I do not say there is at all, a supply for sale within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, that supply for sale is not, in my opinion, within the limits of the Imperial Co., but in a wholly different district;" and Rolt, L.J. said: "It is only necessary to refer to the 6th section, because that is the clause in favour of the plaintiffs' company and of the other companies within the metropolitan district. No other company or person than the company to whom such limits are for the time being assigned, or shall hereafter be assigned, shall supply gas for sale within the said limit," not "shall supply gas for use within the said limits" but "shall supply gas for sale." It may possibly be read "by way of sale."

Sir H. James in reply.—The case proceeded on a different state of the facts and the law. The West London Junction Gas Co. was not a districted company, and the contract between that gas company and the Great Western Railway Co. was a mere common law contract. In section 6 in our Act each of the districted companies is to confine itself to its own limits, but the West London Junction Gas Co. was not bound to confine itself to any limits. Our contention is that the place where the gas is used is the point of supply.

The following cases were also cited:—Stockport District Waterworks Co. v. Corporation of Manchester, 11 W. R. 166, 9 Jur. N. S. 266; Pudsey Coal Gas Co. v. Corporation of Bradford, 21 W. Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 12. — Kekewich, J. — If in expressing my opinion on the points argued before me in this case, I omit to notice any particular section of any Act of Parliament I must not be considered as having omitted to study it. It is unnecessary to refer to more than a few passages. Speaking generally, the points in dispute depend on the proper construction of the Metropolitan Gas Act, 1860, and the general Acts of 1847 and 1871, and more particularly on the proper construction of section 6 of the Act of 1860. That section in some respects stands and must be considered alone, but, of course, in endeavouring to arrive at its proper construction one has to bear in mind the rest of the Act of which it forms part and the incorporated Acts, as also the documents admitted or proved and the oral evidence, so as to test and understand the language of the Act by the light of the circumstances existing when it became law and to apply it to the circumstances of the present day. There is no issue of fact between the parties, and really no conflict of evidence. Both parties know that there is a question of right between them, and there has been no attempt on either side to shirk or obscure it. The discount allowed by the defendants to the London and South-Western Railway Co. was indeed mentioned as if constituting an unworthy method of securing the railway company's custom, but no point was made of this argument, and, in truth, nothing depends on it. I am not called upon to decide whether there is or not any objection to a gas company allowing discount to a large and prompt paying customer, and whether permissible or not it cannot affect the main question here. The admitted and important facts are these:—Of the buildings not constituting the Waterloo Station of the London and South-Western but erected in connection with it, or rather in connection with the business carried on there, some are within the plaintiffs' district as defined by the Act of 1860, and some within the district of the defendants, and until last year, when the dispute between the parties arose, the plaintiffs supplied with gas the buildings within their district and no others, and the defendants supplied the buildings within their district and no others. The defendants now supply many of the buildings situate within the plaintiffs' district, and for this purpose they have placed additional meters at points within their own district, but have laid down mains and pipes within the plaintiffs' district, so as undoubtedly to trespass on the latter if laying down these mains and pipes be a trespass within the meaning of the Act. By laying down these mains and pipes the defendants must, of course, have acquired the knowledge that an additional supply of gas was wanted and intended for property outside their district, and in truth this was known to them before by means of the application made to them by the railway company. The question which I have to consider and decide is whether the defendants are entitled to supply gas to the railway company for these purposes and under these circumstances. The defendants say that by force of their statutory obligations they are bound to supply the railway company with gas if demanded, and that the demand has been made. This, to my mind, is only another form of stating the same question. If the obligation is such as they say it is, the supply is not prohibited. If, on the other hand, as the plaintiffs contend, they are prohibited from supplying gas to the railway company, there can be no obligation. It comes, therefore to this—are they prohibited, or does the 6th section of the Act of 1860, properly construed with reference to the rest of that Act and to the other Acts mentioned, contain any such prohibition? As regards the construction of the Act of 1860, including of course the 6th section, I am told that it is not a mere statutory contract between the two companies, but a general Act passed for the benefit of the public, and that its provisions must be construed with reference to this consideration. The proposition need not and cannot be controverted, but I am not satisfied that it renders the construction different from what it otherwise would be. All Acts of Parliament are presumably for the benefit of the public, and those conferring powers on railway or other companies or containing restrictions on the use of powers are always expressly stated so to be.

There is no occasion for me to pursue this question further or to dwell on the rights of the Attorney-General as the representative of the Crown, whether given expressly or falling within his general jurisdiction. I am not the guardian of the public in this case more than in any other where there is a contest between two companies, and I must consider and decide it according to the respective rights of the plaintiffs and defendants, even if the conclusion at which I arrive happens to be detrimental to the public—that is, to the consumers of gas within the two districts affected by it. Does, then, section 6 of the Act of 1860 prohibit the defendants from supplying gas to the London and South-Western Railway Co. outside their own district—that is, so as to light buildings outside the district? Does the Act say that all gas consumed within the plaintiffs' district, other than that the supply of which is protected by section 54, must be purchased of the plaintiffs? If the Act does not give the plaintiffs this monopoly which they claim, the gas consumed within their district may properly come from elsewhere—that is, be supplied by persons or corporations other than themselves; and in that event it may come from or be supplied by the defendants not the more or less because they have a district of their own. I recognize the difficulty of the questions thus stated, and of the case apart from this statement of those questions. I perceive many and great objections to the views alike of the plaintiffs and of the defendants, and I am not prepared to say, because it is unnecessary for me to say, what would have been my solution of this difficulty if I had not the advantage of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Imperial Gas Co. v. Great Western Railway Co., which was cited and commented upon in argument. Sir Henry James, in reply, not merely suggested, but, I think, established, many distinctions between that case and the present. He pointed out, among other things, that there was no actual supply to the Great Western Hotel, which held a position analogous to that of the buildings of the London and South-Western Railway Co. outside the plaintiffs' district, whereas here is a known and avowed intention to supply the latter buildings. But, although this consideration enters into the arguments of counsel and the judgments of the Lords Justices, yet I do not think it affects so much of their conclusion as most nearly touches the present case. Again, Sir Henry James pointed out that the company there complained of was not one of the districted companies within the Act of 1860, but it is to be observed that, notwithstanding this is apparent from the facts of the case, it was not regarded by the Lords Justices as of any weight, and they discuss and express their opinions on the construction of the Act of 1860 on the footing of its being applicable to all gas companies, districted or otherwise.

Their lordships' judgments, pronounced after an elaborate argument, deal with two questions of vital importance here—viz., first, the question what is the meaning of the words "for sale" in section 6, and, secondly, the question where, for the purposes of construing the Act, gas must be taken to be supplied. As regards the meaning of the words "for sale" there is not to be found a definite conclusion. Rolt, L.J., contrasts them with "for use" or "for consumption," and I take the opinion of both Lords Justices to have been that a supply to a person or company of gas "to be used or consumed" by that person or company, as distinguished from "to be passed on to others," is not within the prohibitive sentence in the 6th clause. As regards the other question, I find a conclusive opinion expressed in plain language by Lord Cairns, who says that wherever the point is that the meter of the company is fixed and the gas leaves the meter and is delivered to the consumer, that is the point where the risk of the company ends and the risk of the consumer begins. They decide, as I understand their judgments, that gas is supplied at the meter and not elsewhere. It may be that neither Lord Cairns nor Rolt, L.J., had in contemplation such a case as has now occurred. It may be that, if it were possible to divine their intention, it would be found to be that their judgments were not intended to conclude such a case, differing as it does in many respects from that which was before them. Further, it may be possible that the Court of Appeal will hold it within their province to scrutinize their lordships' judgments from this point of view, but I am satisfied that it is not within mine. Apart from the deep respect due to the opinion of such eminent judges, it would not be right in me to do otherwise than loyally accept their conclusions, expressed after argument in the Court of Appeal, and apply without cavil the language in which they are expressed to any facts and circumstances fairly coming within it. I think that the facts and circumstances do fairly come within it, and that, the questions here being such as I have stated, those judgments provide their solution. I must therefore hold that the supply by the South Metropolitan Gas Co. to the London and South-Western Railway Co., which the plaintiffs seek to restrain, is not within the prohibition of the 6th section of the Act of 1860, and that, therefore, no injunction can be granted, nor can damages be awarded. The judgment will be for the defendants, with costs.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } July 1.

Cooke v. New River Co. (a.)

Water company—Right of customer to have water supplied by meter—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17)—New River Co.'s Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. clx.), ss. 35, 38—41—"Domestic purposes"—Meaning of "dwelling-house."

By the New River Co.'s Act, 1852, s. 35, the company, if requested, must supply houses within their limits with sufficient water for domestic purposes at certain rates, varying ("for water supplied to any dwelling-house") with the annual value of the dwelling-house.

By section 38, domestic purposes are not to include "working any machine or apparatus."

By section 41, "The company shall, at the request of any consumer of water, for purposes other than the purposes for or in respect of which the rates or charges are hereinbefore provided or limited, or at their own instance, afford a supply of water by means of a meter, . . . and may charge for such supply at certain limited rates per thousand gallons, according to the total quarterly consumption."

The plaintiffs demanded that a warehouse belonging to them, which was occupied only as a place of business and for storing goods, and not for the purpose of living in, should be supplied with water by the defendants by meter for general purposes and for working a hydraulic lift.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to be so supplied for both purposes at the limited rates fixed by section 41.

Trial of action.

The plaintiffs in this action were a firm of carpet warehousemen carrying on business at 12, Friday-street, in the City of London, and they brought this action for a declaration of their right to have water supplied to their warehouse by meter, for the purpose of working a hydraulic lift necessary for carrying on their business, and for all other purposes in connection with the same hereditaments at the charges provided by the New River Co.'s Act, 1852, and, secondly, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from cutting off their supply of water so long as the plaintiffs duly paid or tendered all moneys justly due from them to the defendants.

The plaintiffs' warehouse consisted of six stories, all used for storing carpets only. One of the means of communication between the stories was a hydraulic lift, worked by water supplied by the defendants. The evidence showed that no one slept in the house or took meals there, and that it was occupied by the plaintiffs and their staff solely for the purposes of their business. The annual rateable value was £1,583.

Section 3 of the New River Co.'s Act of 1852 incorporates the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, with certain express exceptions.

Section 35 of the Act of 1852 provides that the company shall, at the request of the owner or occupier of any house or part of a house in any street within their limits in which any pipe of the company shall be laid, or of any person who, under the provisions of this Act or any Act incorporated therewith, shall be entitled to demand a supply of water for domestic purposes, furnish to such owner or occupier or other person a sufficient supply of water for domestic purposes at the rates hereinafter specified—(that is to say):

For water supplied to any dwelling-house: Where the annual value of the dwelling-house . . . shall exceed two hundred pounds, at a rate per centum per annum not exceeding three pounds:

If there be a water-closet or water-closets, or fixed bath or baths, or any high service in such dwelling-house or place, then, in addition to the rates above specified, the following rates shall be payable—(that is to say):

Where the annual value shall exceed £300, a rate not exceeding 12s. for each single water-closet, fixed bath, or high service, and a further sum of 6s. for each additional water-closet, fixed bath, or high service.

Section 38 provides that a supply of water for domestic purposes shall not include a supply of water for steam-engines or railway purposes, or for warming or ventilating purposes, or for working any machine or apparatus, or for baths, &c.

Section 39 empowers the company to take an increased rate by agreement with the person or body requiring the water.

Section 40 provides that the company may supply any person or body within their limits with water, to be used within such limits for other than domestic purposes, at such rate and upon such terms and conditions as shall be agreed upon between the company and the person or body requiring such supply.

Section 41 provides that the company shall, at the request of any consumer of water for purposes other than the purposes for or in respect of which the rates or charges are hereinbefore provided or limited, or at their own instance, afford a supply of water by means of a meter or other instrument or mode for measuring and ascertaining the quantity of water so supplied, and may charge for such supply not exceeding . . . certain specified rates per one thousand gallons, such rates varying according to the total quarterly consumption of water.

The plaintiffs, it appeared, had for some time been supplied by the defendants with water by a meter under an agreement which the defendants had recently given notice to terminate, declining to supply water at the rates specified in section 41, and the plaintiffs understood the defendants as threatening to cut off their supply unless it was paid for on the basis of the rateable value of the warehouse.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., and R. C. Dobbs, for the plaintiffs.—The question depends on the construction of certain sections of the Act of 1852. If the construction contended for by the defendants were correct the public would be entirely in their hands—a result very foreign to the intention of the Legislature. In order to make section 40 applicable to the present case, as the defendants are endeavouring to do, they must first prove that the warehouse was a "dwelling-house" within section 35. Otherwise we are entitled to a supply by meter under section 41. The words "dwelling-house" must be construed strictly. When the Legislature said dwelling-house it meant dwelling-house. A dwelling-house is a house where somebody resides in contradistinction to where business is carried on. This warehouse cannot be brought within the definition of a dwelling-house. There may be domestic purposes, such as drinking and cleansing, for which water is required in offices and warehouses, but that does not make them dwelling-houses. To come within section 35 the purposes must be "domestic purposes" in a dwelling-house. A person fainting at a railway station might be supplied with a glass of water there, but no one would describe a railway station as a dwelling-house. As to the claim for an injunction, even if the plaintiffs were mistaken in supposing that the defendants were about to cut off their supply of water, the fact that the latter claim the right to do so is sufficient ground for an injunction.

Sir R. Webster, A.G., Warmington, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the defendants.—Under their original charter granted by James I., Hugh Myddelton and others were incorporated in perpetual succession and authorized to supply water, but no right was given to any person to be supplied, nor was there any limit to the price to be charged. So things remained down to the passing of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, which, however, has no application unless incorporated by the special Act. Water companies have cast upon them many burdensome duties, some of which they have to discharge without any remuneration. The intention of the Legislature should then be gathered from the entire scheme, and not merely from one or two sections. There is nothing to compel anyone to take the water. In section 35 the term "dwelling-house" occurs. What does it mean? If it is not a dwelling-house, is there no right at all to be supplied with water? though required "for domestic purposes?" And what are "domestic purposes?" Though there is no positive description in the Act, there is a sort of negative description of what are not domestic purposes. That is in section 38. What difference does it make whether people sleep in the premises or not? They wash and drink there, and cleanse the floors and windows. The water is used in exactly the same way as if Mr. Cooke and all his staff slept there. There is nothing in the Act to say that the company shall furnish any water at all for other than what are domestic purposes under the Act. In Metropolitan Board of Works v. New River Co., 37 L. T. N. S. 124, in which the headnote cites sections 35, 38, and 41 of the Act of 1852, and section 37 of the Act of 1847, it was held by Mellor and Lush, JJ., that section 41 only applies to the purposes excepted by section 38, but if the plaintiffs' construction is right section 41 would have applied in that case. The decision was upheld on appeal by Bramwell, Baggallay, and Brett, L.JJ. This warehouse is a dwelling-house within section 35, the true distinction being between buildings used for human occupation and purposes, and those used for mere storing only. The word "place" in the expression "such dwelling-house or place" in section 35 means any house or part of a house whether a dwelling-house or not.

Kekewich, J.—I need not trouble you to reply, Mr. Finlay. When the New River Co. sent their men to break up the road outside the plaintiff's warehouse, Mr. Cooke seems to have thought that they meant to cut off both his supply of water for working the hynraulic lift and also the supply for general purposes. In this I think he was unnecessarily alarmed, but though the writ was issued that day, that was not the real occasion of this action, because there are substantial questions between the parties which would have to be decided in any case. As to the claim for an injunction, however, I hold that there is no evidence to warrant the granting of it, and the defendants must have the costs of that part of the action, which I will at once fix (it having been agreed that I should assess them) at 12½ guineas, which, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, I consider will be a proper sum for the defendants to receive for the costs of that part of the action. With regard to the substantial question of rights, I have been referred to the charter of the New River Co., which is a chartered company carrying on business at its own risk, but the position of the company under the Act of 1852 is entirely altered from what it was under the original charter. It appeared from the recitals in that Act that, under the authority of the Legislature, a contract was to be made between the company and that part of the public desiring to be supplied with water, by virtue of which the latter would be placed under obligations they were not under previously. That being so, the Act of 1852 proceeds to incorporate the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the whole of the Waterworks Clauses Act of 1847, except certain specified clauses. I take it the proper way of construing the Act is to read it as if all the sections of the general Act, except the excepted ones, were written out in the special Act, and, in case of any inconsistency between the two, to read the special Act as overruling the general one. The clauses now in question bristle with difficulties, but there is no serious difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion on the particular questions arising in this action. Section 34 obliges the company to supply water to the owners or occupiers of houses (that includes not only dwelling-houses but every building) on being requested to do so under certain conditions. Section 53 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, provides that "Every owner and occupier of any dwelling-house or part of a dwelling-house within the limits of the special Act" shall, under the conditions specified, be entitled to be supplied with water. Reading this with section 35 of the Act of 1852, the operation of the latter section is, in my opinion, limited to dwelling-houses. Section 53 should be read in before section 35 of the special Act. At first I thought there might be a doubt as to the meaning of the phrase "in such dwelling-house or place," but it seems to me that the word "place" may fairly be interpreted as referring to and corresponding with the words "part of a house" occurring in the same section, and not as being a wider term which would let in other buildings. I think, therefore, that according to the proper meaning of that section its application is confined to a dwelling-house. Is this warehouse a dwelling-house? I think that question may be conveniently decided without reference to any other section. Now the term "dwelling-house" means "a house where somebody dwells." Does anyone dwell here? It is occupied in the day-time purely as a place of business, and for storing carpets day and night—it is occupied only by those who come there on business. If anyone takes anything to eat or drink there it is a mere accident. I see nothing whatever to bring this warehouse within the meaning of the term "dwelling-house." The plaintiffs are, no doubt, entitled to use the water for domestic purposes, such as washing, &c. (which do not, however, include the hydraulic lift), but the water cannot be said to be used for domestic purposes in a dwelling-house so as to come within section 35. I think the hydraulic lift clearly comes within the words "a machine or apparatus" in section 38.

There has been a good deal of comment on sections 39 and 40, but it seems to me that the object of those sections was to bring in and enable the company to do certain things which might otherwise have been ultra vires. Coming to section 41, I have felt considerable difficulty in ascertaining who were intended to be included in the words "any consumer of water," but I think the reasonable meaning is "any person living within the company's limits and requesting to be supplied with water for purposes other than domestic purposes." If the water is not required for domestic purposes, for which the charges were fixed by section 35, the company are to supply such a person, at his request, by meter. Why should I reduce that? I find, as I should have expected to find, a clause enabling the company to make special agreements in certain cases not provided for in the preceding clause of the Act, and a clause in virtue of which they are under an obligation, if requested, to supply water by meter for other than domestic purposes; I may add that though in the case of Metropolitan Board of Works v. New River Co. on appeal, the present Master of the Rolls expressed an opinion adverse to mine, he was careful to keep the point open for future decision, as it was not necessary to decide it for the purposes of that case. Therefore, while feeling great diffidence in differing from his opinion, I think I ought not to allow my diffidence to prevent me from forming an independent judgment in the present case.

The conclusion I have arrived at is that the plaintiffs are right (except as to the injunction), and that they are entitled to have their warehouse supplied with water to be measured by meter, and charged for in accordance with section 41 of the Act of 1852, both for general purposes and for working the hydraulic lift, and that the defendants are, therefore, wrong. There will be a declaration in favour of the plaintiffs as claimed. The defendants will have to pay the general costs of the action, but may set off the sum I allowed them on the claim for an injunction.

Pape v. Pape. (a.)

Married woman—"Desertion"—Jurisdiction of justices—Married Women (Maintenance in Case of Desertion) Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 52)—Separation under agreement—Non-payment of alimony.

A mere refusal by a husband to continue the payment of alimony to a wife under a separation agreement is not such a "desertion" of the wife as to give the justices jurisdiction to deal with the case under the Married Women (Maintenance in Case of Desertion) Act, 1886.

Case stated by the justices of Middlesborough under 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

The parties in this case were husband and wife. An agreement had been executed between them to live separate in consideration of a certain sum to be paid by the husband to the wife as alimony. The husband had declined to continue the payment of such alimony on the ground of being dissatisfied with his wife's mode of living. The wife thereupon summoned the husband for "desertion" under the provisions of 49 & 50 Vict. c. 52, and the justices held that she was deserted and that they were entitled to enforce the payment of the money so agreed upon. The husband now appealed from this order.

McClymont, for the appellant.—"Desertion" is a turning of the wife out of the house or leaving her. It does not consist merely in the fact of her being destitute of means. The Married Women Act, 1886, creates a new jurisdiction, but it does not empower the justices to enforce an agreement which the High Court could not enforce. An agreement to separate, such as this, has always been held to be void by the Probate Court as contrary to public policy and morality. Only in the case of the adultery or cruelty of the husband amounting to danger to life or safety of the wife has the wife been held justified in deserting the habitation. The courts have never sanctioned a mere bargain for separation except when arranged through the medium of trustees: Reg. v. Cookham Union, 9 Q. B. D. 522, 31 W. R. Dig. 141; Thompson v. Thompson, 27 L. J. P. & M. 65; Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald, 17 W. R. 264, L. R. 1 P. & D. 694. In Besant v. Wood, 12 Ch. D. 605, 27 W. R. Dig. 95, equity intervened to prevent a separation deed from being evaded for a bye-end. The justices could only find "desertion" as defined under the poor law and by the decisions of the Probate Division. There was no legal desertion here, as the husband might have taken the woman back if she had presented herself.

No one appeared for the respondent.

Stephen, J.—I am of opinion that Mr. McClymont's argument is well founded, but I prefer to avoid going into the wider subjects of the law which he has raised such as would involve a lengthy decision, partly because I believe those subjects may soon be before a higher court in another case, but also because it is sufficient here to say that we think no "desertion" has taken place in this case. The definition of the circumstances of legal desertion has been long laid down—namely, that the parties must be living together at the time the desertion takes place, and not when they have come to any voluntary agreement to separate. Here the husband and wife have agreed to separate, and then the husband, for reasons good or bad, ceases to pay the money in consideration for which they had so separated. That is not desertion. The Married Women's Act of 1886 is one to facilitate the rights of such women who have been deserted. Those rights existed before the Act and the same exist now. No new rights were given by the Act. In this case the husband may or may not take the wife back, or she may or may not obtain parish relief, through which process an order for his contribution to her maintenance could be obtained. But at present there has been no such legal desertion as to enable the justices to deal with the case, and their order must be therefore quashed.

Williams v. Ramsdale. (a.)

Slander—"Best particulars of persons present"—Persons "to whom" slanders were uttered.

When particulars are required to be given of the names of persons who may have heard the defendant utter certain slanders in a public room, an order that the plaintiff is to deliver "the best particulars he can give of the persons present" when the slanders were uttered is correct, and will not be varied by the court.

This was an appeal from an order of A. L. Smith, J., in chambers, directing the plaintiff in an action for slander "to deliver to the defendant an account in writing of the best particulars the plaintiff can give of the places where and the persons present when the slanders (the cause of action) were uttered."

The plaintiff, in his notice of motion, asked that the order might be varied by striking out the words "present when" and inserting in their place the words "to whom."

Fillan, for the appellant.—The slanders were uttered in a public room at Cardiff, and it is not possible for the plaintiff to name the whole of the persons who were present.

He cited Eade v. Jacobs, 26 W. R. 159, 3 Ex. D. 335; Bradbury v. Cooper, 32 W. R. 32, 12 Q. B. D. 94; and Wingard v. Cox, 20 S. J. 341, W. N., 1876, p. 106.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., for the respondent.—Of course the defendant does not expect the plaintiff to state the names of all the persons present, but he ought to state the names to the best of his ability. This requirement is not more than what appears to have been asked for and granted in Roselle v. Buchanan, 34 W. R. 488, 16 Q. B. D. 656.

Stephen, J.—I see no reason to vary the order of my brother Smith. The plaintiff will state all the names that he can of persons present when the slanders were uttered—that is to say, the best particulars that he can.

VESTRY OF ST. GILES, CAMBERWELL v. GREENWICH BOARD OF WORKS. (a.)

Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 105, 140—Metropolis Management Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 77, 86—Street in more than one parish or district—Order placing such street under exclusive management of one authority—Expenses of paving new street.

The Metropolitan Board of Works made an order under section 140 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and section 86 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, placing a new street, being partly in the parish of the plaintiff vestry and partly in the district of the defendant board, under the exclusive management of the plaintiffs, and providing that the expenses of maintenance should be borne by the two authorities equally.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover from the defendants one-half of the expenses incurred in paving the street under section 105 of the Act of 1855.

Special case.

The plaintiff vestry and the defendant board were two of the authorities entitled to exercise the powers given by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and the Amendment Acts of 1856, 1858, and 1862, and subject to the provisions of those Acts. Canterbury-road, which was a street within section 250 of the Act of 1855 and section 112 of the Act of 1862, and also a new street within the last-mentioned section, was situate as to one side thereof in the plaintiffs' parish, and as to the other side thereof in the defendants' district. The two authorities being desirous of paving the new street under section 105 of the Act of 1855, a resolution to that effect was, by arrangement, passed by each of them; and the plaintiffs and defendants each made an estimate of the cost of paving both sides of the street, and made an apportionment of such estimated cost upon the houses and land abutting on the street. The apportionments were identical, each including all the houses and land on both sides of the street; and it was arranged that each of the authorities should endeavour to obtain payment from the owners of the houses and land in its own jurisdiction. It was hoped by this arrangement to get over a difficulty caused by the decision in Vestry of Mile End v. Guardians of Whitechapel Union, 24 W. R. 364, 1 Q. B. D. 680, where it was held that the cost of paving a new street must be charged on the frontagers on both sides. On the hearing of a summons taken out by the defendants against one of the owners, the magistrate held that the apportionment was bad, and refused to enforce it. An application was then made by the plaintiffs to the Metropolitan Board of Works, who made an order under section 140 of the Act of 1855 and section 86 of the Act of 1862 to the following effect—viz.:—That Canterbury-road should thenceforth, for the purpose of sewerage, drainage, paving, making up, lighting, watering, cleansing, repair, and maintenance, be under the exclusive management of the Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell, and that the costs of (inter alia) the paving of the street should be borne by the Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell, and the Board of Works for the Greenwich District respectively, the board paying to the vestry one-half of such costs and expenses. The plaintiffs then required the defendants to pay the sum of £613, being one-half of the expenses of paving and making up Canterbury-road. The defendants disputing their liability the plaintiffs brought this action to recover that sum.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:—

1. Whether the said order of the Metropolitan Board was valid.

2. Whether the sum of £613 was then payable under the facts of the above case by the defendant board to the plaintiff vestry.

A. Charles, Q.C. (Prosser with him), for the defendants.

Meadows White, Q.C. (Austin with him), for the plaintiffs.

MATTHEW, J.—The order of the Metropolitan Board of Works, rightly interpreted, purports to deal with the expenses actually payable by either of the two bodies. To the order, so interpreted, there is no objection. As to the second question, it is manifest that what the plaintiffs are seeking to recover is a share of expenses with which the defendants are not chargeable. Section 105 empowers the vestry or district board to charge the frontagers with the expenses of paving a new street. Then section 140 provides that "it shall be lawful for the Metropolitan Board of Works, where it appears to them that any street or line of street, being in more than one parish or district, should be placed under the exclusive management of one vestry or district board for the purposes of paving, lighting, watering, and cleansing, or any of them, or for the purposes of sewerage or drainage, or for all the purposes of this Act, to order that the same shall be under the management of such vestry or board accordingly." Applying that section to the case of a new street, the effect of it is to substitute the plaintiffs for the defendants, and to give the plaintiffs the right which the defendants would have had against the frontagers, that is, the right of recovering from them the expenses. The section and the order made under it do not throw the expense on the defendants, who would have no right to claim an indemnity from the frontagers. If the defendants were to seek to recover such expenses from the frontagers, the answer would be that the order of the Metropolitan Board had taken away the jurisdiction of the defendants. The answer to the second question must be in favour of the defendants.

CAVE, J.—The effect of the order of the Metropolitan Board, which is justified by section 140 of the Act of 1855, and section 86 of the Act of 1862, is to put the whole of the street within the jurisdiction of the plaintiffs. I can see no inconvenience in their exercising the powers of section 105 of the Act of 1855 and section 77 of the Act of 1862. The latter section provides that the expenses of paving shall be recoverable either before or during the progress or after the completion of the work; and the grievance of the plaintiffs apparently is that they cannot get the money after the completion of the work without having in the first place to advance the money themselves. And they say that it is only fair that they should be at liberty to charge the defendants in the first instance, and that afterwards repayment could be got from the frontagers. But the answer to that is that there is no section in the Acts which enables that to be done.

BRIDPORT ELECTION PETITION.
HOUNSELL v. SUTTILL. (a.)

Election of aldermen—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 60, sub-section 3—"Mayor elect"—Vote of the mayor.

By the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 60, sub-section 3, "An outgoing alderman, although mayor elect, shall not vote." An outgoing alderman, having been elected mayor, and having taken the declaration, voted in the election of aldermen for a borough.

Held, that the vote was invalid.

Special case under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 93, sub-section 7.

On November 9, 1886, the quarterly meeting of the council of the borough of Bridport was held for the ordinary election of mayor and aldermen for the borough.

The election of mayor was the first business transacted at the meeting. Charles Edmunds was elected mayor, and thereupon made and subscribed a declaration as in the 8th schedule to the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. Immediately after the election and the making and subscribing the declaration, the council proceeded to the election of aldermen.

The outgoing aldermen at such last-mentioned election, subject to the question as to whether Charles Edmunds, by his election to the office of mayor, and by his making and subscribing the said declaration, had ceased to be an outgoing alderman within the meaning of section 60, sub-section 3, of the Act, were John Pickard Suttill, James Beach, and Charles Edmunds.

Charles Edmunds presided as chairman at the said election of aldermen.

The respondents Suttill, Beach, and Knight, and Messrs. Nanks, Whetham, and Biddlecombe, were duly proposed as candidates.

The election was held by the aldermen and councillors entitled to vote delivering voting papers to the chairman, and by the chairman placing amongst the voting-papers a voting paper containing his own vote.

The chairman produced and read the voting papers, when it was found that eleven votes purported to have been given for each of the respondents Suttill, Beach, and Knight, and ten votes each for Nanks, Whetham, and Biddlecombe. Thereupon, without giving any further or casting vote, the chairman declared the respondents Suttill, Beach, and Knight duly elected. One of the voting papers counted by the chairman as being a good vote for each of the respondents Suttill, Beach, and Knight, was the voting paper signed by the chairman as previously mentioned.

If the chairman's vote was not the vote of a person entitled to vote at the election, then the lawful votes would have been ten each for the respondents, and ten each for Nanks, Whetham, and Biddlecombe, in which case the chairman would have had the casting vote under section 60, sub-section 6, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. The question for the opinion of the court was whether, under the circumstances, the respondents were duly elected by a majority of lawful votes.

A. Charles, Q.C. (Mattinson with him), for the petitioners, referred to 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, s. 60; to the former Act 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78, s. 14; and cited Reg. v. Stanley, 11 Ad. & E. 882.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C. (Lewis Coward with him), for the respondents.—"Mayor elect" is used in contradistinction to "mayor qualified." The new Municipal Corporations Act (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50) differs from the earlier one (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76). The last-mentioned Act provided (section 25) that aldermen going out of office should not be entitled to vote in the election of a new alderman. That Act was followed by 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78, which (section 14) gave a casting vote to the mayor. The new Municipal Corporations Act enacts (section 60) that an outgoing alderman, although mayor elect, shall not vote. In the case now stated we find that "Charles Edmunds was elected mayor, and thereupon made and subscribed a declaration." A "mayor elect" is not "qualified" until he has made the declaration required by the last-mentioned Act. Edmunds subscribed to this declaration and became mayor. In Reg. v. Stanley the mayor was elected and qualified, but the statute was then confined to outgoing aldermen.

A. Charles, Q.C., in reply.—Edmunds was not the less an outgoing alderman by being mayor.

MATHEW, J.—The election was clearly invalid, and I come to this conclusion on the plain language of the Act. 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50 provides (section 60, sub-section 2) that the election of aldermen shall be held "immediately after the election of the mayor," and (sub-section 3) that "an outgoing alderman, although mayor elect, shall not vote." Who is the "mayor elect"? It must be the person referred to in the preceding clause—that is to say, the person who had immediately before been elected mayor. It has been argued that on the particular facts of the case, what Edmunds did was merely in anticipation of what he would have done afterwards, and that it is not worth while to complain of what he did, as he might have given a casting vote. But the doctrine of equivalents must not be introduced into the construction of Acts of Parliament. For instance, by sub-section 4, "Every person entitled to vote . . . may vote . . . by signing and personally delivering a voting paper." It might be argued that it sufficed, for the purposes of that provision, to have a paper, not signed, but approved of, or even an announcement of the name of the person for whom the elector voted, but it would not be in compliance with the Act, and the Act must be strictly followed. Here the Act has not been complied with; the election is void and must be set aside.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Edmunds unfortunately took upon himself to do what the Act very plainly said he must not do—viz., vote. The election is therefore void.

On an application for trial of an interpleader issue respecting goods taken in execution under a judgment for a sum not exceeding £20, an order was made directing that, in the event of the non-compliance of the claimant with certain provisions, the goods should be sold by the sheriff and the proceeds paid into court pending the result of the trial. The claimant made default, and the goods were accordingly sold and the proceeds paid into court. Notice of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against the debtor was served on the sheriff within fourteen days of the sale, and the debtor was adjudged bankrupt on that petition.

(a.) Reported by G. K. PARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, under sections 45 and 46 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled, as against the execution creditor, to the money in court.

Claim by official receiver as trustee under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, ss. 45 and 46.

The Sheriff of Derbyshire seized, on March 6, certain goods under an execution issued on a judgment obtained by the plaintiff against the defendant. The goods having been claimed by a third person, an interpleader order was made on March 16 directing that, unless the claimant should pay into court the sum of £120 or give security within ten days, the goods should be sold and the proceeds of the sale paid into court, pending the result of the interpleader issue. The claimant withdrew, the goods were sold on March 28, and on March 30 a receiving order was made against the defendant, notice of which was served on the sheriff on April 1 by the official receiver. On April 5 the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt, and the sheriff paid £113 1s. 3d., the proceeds of the sale, less expenses, into court. The plaintiff took out a summons in chambers for the payment to him of this sum, whereupon Pollock, B., referred the matter to the court.

Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee in bankruptcy.—The trustee is entitled, as against the execution creditor, to the proceeds of the sale under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 46, sub-section 2, and section 45, sub-section 1; O'Brien v. Brodie, 14 W. R. 840, L. R. 1 Ex. 302.

Smyly, for the execution creditor.—The money being the proceeds of the interpleader issue, and not of the execution, the execution creditor is not seeking "to retain the benefit of the execution," and these sections do not apply.

Day, J.—I think the trustee is entitled to have the money paid over to him. Although the Interpleader Acts protect the sheriff, they do not alter the capacity in which he holds the proceeds of the sale of goods taken in execution. The sale was by the sheriff in his capacity of sheriff under the writ of fi. fa., not under some trust or duty imposed by the Interpleader Acts. Such sale, taken in connection with the previous seizure, constituted a seizure and sale and a completed execution within the meaning of section 45, sub-sections 1 and 2. But, the judgment debt being for more than £20, the sheriff was bound under section 46, sub-section 2, to retain the proceeds for fourteen days, and during this period the trustee duly intervened and gave the sheriff notice of the bankruptcy petition, and so entitled himself under section 46, sub-section 2, as against the execution creditor to the proceeds as part of the bankrupt's estate. It is immaterial that the sheriff in fact paid the money into court under the interpleader order before the expiration of the fourteen days.

Wills, J.—I am of the same opinion. The sale either was or was not under the execution. If it was under the execution, the trustee, having intervened within fourteen days, is clearly entitled to the proceeds under section 46, sub-section 2. If the sale was not under the execution, the execution has not been completed by sale as well as seizure, and the title of the trustee is equally clear under section 45, sub-sections 1 and 2. The argument that the execution creditor would not be "retaining the benefit of the execution," if he were paid this money, is of unintelligible subtlety. It has been clearly shown that the trustee is entitled to the money either under section 46, sub-section 2, or under section 45, sub-sections 1 and 2.

Bill of sale—Assignment of property other than personal chattels—Form—Extent of invalidity—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), ss. 4, 5—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 9.

When a bill of sale which is not made in accordance with the statutory form includes property other than chattels personal, such bill of sale is void to all intents and purposes, and not merely as regards the personal chattels comprised in it.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Powell in the County Court at Greenwich declaring a bill of sale void.

The case raised the question whether, when a bill of sale includes property not personal chattels, a deviation from the statutory form invalidates the instrument so far only as regards the chattels personal comprised in it, or whether it is invalidated in toto.

The bill of sale in question was given by the debtor, Burdett, who carried on the business of a printer, to a firm of wholesale stationers in the City, and witnessed that, in consideration of the sum of £200, the grantor assigned to the grantee "the several chattels and things specifically described in the schedule."

There was included in the schedule to the bill, amongst other property, an Otto Gas Engine and shafting, which, it was contended, did not fall within the definition of personal chattels for the purposes of the Bills of Sale Acts.

The county court judge set aside the bill of sale in toto, it not being made in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882; and the grantee now appealed from that decision.

Robson, for the bill of sale holder.—The bill of sale was not in accordance with the statutory form, and is void as to the personal chattels comprised in it; but the question is whether the property other than personal chattels included in it is not good security. The case of In re O'Dwyer, 19 L. R. Ir. 19, is a direct authority; and in that case Davies v. Rees, 34 W. R. 573, 17 Q. B. D. 408, in the Court of Appeal, was distinguished. Here the question is not whether the covenant for the payment of the principal and interest could be sued on. A bill of sale is a complex document, and this deed is only void quâ bill of sale.

R. T. Reid, Q.C., and Herbert Reed, for the trustee, were not called upon.

Cave, J.—The point which we have to decide is really what is the meaning of section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, which says that "a bill of sale made or given by way of security for the payment of money by the grantor thereof shall be void unless made in accordance with the form in the schedule to this Act annexed." Now here we have a bill of sale not in accordance with the form. We have a decision of the Court of Appeal by which we are bound, and in that case the Court of Appeal in effect said that section 9, in avoiding a bill of sale which is not made in accordance with the form in the schedule, avoids it in toto—not merely as regards the personal chattels comprised in it—so that a covenant contained in it for the payment by the grantee of the principal and interest secured is rendered void as against him. What was meant was that the bill of sale is void to all intents and purposes, and not as to the personal chattels only. Then we have a decision of Boyd, J., in the Irish courts, by which we are not bound, but which we treat with all respect, and he in effect says that such a bill is not void to all intents and purposes, but only as to the chattels personal. In my opinion that is entirely opposed to the decision of the Court of Appeal, and I cannot distinguish between them. The learned judge, in his judgment, professes to do so, but I must say, with all respect, that to me he seems not so much to have distinguished Davies v. Rees in the Court of Appeal as to have disregarded it.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The bill of sale here is one in which the grantor in effect says to the grantee, in consideration of the sum advanced I assign chattels A. and engines B. and covenant to repay. It is all one bargain. It is admitted that, as to chattels A., the bill of sale is bad; but it is said that, although that is so, the assignment of engines B. is an independent contract, and can be severed. I cannot see that. The assignment is of the chattels and the engines, and, after the decision in the Court of Appeal, the bill of sale is clearly void to all intents and purposes.

Appeal dismissed, with costs. Leave to appeal given.

BINNEY v. MUTRIE. (a.)

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of British Honduras.)

Partnership—Winding up—Accretion of profits to capital of partners—Surplus assets—Distribution—Lien.

Partners treated their respective shares of the profits declared or estimated in each year as accretions to their respective capitals.

Held, that, in the year in which the dissolution of the firm occurred, profits could not be so treated. The surplus assets must be distributed, first, in paying to each partner his claims in respect of capital; the residue or deficiency to be divisible in the proportions of the respective interests of the partners; the distribution of surplus assets to be subject to the lien of any partner on the entire assets to satisfy a deficiency.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of Honduras in regard to three orders of the 6th of June and the 1st and 8th of July, 1885, respectively.

These were made on further directions in a suit brought by the appellant for a partnership account and to wind up certain affairs of the partnership.

The partnership consisted of a firm of William Guild & Co., merchants in Belize, in which, for some years prior to 1879, the appellant carried on business as sole partner. A share to the extent of one-fourth in the above business was latterly owned by the respondent Mutrie. The other respondent, Currie, was originally a book-keeper on a fixed salary; but in 1879 he was admitted a partner in the same firm, in which, at that date, the partners were interested in the following proportions—the appellant forty per cent.; the respondent Mutrie thirty-five per cent.; the respondent Currie twenty-five per cent.

This partnership was to come to an end on the 31st of January, 1884. The partnership assets consisted of the stock in trade, and book-debts of the last partnership. The Chief Justice said: "The former was taken at a valuation, and the debts, less an amount carried to suspense account, were accepted as capital. I would merely remark that there is an unhappy conflict of evidence as to this suspense account, but that part of the case is not now before me."

The suit was instituted to wind up the partnership and take accounts on the 9th of April, 1885. The account showed considerable assets in hand and in course of realization.

The point to be decided was the principle upon which these assets should be distributed, and what inquiries should be made finally to settle all questions and accounts between the parties.

These accounts showed that nearly the entire original capital was contributed by the appellant. Contributions were added by Currie from his savings as a book-keeper, and by Mutrie to a smaller amount.

On the 31st of January, 1884, the respective credit balances were as follows:—

Binney . . .	214,815dols.
Currie . . .	60,762dols.
Mutrie . . .	58,422dols.

These balances were arrived at (1) by crediting the appellant with 2,500dols. as rent of the partnership premises; (2) by crediting the partners, in the agreed proportions, with the estimated profits, amounting altogether to 225,000dols.; (3) by allowing interest at five per cent. to each of the partners on their credit balances annually.

The Chief Justice on the 1st of June, 1885, said:—"The liabilities of the firm have either been met or are in course of liquidation. After making due provision for these liabilities there remained a surplus, and it is with respect to the application of this surplus that the parties to this suit are at issue. The plaintiff asks for a direction that it may be applied in payment of the original capital contributed by each of the partners, together with interest at five per cent. The defendants, on the other hand, seek a direction that the surplus may be divided rateably between the partners according to the amount of the respective capitals of the partners at the date of the dissolution of the said partnership." The Chief Justice made his direction according to the prayer of the defendants, and observed that if they had asked that their shares of profits, so far as they had been left in the business, should be treated as capital advanced by them, and as such entitled to rank in priority next after debts to third persons, he was not certain that they might not have done so successfully.

The order actually made directed that the surplus assets ought to be divided rateably between the partners, according to the amount of the respective capitals standing to the respective credits of the partners at the date of the dissolution.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 11.—The judgment of their lordships (Lord HOBHOUSE, Lord HERSCHELL, and Sir BARNES PEACOCK) was delivered by Lord HOBHOUSE.—Of the three orders appealed against, the only important one is that of the 1st of June, 1885. It is, in fact, the only order in the case which decides anything between the parties, for the first order only directs generally that the accounts are to be taken. The order of the 1st of June lays down a principle of division of the assets calculated to affect the rights of the parties materially.

The court declares that the surplus assets remaining after payment of all partnership debts and liabilities ought to be divided rateably between the partners, according to the amount of the respective capitals standing to their respective credits at the date of the dissolution, that is, on the 31st of January, 1884.

Their lordships take it to be clear that the claims of each individual partner against the partnership are not partnership liabilities within the meaning of the order. The order, therefore, directs exactly the same distribution of the assets among the partners, whether the accounts show a profit, a loss of capital, or an exact balance. But as by the partnership articles profits and losses are not to be shared in the ratio of the respective capitals, it is obvious that the distribution directed by the order cannot be according to the contract, except in the very improbable contingency of an exact balance.

The partnership commenced on the 1st of February, 1879, and expired on the 31st of January, 1884. It was formed for the purpose of carrying on the business previously carried on by Binney and Mutrie, and with the capital employed in that business, but admitting Currie as a partner, and adding to the capital a debt due to him by the old firm. The second of the partnership articles provides that the business (by which the parties evidently mean profit and loss) shall be divided into 100 parts, of which Binney shall have 40, Mutrie 35, and Currie 25. By the eighth and ninth articles Mutrie and Currie agree to allow their shares of profits, after drawing sums of which the maximum is fixed, to accumulate for their benefit. And by the tenth article interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum is to be allowed on the amount of the credit of each partner from the 1st day of February in each year.

The amount of capital thus brought in by Currie was an ascertained sum, but the capital provided by the others, depending as it did upon the outstanding credits of the old firm, could only be the subject of estimate. It was so entered in the books, and the original estimates were altered on account of bad debts. It appears to be still the subject of dispute whether the altered amount entered in the books was so entered by agreement with Binney, and their lordships do not propose to do anything to disturb a settled account if there is any. But so far as appears on the face of the accounts in this record, they are founded on entries of capital which are estimates only, and also on declared profits which are estimates only, and it is open to all parties to have them accurately taken in this suit. It is clear, however, that of the existing capital in February, 1881, a very large portion was attributable to Binney, a small one to Currie, and a still smaller one to Mutrie, if, indeed, his portion was not to be represented by a minus quantity.

The accounts kept by Mutrie and Currie, the managing partners, appear to follow accurately enough the principle of the partnership articles. They credit to each partner on every 31st of January down to the year 1883 his share of the declared or estimated profits, and the interest on the capital standing to his credit on the preceding 1st of February. The sum so accumulated was treated as the capital of each partner for the ensuing year, and this their lordships think was a mode of dealing which, if not compelled by the partnership articles, cannot at any rate be called in question now. As the outgoings were every year much less than the declared profits the capital of each was thus largely increased. The amount of the capital which each could claim to be paid out of the partnership funds on the 31st of January, 1884, would be the amount properly credited to him on 1st of February, 1883, with the year's interest added. The profits of that year never were or could have been made an accretion to the capital, because when the 1st of February came the partnership had ceased to exist, though in the accounts they have been added up together.

Their lordships understand that all claims of persons external to the partnership have been satisfied. That being so, it is clear that the surplus assets should be first applied in paying to each partner his claims in respect of capital. The residue will be profits, and will be divisible as such. If the assets will not satisfy the sums found due for capital, there is a loss which must be borne or made good by the partners in the proportions of forty, thirty-five, and twenty-five. And the possibility of such a loss may make it necessary to keep under the control of the court a sufficient amount of the assets to secure Binney, who has a much larger claim than the others, the benefit of his lien on the assets for contribution. Perhaps the strict course would be to apply for a receiver, but it may be that the parties could agree on some mode of proceeding more convenient to all.

Their lordships see no reason for reversing or varying the order of the 1st of July, which dismissed Binney's petition for payment of money out of court, or that of the 28th of July, which directed issues of the trial of certain questions of fact. But they ought now to indicate the order which, in their opinion, the court should have made on the 1st of June in lieu of the order actually made. It should run as follows:—

(a.) Ascertain what amounts ought to be placed to the credit, or to the debit, of each of the three partners in respect of the capital of the partnership business on the 1st of February, 1879.

(b.) Declare that each partner is entitled to interest at the rate of five per cent. in each year on the capital standing to his credit on the 1st of February in that year.

(c.) Declare that, according to the construction of the articles of partnership, whatever profits and interest were attributable to the share of any partner, and were not drawn out by him, are to be credited to him on the 1st of February in each year down to the 1st of February, 1883, as part of his capital in the concern.

(d.) Ascertain what amount of capital is to be credited to each partner on the 31st of January, 1884, according to the foregoing declarations.

(e.) Declare that the surplus assets of the partnership after paying all debts and liabilities, including rent and such costs of this suit as are directed to be paid thereout, ought to be applied in payment of the sums due to each partner in respect of his capital ascertained as aforesaid, with interest to the time of payment.

(f.) Declare that if the assets of the partnership will not suffice to pay the amounts of capital ascertained as aforesaid the deficiency is a loss of capital, and is to be borne or made good by the three partners, in the proportion of forty shares by the plaintiff, thirty-five by the defendant Mutrie, and twenty-five by the defendant Currie; and that, subject to this liability and to the claim of any of the partners against the entire assets to answer it, the assets are to be applied rateably in payment of the amounts of capital.

(g.) Declare that the residue, after payment of capital as aforesaid, is divisible as profit into one hundred parts, of which forty are to be paid to the plaintiff, thirty-five to the defendant Mutrie, and twenty-five to defendant Currie.

(h.) Let all accounts be taken and inquiries made which are necessary for giving effect to the foregoing declarations or orders, but not disturbing any accounts which may have been settled or matters which may have been concluded between the parties, if any such there be.

Their lordships see no reason to interfere with the decision of the court as regards costs. They will humbly advise her Majesty in accordance with the foregoing opinion. With regard to this appeal, they think there has been some error on both sides, and they are not at all sure which party will benefit by the alteration made in the order. The costs should be paid out of the partnership funds.

Practice—Stay of proceedings—Action in colonial court—Colonial decree to take partnership accounts—Action in England—Counter-claim in English action seeking same relief—Application to strike out counter-claim—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 25, r. 4; ord. 19, r. 27; ord. 21 r. 15.

A partnership firm, consisting of M., C., and B. carried on business in British Honduras. B. also carried on business in London in partnership with N. The London firm acted as agents of the Honduras firm, under an agreement which provided that B.'s share in the profits of the Honduras firm was to be brought into the accounts between the two firms to the credit of the London firm.

B. brought an action in Honduras against M. & C., and a decree was obtained in that action to have the partnership accounts of the Honduras firm taken. Before the accounts in that action were taken, though after the decree was made, M. & C. brought this action in England against B. & N., claiming an account of all moneys received and paid by the defendants as agents of the Honduras firm. The defendants, B. & N., counter-claimed to have the accounts of the Honduras partnership firm taken. On the application of the plaintiffs, M. & C., North, J., ordered that the defendants' counter-claim be struck out. The order of North, J., was made, not merely on the ground that, in the exercise of his discretion, he considered that the counter-claim could not be conveniently tried with the original claim, but on other grounds.

Held, on appeal, that, though any action for taking the accounts of the Honduras firm brought by B. in England after having obtained a decree for the same purpose in Honduras would be stayed, yet, as the action brought in England against B. & N. by M. & C. claimed to have the accounts taken as between the two firms, and as the profits due to B. as a partner in the Honduras firm should be ascertained before the account claimed by the plaintiffs' English action could be finally settled, B. ought not to be precluded from claiming, by way of counter-claim in the English action, to have the accounts of the Honduras partnership taken, and that, on B.'s co-defendant, N., undertaking to be bound by the proceedings in the Honduras action, the order of North, J., should be discharged.

Appeal from North, J.

Messrs. Mutrie & Currie, the plaintiffs in the present action, had carried on business in British Honduras in partnership with one of the present defendants, Mr. Binney. The defendant Binney also carried on a business in London in partnership with the defendant Niven, and the London firm acted as agents for the Honduras firm. By the terms of the agency agreement Binney's share of the profits in the Honduras firm was to be brought into account in the books of the London firm to their credit and to the debit of the Honduras firm.

In April, 1885, Binney, as a partner in the Honduras firm, brought an action in British Honduras against Messrs. Mutrie & Currie for an account of the partnership transactions. On April 12, 1885, a decree was made in that action that the partnership accounts should be taken. On September 15, 1886, Messrs. Mutrie & Currie commenced the present action in England against Messrs. Binney & Niven, the London agents of the Honduras firm, for an account of the dealings between the two firms, and alleged that the defendants had made secret profits in their agency. The defendants, by their defence, denied the allegation that they had made any secret profit, and put in a counter-claim by which they claimed to have an account taken of the partnership dealings of the Honduras firm.

The plaintiffs thereupon moved that the defendants' counter-claim be struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action and being vexatious.

North, J., on the hearing of the application, made an order that the counter-claim of the defendants be struck out.

The defendants appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Cookson, Q.C., and Cowell, for the appeal.—The judgment below is founded on an error of law—viz., that it is primâ facie vexatious to commence proceedings here when proceedings in respect of the same matter are pending in a colonial court. Though that may be the rule of law when proceedings are pending here or in the courts in Ireland or Scotland, we contend that rule does not apply when the pending proceedings are either in a foreign or in a colonial court. In such a case it is not primâ facie vexatious to commence proceedings here, but the onus lies on those who object to show cause why the proceedings here should be stayed: McHenry v. Lewis, 31 W. R. 305, 22 Ch. D. 397; Peruvian Guano Co. v. Bockwoldt, 31 W. R. 851, 23 Ch. D. 225. The marginal note to McHenry v. Lewis in the Law Reports is inaccurate on this point and goes beyond the actual decision. The Christianborg, 10 P. D. 141, 34 W. R. Dig. 147, is not in point. Again, the decree made in the Honduras action cannot be relied on as a bar to proceedings here, as it was not a final decree concluding the rights of the parties: Bayley v. Edwards, 3 Swans. 703; Ostell v. Lepage, 1 W. R. 18, 5 De G. J. & Sm. 95, 2 De G. M. & G. 892. Beddall v. Maitland, 29 W. R. 484, 17 Ch. D. 174, shows that this is a proper subject for a counter-claim.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and John Cutler, for the respondents.—A decree has actually been made in the Honduras action, and the plaintiff in that action is now seeking by his counter-claim as defendant in this action to get a similar decree here. The court in Honduras has full seizin of the case, and this court ought, therefore, to stay proceedings on the counter-claim. There has been an adjudication on the rights of the parties in the Honduras cause by the Privy Council here: Binney v. Mutrie, ante, p. 129, 12 App. Cas. 160. The judge has exercised his discretion in refusing to allow the counter-claim, and his discretion ought not to be interfered with: Huggons v. Tweed, 27 W. R. 495, 10 Ch. D. 359.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., in reply, gave an undertaking that the defendant Niven, who was not a party to the Honduras proceedings, would nevertheless be bound thereby.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of North, J., striking out altogether a counter-claim put in by the defendants. The action is brought by Messrs. Mutrie & Currie, who carried on business at Honduras in partnership with Mr. Binney, against Binney and a Mr

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Niven, who carry on business in partnership in England, and who acted as agents for the Honduras firm. The agreement between the Honduras firm and their agents in England is very peculiar, because it introduces into the accounts of the English agents part of the profit of the Honduras firm, it being provided that Binney's share of the profits of the Honduras firm was to be brought into account as between the Honduras firm and their English agents, to the credit of the English agents and to the debit of the Honduras firm.

Before, therefore, it could be ascertained what balance on these accounts was payable by the English agents to the Honduras firm, it had to be ascertained what was the share of Binney in the profits of the Honduras firm. This action is brought by the Honduras partners of the Honduras firm against their English agents to charge the English agents with certain sums which they ought to have allowed the Honduras firm, the plaintiffs alleging that the English firm got the benefit of commissions for which they ought to have accounted to the Honduras firm.

There would come into the general account between the Honduras firm and the English agents the sums which I have mentioned, if the plaintiffs succeeded in recovering them, and there would also be brought in the share of Binney in the profits of the Honduras business. I do not see how the accounts can be finally taken as between the Honduras firm and the English agents until the partnership accounts are taken, so as to ascertain what is Binney's share of the profits which is to form an item in the accounts. Binney, who was a partner in both firms, brought an action in the Honduras courts for the purpose of taking the partnership accounts, and by his defence in the present action he denies the allegation made in this action, and counter-claims to have the partnership accounts taken. North, J., has simply struck out this counter-claim.

It is urged upon us that, as North, J., in the exercise of his discretion, considered that this counter-claim could not be conveniently tried with the original claim, we ought not to interfere. But in my opinion the learned judge never exercised any such discretion at all. The strong point in my mind against his decision is that the profits due to Binney as a partner in the Honduras firm must be ascertained before the accounts between the Honduras firm and the English firm can be finally settled. By the counter-claim the defendants seek to get a decision on a matter which must be decided before the final adjudication of all questions arising between the plaintiffs and the defendants can be made. Now what ought to be done? Undoubtedly, if there had not been this action brought by the Honduras partners I should have thought it would have been wrong for Binney to bring a fresh action in England for taking the partnership accounts when he had already got a decree for that purpose in Honduras. Such fresh action would have been vexatious, and the court would have stayed it. But, although a decree has been made in the Honduras action, there has been no final winding up of that action, and it would be difficult finally to wind it up until this action is tried—the two depend the one on the other, and, in my opinion, it would be wrong now to strike out entirely this counter-claim, so as to prevent Binney from asking, at the trial of this action, for such a decree as may be right, having regard to the then state of proceedings in the Honduras action, though he certainly cannot be allowed to raise again here any questions which have been decided by a competent tribunal as between him and the plaintiffs in the Honduras action. Niven, who is not a party to the Honduras action, has undertaken to be bound by any adjudication or decision in the Honduras action, of course including anything which may be decided on appeal by the Privy Council.

The proper course, therefore, will be to discharge the order made by North, J., but without prejudice to any application that may be made if and when all proceedings in the Honduras action have been finally wound up so far as to determine what, apart from the claim in this English action, are the profits of Binney, and what is the state of accounts. If the Honduras proceedings go on rapidly an adjudication, which will settle all matters and all accounts between the parties with the exception of the claim made in the English action, will be speedily obtained. If so, that will be considered in determining what will be the ultimate balance on the accounts to be taken in this action. I in no way encourage the opinion that if the whole of the accounts of the partnership, with the exception of the claim to get in this asset, had been decided in the Honduras action, it would have been right to make a decree here again that those accounts should be taken. But what has been done by the order under appeal has this effect, that if anything should happen to prevent the Honduras action from being worked out, the defendant Binney will be precluded from getting such a decree or order as will enable him to make perfect those proceedings in the Honduras action which have only gone to a certain length, and which may possibly, in certain events, never go further. The plaintiffs in this case are very confident as to the quickness of the Honduras proceedings. If that confidence prove well founded they may, before the trial of this action, get the matter settled in that action so as to bind Binney and Niven, in which case there will be no further inquiry or decree in order to settle what will have been already settled in the Honduras action.

In my opinion the appeal succeeds, and, on the undertaking of Niven to be bound by any decision in the Honduras action, we discharge the order.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is unnecessary for us to consider now what kind of decree will have to be made, or ought to be made, when the English action comes on to be heard. That is not the question before us. It does not in the least follow that because the defendants, by their counter-claim, ask for a general account of the partnership dealings and transactions, they will get it, or that if they get it they will get it in an unqualified form. It is quite competent for the court, when the case comes on, to make such a decree for an account as is required by the circumstances of the case, having regard, amongst other things, to what has been done abroad; but the only question we have to consider is whether it is right to strike out the whole of this counter-claim. It appears to me that it is not right. If North, J., had exercised his discretion in this way, if he had thought that as a matter of convenience it was better that the defendants should have their counter-claim struck out, and that they should commence a fresh action in the High Court, of course we should have been very unwilling to take a different view, for the Court of Appeal is slow to interfere with the discretion of the judge. But that is not the case. He has proceeded on a principle that by reason of the pending proceedings in Honduras between Binney and his co-partners for taking the accounts of the Honduras firm, this counter-claim is wrong, and ought to be struck out. In other words, he has come to the conclusion that this counter-claim, asking for accounts of that same partnership in this country, is vexatious and oppressive, and ought to be dealt with accordingly. That is the substance of the view he has taken. Now, in order to deal with that view, we must look at what the claim is. The claim is not a mere claim by the Honduras firm to get in a partnership asset or sum of money due from the English firm to the Honduras firm. It goes far beyond that. The object of the claim is to get in that asset and to distribute it among the partners of the Honduras firm. That is the key to the whole case. How are you to distribute an asset of the firm without taking the accounts of the firm? It does not at all follow, as I said just now, that in this English action the accounts which have been taken in the Honduras action are to be taken over again. These accounts can, of course, be adopted as far as they go, and such an order can be made as the justice of the case may require; but, in some shape or another, the partnership accounts must be taken if any asset is to be distributed among the partners. We see that every day in the case of the sheriff seizing by fi. fa. the share of a partner in certain assets of the firm. You have then to find out what the share of the partner is in the assets seized. We all know that this cannot be done except by taking the partnership accounts, and, therefore, when the plaintiffs ask for the distribution of the asset, they inevitably let in the taking of the partnership accounts. I do not say the defendants will be entitled to an order for taking the accounts of the partnership; it may be necessary or desirable to modify it, but it strikes me as altogether wrong to say that they shall not raise such a point by way of counter-claim. Then it is said, and said truly, that Mr. Niven is not in a position to ask for an account of the Honduras firm. But, on the other hand, having regard to the peculiar nature of the agreement between the Honduras firm and the agents, it seems to us that such an account as is here asked for by the plaintiffs cannot be granted in the absence of Niven, and I do not see how it is possible to distribute the asset without Niven's presence in some shape. Then it is said he is not bound by the Honduras proceedings. That is true, but the difficulty is met by the undertaking given by Sir Horace Davey, and on that undertaking it seems to me that the only right order is to allow the appeal and discharge the order appealed from.

WALKER v. DODDS. (a.)

*Practice—Chancery Court of County Palatine of Lancaster—Service of writ out of jurisdiction—Leave of Vice-Chancellor to issue writ—*17 & 18 Vict. c. 82, s. 8—Chancery of Lancaster Rules, 1884, ord. 2, r. 4; ord. 12, rr. 1, 7.

Before an application is made to the Court of Appeal for leave to serve a writ issued out of the Palatine Court upon a defendant who is out of the jurisdiction of that court, but within the jurisdiction of the High Court, the leave of the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court must first have been obtained to the issue of the writ.

Counsel, on making such application, ought to inform the court that the leave of the Vice-Chancellor has already been obtained.

Original motion.

The plaintiffs were the surviving trustees and executors of the will of R. Holt, deceased. The defendants were the executors of the will of T. Dodds, deceased, who had also been one of the trustees of the will of R. Holt.

The present action was brought by the plaintiffs for an account of all trust funds and moneys received by T. Dodds as trustee, and of all dealings in relation to the trust estate, and for payment to them of what should be found due to them on taking such account.

The writ was issued out of the Palatine Court on the 11th of August, 1887, and was served on one of the defendants, who had appeared. The other defendant, H. N. Dodds, resided out of the jurisdiction of the Palatine Court, at Darlington, in the county of Durham.

On the 3rd of November, 1887, an order was made by the Court of Appeal on an ex parte application of the plaintiffs giving them liberty to serve a copy of the writ out of the jurisdiction of the Palatine Court upon the defendant H. N. Dodds. At the time when this order was made no leave had been obtained from the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court to issue the writ for service out of the jurisdiction of that court, as required by the Chancery of Lancaster Rules, 1884, ord. 2, r. 2.

The defendant H. N. Dodds now applied by way of original motion that the order of the 3rd of November, 1887, might be discharged on the ground of irregularity.

By section 8 of the Court of Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 82), the Court of Appeal is empowered to direct that service may be effected out of the jurisdiction of the Palatine Court on any person who may be a necessary or proper party to any suit or other matter in the Palatine Court.

By the Chancery of Lancaster Rules, 1884, ord. 2, r. 4, "no writ of summons for service out of the jurisdiction . . . shall be issued without the leave of the court or Vice-Chancellor."

By ord. 12, r. 1, "service out of the jurisdiction of the court, and not within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice, of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or Vice-Chancellor" in certain specified cases.

By rule 7 of the same order "the practice as to service out of the jurisdiction of the court, and within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice, is not hereby affected, and shall be in force as to proceedings under these rules."

O. L. Clare, for the motion.—The practice in the Palatine Court in cases of this kind is for the plaintiff to make an application to the Vice-Chancellor for leave to issue the writ for service out of the jurisdiction, and then to apply to the Court of Appeal for leave to serve it. In the present case the leave of the Vice-Chancellor to issue the writ has not been obtained. The order, therefore, of the 3rd of November, 1887, was irregularly obtained, and ought to be discharged.

He referred to 17 & 18 Vict. c. 82, s. 8; Chancery of Lancaster Rules, 1884, ord. 2, r. 4, ord 12, r. 1; Sedgwick v. Yedras Mining Co., 35 W. R. 780; and to an anonymous case, noted in 23 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 404.

Maberly, contrà.—The order of the 3rd of November, 1887, is in compliance with section 8 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 82. Ord. 2, r. 4, and ord. 12, r. 1, must be read together, and apply only to service out of the jurisdiction both of the Palatine Court and of the High Court. This contention is supported by ord. 12, r. 7.

Clare replied.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an application to discharge an order made on an ex parte application for leave to serve a writ issued out of the Palatine Court upon a defendant out of the jurisdiction of that court. There are two defendants to the action, one of whom was within the jurisdiction of the Palatine Court, and the other of whom was out of the jurisdiction of that court, but within the jurisdiction of the High Court. The application is made on the ground of the irregularity of the issue of the writ, which had been issued out of the Palatine Court for service out of the jurisdiction of that court without the leave of the Vice-Chancellor having been first obtained to such issue. Reliance was placed on rule 4 of order 2 of the Chancery of Lancaster Rules. That rule is clear in its terms. [His lordship read the rule and continued:—] Then order 12 deals with service out of the jurisdiction both of the Palatine Court and of the High Court, and it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that ord. 2, r. 4, must be read in conjunction with that order, and that it only applied to service out of the jurisdiction of both courts. But I think that would be giving a wrong construction to order 12, and in my opinion ord. 2, r. 4, applies to all writs for service out of the jurisdiction of the Palatine Court. It is true at the end of the order there is a rule which provides that the practice as to service out of the jurisdiction of the court and within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice is not to be thereby affected, and shall be in force as to proceedings under the rules. It is said that is not to interfere with service of a writ out of the jurisdiction of the Palatine Court, but I do not think that is so.

In my opinion the writ in this case was not one which had been properly issued, and if we had seen that we should not have given leave for the service of it out of the jurisdiction. The case referred to, in 23 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 404, shows that we shall not be interfering with the practice of the Palatine Court by coming to the conclusion we have. For in that case the Court of Appeal took the same view of the practice as we have done. We do not base our opinion on that case, but we were unwilling to act without knowing what the practice had been. I will only add that counsel applying for leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction ought to inform the court that leave for the issue of the writ out of the jurisdiction has been obtained. In my opinion the order for service out of the jurisdiction must be discharged.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

In re HANSON'S TRADE-MARK. (a.)

Trade-mark — Registration — Old mark — Distinctive device—Colour—Fancy words not in common use—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 64 (sub-sections 1 (c), 3), 67, 72.

H. & Co. registered under the Act of 1875 two trade-marks in respect of coffee as marks which had been used by them before the passing of that Act, and thereby obtained protection in respect of all goods in that class till the passing of the Act of 1883, since which the protection applied to coffee only. The marks had never been used for anything but coffee. On an application to register the marks under the Act of 1883 in respect of all the goods in that class,

Held, that the former registration gave them no right to have the marks registered under the Act of 1883 as old marks for goods other than coffee, although in the same class; and that, with respect to such goods, they must be treated as new marks, and must comply with the provisions of the Act of 1883.

The trade-marks in question consisted of—first, an oblong label divided into three equal and parallel stripes, coloured red, white, and blue respectively (the colours being shown, for the purposes of the former registration, by shading with dark lines), but with no dividing lines between the stripes; and, secondly, the words "Red, White, and Blue" printed across the label.

Held, that the only distinction in the device was the use of the colour; that the Act treated colour as an accident, so that the device must be something distinctive independently of colour; that the words "Red, White, and Blue" were not "fancy words not in common use"; and that registration must be refused.

Motion.

This was an application for an order directing the Comptroller-General to proceed with the registration in class 42 of trade-marks Nos. 61,265 and 61,266.

On the 28th of November, 1881, the applicants registered under the Act of 1875, s. 10, as old trade-marks used before the passing of that Act, for French coffee—first, an oblong label, divided into three equal and parallel stripes, coloured red, white, and blue respectively, within a figured border, the colours being shown for the purpose of registration by shading with dark lines, but with no dividing lines between the stripes; and, secondly, the words "Red, White, and Blue" printed across the label. These trade-marks had been upheld by the Court of Appeal in Hanson v. The British Tea and Trading Co. (Limited), and it was not now disputed that the applicants had by prior user rightfully obtained the registration of these marks for coffee. They did not allege that they had ever used them for other goods, but they stated that they proposed to apply them to tea and cocoa.

They now applied to register their two trade-marks (the label not shaded, but showing the actual colours as used) under the Act of 1883 in respect of all goods comprised in class 42.

The comptroller refused registration of the label on the ground that prior user for coffee did not make it an old mark for other goods, and that it was not a distinctive mark, and he stated that the same reasons applied to the words "Red, White, and Blue."

Renshaw, Q.C., and J. Cutler, for the motion.—Under the Act of 1875 we could not register the trade-mark in colour; but under the Act of 1883, s. 67, we may do so. Under the former Act our registered trade-marks applied to all goods in the class, but under the latter they only apply to coffee, so we are entitled to have them registered in respect of the other goods comprised in the class, so as to give us the same protection as we enjoyed under the former Act. Those marks, indeed, are not now disputed, and have been upheld by the Court of Appeal. "Red, White, and Blue" are fancy words as applied to coffee: In re Van Duzer's Trade-mark, 35 W. R. 294, 34 Ch. D. 623.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and M. Ingle Joyce, for the Comptroller-General.—These are not old trade-marks for anything but coffee, so the applicants must bring them within the Act of 1883. They are not covered by section 64, sub-section 1 (c). By section 67 a trade-mark may be used in any colour, and as the label depends upon colour it is not a distinctive device, nor are the words "Red, White, and Blue" "fancy words not in common use." The applicants are sufficiently protected by their common law rights and by section 72.

Renshaw, Q.C., in reply.—We are not protected by the Act. Our trade-marks for coffee do not prevent anyone using similar marks for goods in the same class. The words in section 72 are "goods or descriptions of goods," instead of "goods or classes of goods" in the Trade-Marks Registration Act, 1875, s. 6.

(a.) Reported by H. C. ROPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KAY, J.—I am of opinion that the comptroller is quite right. When examined, the case comes to a very simple point indeed. Before this Act of 1883 a device could not be registered in colours. The applicants had an old trade-mark for French coffee, and under the former Act they registered that as an old mark for that article. They were obliged to register it without any colour; so they put it on the register with three parallel and seemingly equal stripes, the two outer ones shaded and the middle one white, and across they printed "Red, White, and Blue."

That they were allowed to do because it was an old mark; but colour could not then, by itself, be registered at all. Now it may be that they are in this position. They have had that mark, and practically used it in the colours "red, white, and blue." An exhibit has been shown to me to show what their use was at the time of an action in 1884 with respect to the trade-mark so registered. Having used it in that way, it may very well be that no one else could apply a label resembling that to the eye to coffee—of course they could not to coffee, but to any similar thing like cocoa or other preparations which are used by some people rather than coffee. Very likely, by doing so, it would be said you are trying to get the public to believe that the goods which you sell are goods which are either manufactured or selected by this firm of Sir Reginald Hanson & Co. That is quite possible. They now come under the Act of 1883, and they say:—"We are afraid rather that we might not have the power of preventing other people using this mark, which we have used so long, for such substances as cocoa and others which come within the class of which coffee is an item, and therefore we ask now to have this mark registered for all such other articles—all articles within the class of which coffee is an item."

Then I have to consider whether, this not being an old mark with reference to any of these articles, but being, with reference to any of these articles, a new trade-mark, they could possibly be allowed to register this under the Act of 1883 as a new mark. That puts out of sight entirely the fact of its having been registered for coffee before, and I must treat it as though this were a new application for registration under the Act of 1883 of a mark which had not been used before. What is the objection? It is a very simple one. The objection is "Your mark, independent of colour, is not distinctive, and under this Act of 1883 colour is treated as an accident." This is the argument as I understand it. It is the plain intention of the Act that where the distinction of the mark depends upon colour that will not do, you may register a mark which is otherwise distinctive in colour, and that gives you the right to use it in any colour you like; but you cannot register a mark of which the only distinction is the use of a colour, because practically, under the terms of the Act, that would give you a monopoly of all the colours of the rainbow and others.

Now let us see whether that is so under the Act of 1883. Section 64 contains words that have been commented on very much, criticized very much, and of which we have had various expositions. The words which apply to this case are: "For the purposes of this Act a trade-mark shall consist of or contain at least one of the following essential particulars:—(c A distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, ticket, or fancy word or words not in common use." Now I must look for "a distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, or ticket." I have before me the thing which it is proposed to register. It consists of, as I have said, three parallel stripes, of apparently about the same width, and there is no division between them at all. There is no line drawn between them. There is nothing on the paper to divide those three from one another except the colours in which they are printed. One is red, the middle one is white, and the other is blue, and across them is printed "Red, White, and Blue."

To see whether the argument addressed to me on behalf of the comptroller is right I must look at the 67th section. Up to this time colours could not be registered. What says this Act? "A trade-mark may be registered in any colour;" but then the mark must be a distinctive device, must be something independent of the colour if it stopped there—"and such registration shall (subject to the provision of this Act) confer on the registered owner"—what?—"the exclusive right to use the same in that or any other colour." It is obvious that colour is, as I have said, treated as an accident, and that the distinctive device must be something which is distinctive independently of the colour. Because the difficulty arises in an instant. If I allowed this mark to go on the register as a new mark, which is what is now asked, to-morrow or the day after, or at any time, the colours might be altered to any colour. I see nothing in the world to prevent Sir Reginald Hanson immediately obliterating the blue and red and using white for all three stripes, in which case there would be no division, nothing at all on this mark in any way distinctive. Or, again, if that is thought an extreme instance, he might, at any rate, use them all in the colour red, or all in the colour blue, or one of them red and the two others yellow, or one of them red and the other two white, or one of them blue and the other two green. He is to use them in any colour he likes, having registered them in one; so that it seems to me that the point raised in this case against Sir Reginald Hanson is a very sound one. The meaning of the Act I understand to be that you may register a mark in a colour, but the mark must be a distinctive device independently of the colour. In this case there would be no distinctive device independently of the colour, and when you registered it in one colour, or two or three colours, or half-a-dozen colours, you might use it in any colour or colours you pleased. Accordingly it seems to me the comptroller is quite right, and that the application must be refused, with costs.

The other application was for the words "Red, White, and Blue," but I pointed out at once that if the first mark could be registered that would include the use of the words "Red, White, and Blue," because if anybody used "Red, White, and Blue" after that mark was registered he clearly would be infringing that trade-mark by a colourable imitation; and really the whole thing comes to this: the object is to get registration of the words "Red, White, and Blue," which, in my opinion, are not fancy terms.

Motion refused, with costs.

Bond—Condition—Agreement—Injunction—Penalty—Liquidated damages.

The condition of a bond, even though the bond contains recitals, may, having regard to surrounding circumstances and the intention of the parties, be evidence of an agreement sufficient to sustain an injunction.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs, a banking company, for an interim injunction against the defendant, a former manager of their bank, who had resigned and accepted an appointment as sub-manager of a bank in the same town where the plaintiffs carried on their banking business, to restrain the defendant from acting in breach of an agreement not to accept a similar appointment after leaving the plaintiffs' service.

In addition to the agreement, of which there was evidence, the defendant had executed a bond in £1,000, conditioned to be void if the defendant should not after quitting the plaintiffs' service enter into another banking appointment during twelve months after leaving them and within a radius of five miles from the place where the plaintiffs' bank was.

The chief question was whether the condition contained in the bond was in itself sufficient evidence of agreement to entitle the plaintiffs to an injunction.

Romer, Q.C., and Carson, for the plaintiffs, cited Gravely v. Bernard, 22 W. R. 891, L. R. 18 Eq. 518, and Howard v. Woodward, 13 W. R. 132.

Maclean, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the defendant.

CHITTY, J.—In my opinion the plaintiffs have shown that there was an agreement by the defendant, and that the bond was given as an additional security. But, whether that be so or not, I have no difficulty in deciding that the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction on the bond itself. The right way of construing the bond is to construe its condition as containing an agreement. That there was an agreement contained in the bond is also shown by the recitals in the bond. I, however, do not feel compelled to rely on the existence of recitals. I think it is quite sufficient to look at the condition; and, bearing in mind the circumstances under which the bond was given and the intention of the parties, I think that the fair way of looking at the bond is to take the agreement as existing in the condition itself. That was done in Gravely v. Bernard. In that case the bond, for all practical purposes, contained no recitals, and all that the plaintiff relied on was the condition of the bond. It however appears from the report that the able counsel for the defendant felt themselves unable to argue the case on that ground, and were compelled to admit that the defendant's sole chance of escape was to show that there was no consideration for the bond. The Master of the Rolls' observation in that case that the sole question was whether there was a sufficient consideration for the bond, is to my mind tantamount to a clear expression of opinion that the agreement could be extracted from the bond. Howard v. Woodward, when examined, is also an authority to the same effect, though there was a stipulation there which does not exist here—namely, that the penalty should be a full sum of £1,000 as liquidated damages.

I therefore hold that there is an agreement by the defendant, and the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction.

LYNCH v. MACDONALD. (a.)

Practice—Trial with a jury—Action assigned to Chancery Division—Counter-claim—Joinder of cause of action not so assigned—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 36, rr. 3, 4, 56.

A plaintiff, in his statement of claim, charged the defendant with the improper and wrongful sale and conversion of certain shares, and the wrongful detention of certain other shares, and claimed (1) redemption of all securities in the possession of the defendant; (2) damages for the wrongful sale and conversion; (3) damages for the wrongful detention; (4) sale by the court of the shares detained; and (5) a receiver of such shares and the proceeds. The defendant, in his counter-claim, charged the plaintiff with false and fraudulent representation, and claimed (1) an account of what was due to him from the plaintiff; (2) sale of the shares in his possession; (3) payment out of the proceeds of what might be found due to him; and (4) damages for fraud.

Held, on a motion by the plaintiff for an order directing the trial of the action by a judge with a jury, that the plaintiff was not entitled as of right to trial with a jury; and, under the circumstances of the case, the court, in its discretion, refused the application.

Motion.

The plaintiff in the action charged the defendant with the improper and wrongful sale and conversion of certain Griqualand shares, and the wrongful detention of certain Kimberley shares, and claimed (1) redemption of all securities of the plaintiff in the possession of the defendant; (2) damages for the improper and wrongful sale and conversion of the Griqualand shares; (3) damages for the wrongful detention of the Kimberley shares; (4) sale of the Kimberley shares under the direction of the court; and (5) a receiver of such last-mentioned shares and of the proceeds of sale thereof.

The defendant, in his counter-claim, charged the plaintiff with false and fraudulent representation, and fraudulently abstaining from giving certain information and claimed (1) an account of what was due from the plaintiff to him; (2) the sale of the Kimberley shares; (3) payment out of the proceeds of what should be found due from the plaintiff; and (4) damages for fraud.

An application by the plaintiff to North, J., at chambers, that the action might be tried by a judge with a jury, was refused.

This was a motion by the plaintiff that the action might be tried by a judge with a jury, and that the time for giving notice of the trial of the action might be extended until seven days after the application.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the plaintiff.—Before the Judicature Act the claim for damages for fraud would not have been brought in the Court of Chancery. Now the plaintiff has a right to have a trial by a judge with a jury: Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 36, r. 6; The Temple Bar, 34 W. R. 68, 11 P. D. 6; Coots v. Ingram, 35 W. R. 390, 35 Ch. D. 117; McGowan v. Middleton, 31 W. R. 835, 11 Q. B. D. 464. The case of Gardner v. Jay, 33 W. R. 470, 29 Ch. D. 50, is not in point. At any rate your lordship has a discretion to order the action to be tried by a judge with a jury, and the circumstances of this case, in which the plaintiff is charged with fraud and wishes to have his character submitted to the decision of a jury, justify the exercise of such a discretion.

Higgins, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the defendant.—The plaintiff is not entitled as of right to have the action tried by a judge with a jury. The issues might be divided and tried separately; Gardner v. Jay is in point. [They were stopped by the court.]

Swinfen Eady, in reply.—The defendant, who has added a common law issue, in his counter-claim, cannot now turn round and ask to have that issue separated.

NORTH, J.—In this case the plaintiff asks for relief which would be extremely inconvenient for a judge with a jury. The defendant makes a counter-claim respecting matters which would also be extremely inconvenient for a judge with a jury; but he also combines a claim for damages for false and fraudulent representation by the plaintiff. The plaintiff now applies to have the whole action and counter-claim tried by a judge with a jury. He claims this first as of right. In my opinion he has no such right. The plaintiff's action is assigned by the Judicature Act, 1873, to the Chancery Division, and must be tried by a judge without a jury, unless the court or a judge otherwise order. The plaintiff relies upon ord. 36, r. 6. Now rule 3 of that order provides that causes or matters assigned to the Chancery Division shall be tried by a judge without a jury, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order; rule 4 provides that the court or a judge may, if it shall appear desirable, direct a trial without a jury in certain cases which, previously to the passing of the Judicature Act, could, without any consent of parties, have been tried without a jury; and rule 5 provides that the court or a judge may direct the trial without a jury in any case requiring prolonged examination of documents, or accounts, or investigation, which could not in their or his opinion be conveniently made with a jury. Then rule 6 provides that "In any other cause or matter, upon the application of any party thereto for a trial with a jury of the cause or matter or any issue or fact, an order shall be made for a trial with a jury." The rules 4, 5, and 6 do not apply to this case. In my opinion the plaintiff's claim as of right wholly fails. With regard to the discretion of the court to order a trial with a jury, I have pointed out that the claims made in this action would be very inconvenient for a judge and jury to try. This is not an application that the charge of false and fraudulent representation should be struck out of the counter-claim as being more proper to be tried in a separate action; or for a direction that the issue on the counter-claim should be tried separately, but an application that the whole action should be tried by a judge and jury. I see no reason for acceding to this motion, and I direct that the action and counter-claim be tried by a judge without a jury. The costs of this application to be the defendant's costs in any event.

The notice of election under rule 6 of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, as to remuneration for conveyancing business arising in an action, must be given by the solicitor before he undertakes such conveyancing business. After having done any work in the matter which would properly be covered by the scale charge—e.g., discussed with the client the mode of sale and questions relating to the title—it is too late for him to elect.

Semble, where a solicitor is acting for several trustees, notice of election must be given to them all.

Summons to review taxation.

The question in this case was as to the validity of a notice of election under rule 6 of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881. This depended upon (1) whether the election was made in time; (2) whether the election, being communicated to only one of two trustees, could be supported.

Messrs. Tamplin, Tayler, & Joseph acted as solicitors for Mr. Blencowe and Mr. W. C. Metcalfe, who as trustees were defendants in an administration action. In the course of this action it became necessary to raise a sum of money for payment of costs. It was at first proposed to do this by way of mortgage; but afterwards it was determined to sell a portion of the estate for the purpose. A summons was taken out in the action, and an order for sale made on the 7th of May, 1886. No steps were taken by the solicitors in the matter of the sale between that date and the 21st of June, 1886, on which day Messrs. Tamplin, Tayler, & Joseph communicated their election in writing to Mr. Metcalfe, one of the trustees, in the following terms: "Re Metcalfe, deceased.—Referring to the proposed sale of the 'Metcalfe Arms,' we beg to inform you and your co-trustee, Mr. Blencowe, that we hereby elect that our remuneration for such business shall be in accordance with the old system of costs as altered by schedule 2 of the Remuneration Orders." Shortly after the 21st of June, 1886, the sale was proceeded with, and in due course completed. The bill of costs was made out on the footing of the above notice. The taxing master disallowed many of the items, on the ground that the remuneration should be according to the scale charge fixed by schedule 1 to the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.

The defendants objected to the disallowance of these items, urging that they were rightly included in the bill, being charges for conveyancing work done as fixed by schedule 2 to the order, and because, before undertaking the business in respect of which such charges were made, the defendants' solicitors, by writing under their hand, communicated to the client that they elected that their remuneration should be according to schedule 2 to the order.

The taxing master overruled these objections on the ground, inter alia, that the notice was given only to one trustee, not to both, and that in his opinion a notice of this description should be given to all the trustees.

The taxing master then certified the taxation according to the scale in the General Order, whereupon the defendants took out this summons, asking that their objections to the taxation might be allowed, and for a reference back to the taxing master to vary his certificate accurately.

S. Dickinson, for the applicants.

A. W. Rowden, for the plaintiffs, pointed out certain items in the solicitors' bill of costs (which are referred to in the judgment). [He was stopped by the court.]

Dickinson replied.

Stirling, J.—A point has been argued before me which was not brought to the notice of the taxing master, and on that point I decide the question. While, therefore, it is on that account unnecessary for me to discuss the reasons advanced by the taxing master for the course which he has taken, I wish it to be understood that I do not disagree with those reasons.

The question in this case is whether the election was made in accordance with rule 6 of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881. That rule says that "In all cases to which the scales prescribed in schedule 1 hereto shall apply, a solicitor may, before undertaking any business, by writing under his hand communicated to the client, elect that his remuneration shall be according to the present system as altered by schedule 2 hereto; but if no such election shall be made, his remuneration shall be according to the scale prescribed by this order."

Now the business in this case was conveyancing business connected with a sale in the course of an administration action for the purpose of paying certain costs. It has been argued by Mr. Dickinson that, the order for sale being made on the 7th of May, 1886, and the notice of election being given on the 21st of June, 1886, and nothing having been done in the matter of the sale in the meantime, the election was in time. But I find in the solicitor's bill of costs an entry, under date the 24th of March, of a charge for preparing the summons for sale; on the 31st of March a charge is made for attending the summons; and on the 5th of April a conference is charged for, at which the question was discussed whether the sale should be by public auction or private contract, and the title was considered. In my opinion this case comes within the principles laid down in In re Allen, 35 W. R. 218, 34 Ch. D. 433, and Hester v. Hester, 35 W. R. 233, 34 Ch. D. 607, and it is too late, under the 6th rule of the General Order, for a solicitor to declare his election after holding a conference with the client for the purpose of discussing the mode of sale and the title to the property. Such a conference is properly business covered by the scale charge, and the election referred to in the rule must be, in my judgment, declared before undertaking any such business.

As regards the reasons given by the taxing master, one of them raises a question of some importance, as to which it may be well that I should express an opinion. The taxing master says that notice to one of two trustees is not sufficient. It is not necessary for me to decide the point; but, as at present advised, I consider that a solicitor must pursue his right of election under the General Order strictly, and that, as according to the rule notice must be communicated to "the client," and the client in this case consisted of two persons, notice to one of them was not sufficient.

Practice—Evidence—Affidavits—Cross-examination of deponent—Discretion of court or judge—Motion—Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 38, r. 1.

The court or judge has a discretion, in making an order under ord. 38, r. 1, for the attendance for cross-examination of a person who has made an affidavit, and is not bound to make such an order.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiff company for an interim injunction to restrain the defendant from dealing with certain shares of the company which had been allotted to the defendant in part payment of property sold by him to the company, but which they alleged the defendant had not conveyed to them. The motion was supported by an affidavit made by a director which the defendant had not had time to answer.

D. L. Alexander, for the defendant.—I apply under ord. 38, r. 1, for an order directing the deponent who made the affidavit to attend before an examiner for cross-examination. A party against whom an affidavit is used has a right to require the deponent to attend to be cross-examined: ord. 37, rr. 20, 22. I submit that the court is bound to make the order.

Higgins, Q.C., and P. S. Stokes, for the plaintiff company.

Ord. 38, r. 1, provides that "Upon any motion, petition, or summons evidence may be given by affidavit; but the court or a judge may, on the application of either party, order the attendance for cross-examination of the person making any such affidavit."

NORTH, J.—I cannot admit that the rules oblige me to order the attendance of a deponent for cross-examination. If there was any rule requiring me to make such an order under any circumstances, the result would be a waste of time and expense. I do not say that I shall not make such an order when I hear the motion; all I decide is that I shall not do so now. When the rule provides that the court or a judge may do a thing, it does not mean that I must do it. I do not think the time has come for making such an order, and I am not now in a position to tell whether cross-examination ought to be permitted.

[The motion was treated as made ex parte, an injunction was granted for a week, and the motion was directed to stand over for that period; and when all parties were prepared to contest the motion the deponent was directed to attend.]

JOWETT v. IDLE LOCAL BOARD. (a.)

Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55)—Meaning of "street" in section 150—Interpretation clause (section 4)—Question of law.

The meaning of "street" in section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, includes any of the words set out in the interpretation clause (section 4) which are not inconsistent with the context or subject-matter of that section according to the method of construction laid down in The Mayor of Portsmouth v. Smith, 13 Q. B. D. 184, 32 W. R. Dig. 123, by the Court of Appeal; and such extended meaning, if so applicable, must be read into the word "street" throughout the section, without regard to the particular work to be done under it.

The question whether the place in dispute comes within the interpretation clause is one of law for the judge at the trial, and the question which may properly be left to the jury is whether the said place is "a street in the popular acceptation of the term" as left by Lindley, L.J., in The Mayor of Portsmouth v. Smith.

The judgment in Reg. v. Cleckheaton Local Board, 50 J. P. 598, is inconsistent with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in The Mayor of Portsmouth v. Smith.

Motion for entry of judgment for defendants.

The plaintiffs had brought an action for trespass against the defendant local board for entering upon certain private premises called "Union-yard," for paving the centre of the yard as a roadway. The local board maintained that the yard was a "street" within the meaning of section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Upon the trial before Manisty, J., "Union-yard" was shown to be a kind of irregular square, with a more or less continuous row of houses on one side having their back premises towards the yard; on the other side were some groups of cottages, and at the head of the yard were some mill works, the gates of which opened on to the yard. Those employed at the mill works passed in and out of Union-yard. The judge left the whole question whether Union-yard was a street within the Act to the jury, and the jury found that "under the exceptional surroundings the road in Union-yard did not come within the meaning of a street." The judge entered judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants now moved, on the ground that the judge ought not to have left to the jury the general question of whether this yard was a "street," but ought to have held that it was a question of law whether "street" here was within section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and that judgment ought to be on that ground entered for the defendants.

Forbes, Q.C., and Wilberforce, for the defendants.—It is a question of law in these cases whether, upon the facts as found, the place comes within the meaning of "street" in section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the meaning of "street" is defined by the interpretation clause (section 4) of the statute: The Mayor of Portsmouth v. Smith, 10 App. Cas. 361 (per Lord Blackburn, at p. 373, and Lord Watson, at p. 375), 13 Q. B. D. 184, 32 W. R. Dig. 123, 33 Ibid. 128; Maude v. Baildon Local Board, 10 Q. B. D. 394, 31 W. R. Dig. 114; Taylor v. Oldham Corporation, 25 W. R. 178, 4 Ch. D. 395; Robinson v. Barton Eccles Local Board, 32 W. R. 249, 8 App. Cas. 798.

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Longstaffe, for the plaintiffs.—Lord Selborne, in Robinson v. Barton Eccles Local Board, at p. 801, says: "An interpretation clause like this is not meant to prevent the word receiving its ordinary, popular, and natural sense whenever that would be properly applicable." The word "street" must be taken in relation to the context—i.e., in relation to the particular work to be done. A local board may not of their own choice make a paved road of what is only a trap or yard any more than they may make a roadway over a portion of a square. "Street" for such work must be strictly limited. For sanitary works, "street," it is admitted, might be taken in section 150 in its extended sense, as such works would be for the benefit of the whole square or yard: Reg. v. Cleckheaton Local Board, 50 J. P. 598; Reg. v. Fulford, 12 W. R. 715. It is a question of fact for the jury in each case in what sense the word "street" is to be used: Reg. v. Sheil, 50 L. T. 590, 32 W. R. Dig. 104.

STEPHEN, J.—We have come to the conclusion that under order 40 we have the power to enter judgment for the defendants on the ground that Manisty, J., ought to have decided the question of law himself and not to have left the whole question to the jury. The points to be decided are really few and very simple. The Portsmouth case, although dependent upon another statute, clearly decides that an interpretation clause like section 4 in the Public Health Act, 1875, is to be read into section 150 for present purposes. That case overrules Maude v. Baildon Local Board, and that being so I cannot see my way to reconcile the decision of the Divisional Court in Reg. v. Cleckheaton Local Board with the Portsmouth case as decided by the Court of Appeal and with the observations on it made in the House of Lords. With great respect, therefore, I cannot agree with the judges in that case. Their decision is in direct opposition to the Portsmouth case. Following this case we must hold that the interpretation clause must be read into section 150. This is not inconsistent with Lord Selborne's observations in Robinson v. Barton Eccles Local Board. On the contrary, I think he puts in other words the views I have expressed in the course of the argument. The interpretation clause substitutes the word "street" for any words mentioned in section 4 subject only to the limitation that such words are not inconsistent with the powers to be exercised under that section. As Lord Selborne says, "An interpretation clause of this kind is not meant to prevent the word receiving its ordinary, popular, and natural sense whenever that would be properly applicable; but to enable the word as used in the Act, when there is nothing in the context or subject-matter to the contrary, to be applied to some things to which it would not ordinarily be applicable. I look upon this portion of the interpretation clause as meaning neither more nor less than this, that the provision contained in the Act as to streets (whether new streets or old streets) shall, unless there be something to the contrary, be read as applicable to these different things." The first question is whether the extended sense of the word "street" (and we have nothing to do here with country lanes or any question of that sort), whether any of the words "highway, road, lane, footway, square, court, &c.," as given by the interpretation clause (section 4), accurately describe the place here in question. I am of opinion that one or other of those words do cover this place, Union-yard, provided that such word is not inconsistent with the consequences to ensue. Mr. Tindal Athinson admits, for instance, that the word "square" would apply to this yard. So would the word "court" and possibly the words "footway" or "passage." Any of these words are large enough to cover Union-yard. But Mr. Tindal Athinson says that any such extended meaning of the word "street" is only intended to apply to sanitary work, such as sewering. He would not dispute such a construction in such a case, but he says that it is not right to apply this extended meaning of "street" in a matter of mere road-making in this yard, because under the particular circumstances as alluded to by the jury such a meaning would be inconsistent with road-making done in this particular place. The effect of such a construction would be to split up section 150 in a way which the Legislature could not have intended it to be split up. It is alleged that otherwise local boards are given power to interfere in private matters for other than sanitary reasons and to charge the public for work which is only required for private interests. I feel bound to admit that under our reading of the section it may be the case that such boards might have the opportunity of acting with a view to private rather than public interests. That is a danger which the Legislature must be taken to have preferred to risk rather than the danger of the loss of proper sanitary arrangements. If that reading leaves open opportunities for jobbing the court cannot help that. The word "street" in section 150 can hardly be turned into what I may call a shifting use, and I cannot think that such would be a proper way to read the section. Judgment must therefore be entered for the defendants.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. We are bound by the Portsmouth case in the Court of Appeal to read into section 150 the definition of "street" as given by section 4 of the Public Health Act. It is true there may be some doubt whether, in the appeal before the House of Lords, it was decided that the definition clause ought to be read into this section. But no final decision was given in that House on that point, and the decision, therefore, of the Court of Appeal remains in this respect untouched. We must read into the section, then, the words "road, lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage, whether a thoroughfare or not." It seems that on the admitted facts the judge would have been justified in holding that Union-yard was certainly within one or other of those words, and I certainly think that some of them would cover this place in question—for instance, "footway," from the traffic shown of passengers up and down to the mill works. There certainly was considerable traffic of such sort, though the way had never been actually dedicated to the public. The jury were, however, not asked in the way that Lindley, L.J., asked the jury at the trial of the Portsmouth case, "Whether this place was a street or not in the popular sense of that word?" but whether it was a street generally so as to come within the meaning of the Public Health Act? Their answer was to the effect that it was not a street within the meaning of that Act. That was not a question for them, nor is there anything inconsistent with such a finding of the jury in our entering judgment for the defendants. I am of opinion that, as a matter of law, the judge himself at the trial ought to have entered such a judgment.

In the Oleckheaton case it is difficult to see how the judges came to the conclusion they did in view of the decision in the Portsmouth case. Smith, J., says that "a lane is not included in the word 'street' in the statutory sense of that word." There is some ambiguity in the report, but assuming it to be correct to the effect that section 150 only contemplates expenditure on streets in the ordinary sense of the word, such a decision is contrary to the decision of the Court of Appeal as laid down in the Portsmouth case.

MAYOR OF DARWEN v. LANCASHIRE JUSTICES. (a.)

Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 13—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 28—Blackburn and Over Darwen Tramways Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. ccxxv.), ss. 47, 50—Expenses of repair of roadway.

By a local Tramways Act it was provided that, in case steam power should be used on the tramway, the tramway company should repair the whole extent of that part of a main road over which their lines passed, but that the company might make such contracts and agreements for the repair of the road with the road authority of the borough as might be approved by the Board of Trade. It was also provided that no contract or agreement to be entered into under the Act should operate to lessen the liability of the company under section 28 of the Tramways Act, 1870. The road authority of the borough entered into a contract with the company, by which the expenses of maintenance and repair of the road were divided between them. In an action by the borough road authority against the county authority for contribution under section 13 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878,

Held, that the county authority were liable to pay out of the county rate one-half of the expenses incurred by the borough authority under the contract.

Special case.

1. The plaintiffs are the highway authority for the highway area of the borough of Over Darwen, in the county of Lancaster, and also the road authority within the meaning of the Tramways Act, 1870, and the Blackburn and Over Darwen Tramways Act, 1879.

2. The defendants are the county authority as defined by the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878.

4. The Bolton and Blackburn road passes through the said borough, and became on July 20, 1877, a main road within the meaning of section 13 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878.

5. By section 13 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, it is enacted that "For the purposes of this Act, and subject to its provisions, any road which has within the period between the 31st day of December, 1870, and the date of the passing of this Act ceased to be a turnpike road, and any road which, being at the time of the passing of this Act a turnpike road, may afterwards cease to be such, shall be deemed to be a main road, and one-half of the expenses incurred from and after the 29th day of September, 1878, by the highway authority in the maintenance of such road shall, as to every part thereof which is within the limits of any highway area, be paid to the highway authority of such area by the county authority of the county in which such road is situate out of the county rate on the certificate of the surveyor of the county authority," &c.

6. In 1880 a tramway was constructed upon the said road within the said borough by the Blackburn and Over Darwen Tramways Co. under the provisions of the Tramways Act, 1870, and the Blackburn and Over Darwen Tramways Act, 1879. The said tramway runs for a distance of 2 miles, 6 furlongs, 33 yards over the said road within the said borough. Steam power has always been used upon the said tramway.

7. By section 28 of the Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), it is enacted that "The promoters shall at their own expense at all times maintain and keep in good condition and repair, with such materials and in such manner as the road authority shall direct and to their satisfaction, so much of any road whereon any tramway belonging to them is laid as lies between the rails of the tramway (where two tramways are laid by the same promoters in any road at a distance of not more than four feet from each other), and the portion of the road between the tramways, and in every case so much of the road as extends eighteen inches beyond the rails of and on each side of any such tramway."

8. By section 47 of the Blackburn and Over Darwen Tramways Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. ccxxv.), it is enacted that "the company" (meaning the Blackburn and Over Darwen Tramways Co.) "shall maintain and keep in good and sufficient repair the entire width of any road (exclusive of the foot path or foot pavement) along or across which any of their tramways shall be laid to the reasonable satisfaction of the road authority, and in such manner and with such materials as such authority may direct; and if the company at any time fail or neglect so to do, the road authority may cause the necessary repairs to be done, and may in such case recover the reasonable cost of such repairs from the company in any court of competent jurisdiction. The expressions 'road' and 'road authority' shall have the same meanings as are defined by the Tramways Act, 1870. Provided that the provisions of this section shall only apply when steam power is used on the tramways. Provided also, that, notwithstanding anything in the section contained, the company may from time to time enter into and make such contracts or agreements with the road authority of either borough' (meaning the boroughs of Blackburn and Over Darwen) 'respectively for the repair and maintenance of such road as may be approved by the Board of Trade.'"

9. By section 50 of the same Act "Nothing in this Act or in any contract, agreement, or arrangement to be made under this Act shall operate to lessen the liability of the company under section 28 of the Tramways Act, 1870, with respect to the repair of any road whereon any tramway belonging to them is laid."

11. By an agreement, dated the 1st of May, 1880, and made between the plaintiffs of the one part and the Blackburn and Over Darwen Tramways Co., of the other part, it was agreed (inter alia) as follows:—Clause 1.—"That in lieu of maintaining in repair the entire width of the roadway along which the company's tramways may be laid, as provided by the 47th section of the Blackburn and Over Darwen Tramways Act, 1879, the company shall only be liable in respect of the repair of so much of the said roadway as lies between the rails of the said tramway, and 3ft. 6in. beyond or on the outer side of such rails, and where two tramways are laid in any road, also the space between the two tramways." By clause 2 of the said agreement the company were bound to lay down their authorized tramways with a 4ft. gauge and to pave with setts the width of the roadway in respect of the repairs to which the company were liable as aforesaid. By clause 3 it was provided that "After the company shall have effectually paved the said roadway in accordance with the provisions of the last preceding clause of this agreement, the corporation shall within their district thenceforth during the continuance of this agreement maintain and keep in repair the whole width of the said roadway with such materials and in such manner as the said corporation may determine, and the company shall from time to time, and as and when required by the said corporation, pay the said corporation a proportionate part of the expenses which may have been incurred by the said corporation in repairing the said roadway as aforesaid, such proportionate part of such expenses to be ascertained and determined by the borough surveyor."

12. The average width of the said roadway is 28ft. 6in., out of which the company, under the foregoing agreement, repair 11ft.

13. The said agreement was duly approved by the Board of Trade, and the said road for such distance as the said tramways extend over it within the said borough of Over Darwen has always been repaired and the expense thereof apportioned between the plaintiffs and the tramways company in accordance with the terms of the said agreement. No notice of such agreement having been made was given to the defendants by the plaintiffs or by the tramways company.

14. For the purposes of this case it is admitted that the said road has been and is satisfactorily maintained within the said borough, and that the said agreement of the 1st of May, 1880, is now a subsisting agreement.

15. The plaintiffs, as such highway authority as aforesaid, have for the year ending the 31st of March, 1886, expended in the maintenance of the main road upon which the tramways are laid £180 14s. 5d., and in respect of the maintenance of the rest of the said main road within the said borough £246 17s. 1d., making in all £427 11s. 6d.

16. The plaintiffs, as such highway authority as aforesaid, have, under section 13 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, demanded from the defendants as such county authority as aforessid £213 15s. 6d., being the half of the said sum. The defendants deny their liability to pay one-half or any other proportion of the said sum of £180 14s. 5d.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the defendants were liable in virtue of the above Acts or otherwise to pay out of the county rate the half or other proportion of such sum of £180 14s. 5d.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and W. H. Cross, for the plaintiffs.

Wills, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the plaintiffs. The question depends upon the provisions of the local Acts. Under the general Tramways Act the scheme was that the tramway company should keep in repair the part of the road occupied by the rails, and it was also provided that on the abandonment of the enterprize the company should restore the road to its original condition, and that the company might make agreements with the road authorities as to repairs and maintenance. There was no reference to the interference of the Board of Trade. The local Act is different. According to its provisions, where steam is used on the tramway the company is to bear the whole expense of maintaining the roadway, but bargains may be made with the road authority as to the repairs, provided that the approval of the Board of Trade be obtained. That addition looks as if something had been intended by the Legislature beyond the protection of the contracting parties. Indeed there would hardly seem to be any need for protecting this borough more than any other. Section 50 of the local Act provides that in case steam power is used a bargain may be made for the division of liability between the parties, provided that the liability of the company be not reduced below that specified in section 28 of the general Act. The defendants argue that section 50 of the local Act merely refers to the restitution of the road on the abandonment of the undertaking, and that the provisions as to agreements relate only to the method of discharging the liability of the company. But it seems to me to be a reasonable view that the Legislature thought fair in case steam power should be used on the tramway to lighten the burden of repair laid on the company by the Act in case the road authority should be willing to consent to an agreement to that effect.

Grantham, J.—I am of the same opinion, though I have not been able to understand the reason of the contract, for it seems to me to have been entered into without any consideration moving to the road authority. The company is allowed to use steam and yet to avoid the obligation to repair laid on them by the Act. But the defendants must pay half the expenses incurred by the road authority under the agreement. The Board of Trade has given its sanction to the arrangement, and the Highways and Locomotives Act is clear.

Amersham Union v. City of London Union. (a.)

Poor law—Settlement—"Widowed mother"—Child under sixteen—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.

A pauper under the age of sixteen, whose father was dead and whose mother had married again, having become chargeable to a parish in the respondent union, an order was made for her removal into the appellant union, in which was the birth settlement of the mother. Neither father nor mother had acquired any other settlement than that of their birth.

Held, that the pauper, at the time of adjudication, after her mother had married again, had no other settlement than that of her birth, which was in the respondent union, and that the order was wrong.

This was a special case stated under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11.

The facts set forth in the case were as follows:—

1. On the 9th of April, 1886, Blanche Edmonds, aged four years, an idiot, was admitted into the infirmary a Bow, in the county of Middlesex, and became chargeable to the respondent union.

2. On the 8th of January, 1887, an order was made by two of the justices for the City of London adjudging the pauper to be last legally settled in the parish of Chesham, in the appellant union, and this was the order appealed against.

5. Walter Edmonds, the father of the pauper, was born at Boxmoor, in the parish of Hemel Hempstead, and in the union of that name, in the parish of Hertford.

6. Sarah Ann Glenister, the mother of the pauper, was born at Lye Green, in the parish of Chesham, in the county of Buckingham, and in the appellant union.

7. The said Walter Edmonds and Sarah Ann Glenister were married at Chesham, in the appellant union, on or about the 14th day of November, 1875.

8. The pauper is the legitimate daughter of the said Walter Edmonds and Sarah Ann, his wife, and was born on the 19th day of July, 1881, in the parish of St. Mary, Islington, in the county of Middlesex.

9. Walter Edmonds, the pauper's father, died on or about the 7th of May, 1883, leaving his widow, Sarah Ann Edmonds, and the pauper and two other children him surviving. The said Walter Edmonds never acquired a settlement for himself, and had no other settlement than that of his birth.

10. On the 21st of January, 1884, Sarah Ann Edmonds, the pauper's mother, being then a widow, married again. During the interval between the death of her first husband and her marriage the said Sarah Ann Edmonds did not acquire any settlement for herself.

The appellants contended that the pauper derived a settlement from her father, which settlement she retained at the time she became chargeable, or if she did not retain her father's birth settlement that she was legally settled in the parish where she was born.

The respondents contended that the pauper took her mother's birth settlement on the death of her father, which she retained, although her mother had married again.

By the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35, it is enacted that, "No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another."

Graham and Ashton, for the appellant union.—The state of things at the time of the adjudication must be considered in determining this question. The mother had married again at that period, and the child had no "widowed mother," therefore this child took its birth settlement.

He referred to Reg. v. Bridgnorth, 31 W. R. 938, 11 Q. B. D. 320; Edmonton v. Islington, 15 Q. B. D. 95, 34 W. R. Dig. 135; Kingsbridge Union v. Stonehouse, 35 W. R. 580, 18 Q. B. R. 738, 13 Q. B. D. 293.

Poland, for the respondents.—At the father's death the child took the settlement of her widowed mother, and the only settlement she had was in the appellant union.

He referred to Croydon Union v. Reigate Union, 35 W. R. 824, 19 Q. B. D. 385.

Graham replied.

STEPHEN, J.—This case has been argued with much ingenuity. The section is, no doubt, very obscure, and it is difficult to attach any significance to the last portion of it. It is common ground to both sides in the present case that the time to which the statute refers is the time at which the child becomes chargeable and its settlement is to be determined. The result is that at that time the child has no settlement at all—that is to say, after the second marriage of the mother the child had no father, for he was dead, and no widowed mother, for she was married, and according to the Act the court cannot look at any derivative settlement. Then there is only the birth settlement remaining, which is the City of London. The argument of Mr. Poland turns on this, that, though the court ought to look at the status of the child at the time of adjudication, still it is necessary to consider what her settlement was at that time, and this settlement, he argued, must be the settlement of her widowed mother. But we ought not to suppose that the child took any settlement when her father died. She must be treated as though she took none till she became chargeable. Our judgment must be for the appellants.

A. L. SMITH, J.—The question is whether the child is to be restored to her birth settlement or whether she takes the birth settlement of her mother. It is settled that the way to construe this difficult section is to consider the time when the adjudication arises, and not other byegone matters. At the time of adjudication in this case the child's father was dead and her mother had married again. The sole settlements then possible were the derivative settlement of her mother, now married again, and the child's birth settlement.

Bankruptcy notice—Married woman not carrying on separate trade—Liability to bankruptcy laws—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 5—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g.).

A married woman who does not carry on a separate trade is not subject to the bankruptcy laws, and a bankruptcy notice under section 4, sub-section 1 (g.), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, cannot be served upon her.

Appeal from an order of the registrar of the county court at Kingston-on-Thames dismissing a bankruptcy notice served upon a married woman.

In August, 1886, Mrs. Gardiner accepted a bill of exchange for £60 payable three months after date. Default having been made, an action was, in November, 1886, commenced by the holder of the bill against the drawer and acceptor, which was defended by Mrs. Gardiner; but on April 19, 1887, a verdict was given for the plaintiff, and judgment was obtained against her in the ordinary form—viz., that the plaintiff recover the above sum against the defendant, but that execution be limited to her separate estate not subject to any restraint on anticipation (unless by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, such estate should be liable to execution notwithstanding such restraint).

In June, 1887, a bankruptcy notice under section 4, sub-section 1 (g.), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was issued against Mrs. Gardiner, who thereupon filed an affidavit to the effect that she was married to her present husband on October 7, 1879, and that she did not carry on any separate trade or business.

The county court registrar dismissed the bankruptcy notice, with costs, and the judgment creditor now appealed.

Winslow, Q.C., and Pyke, for the appellant.—The petition which follows a bankruptcy notice is not a petition in bankruptcy, it is a petition for a receiving order, and a receiver is appointed. It is quite clear that in an action we could have a receiver, and why may there not be a general receiver appointed by this means? It is not necessary to push the case so far as to consider whether it is possible to make this woman a bankrupt or not; but there is really nothing in either the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, or in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to prevent a married woman being made a bankrupt qud her separate estate.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They referred to Scott v. Morley, ante, p. 67; Ex parte Jones, In re Grissell, 28 W. R. 287, 12 Ch. D. 484.

Herbert Reed, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Cave, J.—It is clear on two grounds that this proceeding is entirely wrong. Previous to 1882 it was held, in the case of Ex parte Jones, In re Grissell, that a married woman was not liable to the bankruptcy law, even though she had separate estate and had contracted engagements after her marriage. It had also been held that, under the custom of London, a married woman who traded on her sole account could be adjudicated bankrupt. When the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was passed, it was enacted by section 1, sub-section (5), that "every married woman carrying on a trade separately from her husband shall, in respect of her separate property, be subject to the bankruptcy laws in the same way as if she were a feme sole." That was intended to extend the custom of London to the realm generally, and confined the power of making bankrupt to a married woman who is carrying on a separate trade. The result is, that a married woman who does not carry on a separate trade is not subject to the bankruptcy laws. That is a conclusive answer to the present proceedings; but there is a further one. It has been held by the Court of Appeal that section 4, sub-section 1 (g.), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, must be construed with strictness, and the words of that section are, "If a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount," &c. Now I am clearly of opinion that this was not a final judgment against Mrs. Gardiner. There was no personal liability on Mrs. Gardiner, and the creditor has obtained judgment, not against her, but against her estate. The point was well put by Bowen, L.J., in the recent case of Scott v. Morley. But if there was any doubt on this subject it is cleared up by what follows. The person served, is required "to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment, or to secure or compound for it," &c. Now there was no personal obligation on the debtor to pay the debt. There was no debt due from her which could be enforced under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and there was no liability to secure or compound for it. On either of the grounds stated the decision of the registrar could be upheld.

A. L. Smith, J., concurred.

Bankruptcy—Special case—Preferential claim for local rate—Liability of bankrupt's estate—Public Health Act, 1875, s. 211, sub-section (3)—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 40, sub-section 1 (a).

On the 12th of January, 1887, at the time of filing his petition, the bankrupt was tenant of a house under a lease for twenty-one years. The trustee in the bankruptcy did not disclaim, but on the 1st of February, 1887, he sold his interest in the lease, the bankrupt remaining in occupation as tenant under the purchaser. There was due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order a local board rate made on the 8th of October, 1886, for the half-year from the 30th of September, 1886, to the 25th of March, 1887, and payable in advance.

Held, that the estate of the bankrupt was liable to pay the rate for the whole half-year.

Special case stated by his Honour Judge Williams from the county court of Glamorganshire for the opinion of the High Court.

On January 12, 1887, the bankrupt filed his petition in the county court of Glamorganshire, and on January 17 he was adjudicated bankrupt. On the same day an order for the summary administration of his estate was made under section 121 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and the official receiver became trustee.

At the time of the petition the bankrupt was tenant of a house and shop at Ystrad Rhondda which he held under a lease for twenty-one years from April 14, 1882, granted by Richard Evans at a yearly rent of £32. The trustee did not disclaim the lease, but on February 1, 1887, he sold his interest in it to a brother of the bankrupt, since which date the bankrupt, with his wife, had remained in occupation as tenant under the purchaser, a business being carried on in the wife's name.

At the date of the receiving order there was due to the Ystradfodwg Local Board the amount of 13s. 1d. for their local board rate made on October 8, 1886, for the half-year from September 30, 1886, to March 25, 1887, and payable in advance. The bankrupt, it was alleged, having gone out of occupation before paying the rate, the trustee contended—(1) that he was not liable to pay under section 40, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, in respect of the bankrupt's occupation more than the bankrupt would have been liable to pay; and (2) that having succeeded the bankrupt he (the trustee) was liable for a further amount proportioned to the period of his own occupation which ceased on February 1, 1887. The trustee offered to pay the proportion of the rate from September 30, 1886, to February 1, 1887, but the local board refused this, and contended that they were entitled to payment of the whole rate.

The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether, in the above circumstances, the estate of the bankrupt was liable to pay this rate for the whole half-year—viz., from September 30th, 1886, to March 25, 1887—or whether the estate was only liable to pay an apportioned part of it up to the date of the order of adjudication.

R. V. Williams, for the local board.—The section to be looked to is section 40, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provides that in the distribution of the property of a bankrupt all parochial or other local rates due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order shall be paid in priority to all other debts. This rate was due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order. The rate was payable in advance on October 8. Up to the date of the receiving order in January the bankrupt, as occupier, was liable to the payment of the whole of the rate in advance, and if he had paid it he could not, under any circumstances, have got it back. The contention on the other side seems to be that, although the bankrupt was liable at the date of the receiving order, because at a subsequent date the trustee parted with the property, there is something to relieve the estate from payment of the rate.

Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee.—The material section which governs the matter is section 211, sub-section (3), of the Public Health Act, 1875. Section 211 deals with the assessment of a general district rate, and, by sub-section (3), if any owner or occupier assessed or liable to any such rate ceases to be owner or occupier of the premises before the end of the period for which such rate was made, and before the same is fully paid off, he shall be liable to pay only such part of the rate as may be in proportion to the time during which he continues to be such owner or occupier. Here the bankrupt occupied up to January 17, on which day a receiving order was made against him, and adjudication took place; and on February 1 the brother bought the estate and became in law liable to be rated. [CAVE, J.—The bankrupt was the occupier all along.] There must have been a change of occupation. At any rate there must be held to have been a break in the occupation.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that the estate of the bankrupt is liable to pay the rate for the whole half-year. Section 40, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankrutpcy Act, 1883, provides that in the distribution of the property of a bankrupt there shall be paid in priority to all other debts all parochial or other local rates due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order. This was a local rate due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order, and the case is clearly within the section unless there is anything to take it out. By section 211, sub-section 3, of the Public Health Act, 1875, if any owner or occupier assessed or liable to any such rate ceases to be owner or occupier of the premises before the end of the period for which such rate was made, and before the same is fully paid off, he shall be liable to pay only such part of the rate as may be in proportion to the time during which he continues to be such owner or occupier. Unfortunately this bankrupt has not ceased to be the occupier of the premises. He was occupier at the date of the receiving order, and he occupied during the whole period over which the rate extends. The case cannot be brought within section 211, sub-section (3), of the Public Health Act, 1875, and, that being so, it is within section 40, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The proper course for the trustee was to have had this question of the liability to the rate taken into consideration on the sale of the property to the bankrupt's brother. I must answer the question that the estate of the bankrupt is liable to pay the whole half-year.

Bankruptcy—Deed of assignment—Payment of solicitors' costs by trustee under deed—Receiving order—Application to repay—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 4, sub-section 1 (a).

On the 20th of August, 1885, in pursuance of a resolution passed at a meeting of creditors, the debtor executed a deed of assignment vesting the estate in a trustee for their benefit. On the 28th of October, 1885, a petition was presented against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy alleged being the execution of the deed; and on the 31st of October the trustee under the deed paid out of moneys collected by him from the assets the sum of £20 7s. 8d. to a firm of solicitors, being the amount of their bill of costs incurred in connection with the meeting of creditors, and collecting certain book debts, and in preparing the deed of assignment. On the 20th of January, 1886, a receiving order was made against the debtor, and subsequently the trustee under the deed sent to the official receiver a cheque for the balance in his hands after deducting the amount paid to the solicitors, together with an account of receipts and payments in connection with the estate.

Held, that the trustee under the deed must refund the money so paid to the solicitors.

Motion on behalf of the trustee in the bankruptcy of Alfred Forster for an order that G. R. Forster should pay over the sum of £20 7s. 8d., the balance derived from the realization of certain property which came into his hands as trustee under a deed of assignment executed by the bankrupt, and paid by him as costs to Messrs. Scoles & Co., solicitors.

In August, 1885, the bankrupt, being in difficulties, consulted Messrs. Scoles & Co., and a private meeting of the creditors was called. At this meeting a resolution was passed that the debtor should execute a deed of assignment vesting the estate in G. R. Forster for the benefit of the creditors, and on August 20, 1885, the deed was executed. On October 28, 1885, a petition was presented against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy alleged being the execution of the deed of assignment. G. R. Forster had collected sums amounting to £125 19s. 6d. from the assets, which included book debts, and on October 31 he paid to Messrs. Scoles & Co. £20 7s. 8d., being the amount of their bill of costs incurred in connection with the meeting of creditors, and collecting certain book debts, and also in preparing the deed of assignment.

On January 20, 1886, a receiving order was made against the bankrupt, and subsequently G. R. Forster sent to the official receiver a cheque for £105 11s. 10d., the balance in his hands after deducting the amount paid to Messrs. Scoles & Co. with a detailed account of receipts and payments in connection with the estate.

On March 3, 1886, a trustee was appointed in the bankruptcy, and application was now made by him for the recovery of the £20 7s. 8d. so paid to the solicitors.

F. C. Willis, for the trustee in bankruptcy.—The deed of August, 1885, was an act of bankruptcy. If a petition is presented within three months of such a deed all the property which the trustee under the deed may have taken forms the property of the estate, and if he pays it away he must recoup the estate.

Sidney Woolf, for the trustee under the deed.—The trustee in bankruptcy must treat the trustee under such a deed either as his agent and adopt his acts, or he must treat him as a trespasser. He cannot blow hot and cold.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The official receiver accepted the proceeds of the realization of the estate after the costs had been paid of collecting debts, &c. They have adopted our act and now wish to treat us as trespassers. [Cave, J.—Most of these expenses were incurred in doing that which was absolutely useless.] So far as the work was done in realising the estate and collecting the debts it would not be useless. The official receiver has not treated our acts under the deed as void. The deed must be wholly set aside or not.

He referred to Ex parte Vaughan, In re Riddeough, 33 W. R. 151, 14 Q. B. D. 25; Smith v. Baker, L. R. 8 C. P. 350, 21 W. R. Dig. 260; Roe v. Mutual Loan Fund Association (Limited), 35 W. R. 723, 19 Q. B. D. 347.

Cave, J.—This money must be repaid. The objection to the application is quite an idle one. The trustee under the deed ought not to have taken any of the money until it was found that the deed would be valid. There appears, however, to be a sum of about £2 incurred with reference to the collection of book debts which the trustee in the bankruptcy is willing to allow. There will, therefore, be an order for payment of £18 7s. 8d. and costs.

Motion allowed, with costs.

A power given to a limited company by its articles of association to purchase its own shares is void.

Per Lord Macnaghten.—Such a power given by the memorandum would be void also.

The memorandum of association of a limited company, incorporated under the Companies Acts, stated that the objects of the company were the acquiring of certain manufacturing businesses, and the undertaking and carrying on of the businesses so acquired, and any other business and transaction which the company might consider to be in any way auxiliary thereto. The articles empowered the company to purchase its own shares. On the company being wound up, a shareholder claimed the balance of the price of shares, sold by him to the company before the winding up and not wholly paid for.

Held, that the company was not entitled by its memorandum of association to purchase its own shares; that the purchase, therefore, was ultrà vires, and that the claim must fail.

Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., 29 W. R. 768, 17 Ch. D. 76, disapproved.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ.) reversing a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment delivered by Lord Herschell.

James Schofield & Sons (Limited) was incorporated under the Companies Acts, with a memorandum of association which stated the objects of the company to be the acquiring and carrying on of the business of certain flannel manufacturers, and any other businesses and transactions which the company might consider to be in any way conducive or auxiliary thereto, or proper to be carried on in connection therewith. The memorandum did not authorize the purchase by the company of its own shares.

Article 179 of the articles of association provided that "Any share may be purchased by the company from any person willing to sell it, and at such price, not exceeding the then marketable value thereof, as the board think reasonable."

Article 181: "Shares so purchased may, at the discretion of the board, be sold or disposed of by them, or be absolutely extinguished, as they deem most advantageous to the company."

The company having gone into liquidation, a claim was made by the executors of Whitworth, a deceased shareholder, for the balance of the price of shares sold by the executors to the company and not wholly paid for. A summons was taken out by the liquidators to determine whether the claim should be paid. The Vice-Chancellor decided against the claim.

The only question dealt with by their lordships was whether it was ultrà vires of the company to purchase its own shares.

March 18, 21, 22, 24.—Rigby, Q.C. (O. Leigh Clare with him), for the appellants, the liquidators.—The articles relied on extend the objects set out in the memorandum, and are therefore invalid: Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche, 24 W. R. 794, L. R. 7 H. L. 653; Cree v. Somervail, 28 W. R. 34, 4 App. Cas. 648. In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., 29 W. R. 768, 17 Ch. D. 76, is the only case at all against the appellants. Further, such a purchase amounts to a reduction of capital, and must be invalid in any case: Hope v. International Financial Society, 25 W. R. 67, 203, 4 Ch. D. 327. All the other cases are distinguishable: In re Balgooley Distillery Co., 17 L. R. Ir. 239, 34 W. R. Dig. 36; Guinness v. Land Corporation of Ireland, 31 W. R. 341, 22 Ch. Romer, Q.C., and A. C. Maberly, for the respondents.—The articles must be held good unless clearly bad. In this case the purchases authorized by the articles are also covered by the memorandum as conducive to the other objects of the company. If the intention of the purchase were to reduce capital or to deal in the shares the purchase would be illegal, but in any other case it is legal, and is in the same category as a forfeiture or surrender. The Dronfield case is in the respondent's favour.

They also cited Marshall v. Glamorgan Iron and Coal Co., 17 W. R. 435, L. R. 7 Eq. 129; Phosphate of Lime Co. v. Green, L. R. 7 C. P. 43, 20 W. R. Dig. 16; Taylor v. Pilsen Joel and General Electric Light Co., 33 W. R. 134, 27 Ch. D. 268.

Rigby, Q.C., replied.

July 11.—Lord Herschell.—Three questions are raised by this appeal—(1) Whether certain shares in James Schofield & Sons (Limited) were purchased by G. W. Schofield on his own account, or as agent for the company. (2) Whether, assuming that they were purchased for the company, and that the company had power to buy its own shares, the purchase took place in accordance with the articles of association. (3) Whether the company had power to purchase the shares.

James Schofield & Sons (Limited) was incorporated under the Companies Acts on the 31st of May, 1865, with a capital of £150,000 in 15,000 shares of £10 each. At an extraordinary general meeting of shareholders of the company, on the 6th of May, 1884, it was resolved that the company should be wound up voluntarily; and on the 15th of May following it was ordered by the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine that the voluntary winding up should be continued under the supervision of the court.

By an affidavit filed on the 1st of October, 1884, the respondents claimed from the company in the winding-up £2,873 12s. A summons was taken out by the appellants for the purpose of determining whether this claim ought to be allowed. Upon the hearing of this summons the claim was rejected by the Vice-Chancellor, but upon appeal, this decision was reversed.

On the 1st of May, 1880, G. W. Schofield bought from the respondents, who were the executors of Robert Whitworth, a deceased shareholder, 533 shares in the company (28 fully paid up, 500 with £6 paid, and five with £5 paid), for the price of £3,305, the purchase-money to be paid within three years then next, and interest at five per cent. to be paid until completion. Interest was accordingly paid in the meantime, and on the 3rd of May, 1883, a transfer of the shares was executed by the vendors and G. W. Schofield.

On the 5th of May a receipt was given to G. W. Schofield for the sum of £3,305 for shares bought. But £505 only having been in fact paid, a promissory note was on the same day given to the respondents for £2,800, "deposited on loan at five per cent. per annum interest from date." This was signed "for J. Schofield & Sons (Limited); G. W. Schofield, Director."

The first question is, Whether this transaction was entered into by G. W. Schofield on his own account, or as agent for the company. If the former, it is clear that Schofield was guilty of a gross fraud. Upon a review of the evidence I see no ground for coming to such a conclusion. I think the purchase of the shares was in fact made by him on behalf of the company.

The question whether, assuming the company had power to purchase its own shares, this purchase was effected in accordance with the articles of the company, is one of much greater difficuty. The article empowering the company to purchase its shares is as follows:—"Article 179. Any share may be purchased by the company from any person willing to sell it, at such price, not exceeding the then marketable value thereof, as the board think reasonable." Now there is not the slightest evidence that the directors ever considered, either at a formal meeting of the board or otherwise, the question whether these shares should be purchased. The utmost that can be said to be established is that the directors other than G. W. Schofield, who negotiated the purchase, knew that the respondents had come to see him upon the subject. But, further, the only authority to buy was at such price not exceeding the then market value as the board should think reasonable. The par value of the shares was apparently given in this case, as in the case of the other purchases, as a matter of course, and I see no reason to believe that any judgment was exercised upon the point by the board.

But although I think it far from clear that, even if it was competent for the company to purchase the shares, this transaction can be supported, I do not intend to pronounce an opinion upon this point, because, in consequence of the view which I believe all your lordships entertain upon another part of the case, it is unnecessary to do so.

I pass now to the main question in this case, which is one of great and general importance, whether the company had power to purchase the shares. The result of the judgment in the court below was certainly somewhat startling. The creditors of the company which is being wound up, who have a right to look to the paid-up capital as the fund out of which their debts are to be discharged, find coming into competition with them persons who, in respect only of their having been, and having ceased to be, shareholders in the company, claim that the company shall pay to them a part of that capital. The memorandum of association, it is admitted, does not authorize the purchase by the company of its own shares. It states as the objects for which the company is established the acquiring certain manufacturing businesses, and the undertaking and carrying on the businesses so acquired, and any other business and transaction which the company consider to be in any way auxiliary thereto, or proper to be carried on in connection therewith.

It cannot be questioned, since the case of the Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche, that a company cannot employ its funds for the purpose of any transactions which do not come within the objects specified in the memorandum, and that a company cannot by its articles of association extend its power in this respect. These propositions are not and could not be impeached in the judgment of the Court of Appeal; but it is said to be settled by authority that, although a company could not, under such a memorandum as the present, by articles authorize a trafficking in its own shares; it might authorize the board to buy its shares "whenever they thought it desirable for the purposes of the company," or "in cases where it was incidental to the legitimate objects of the company that it should do so"—the former is Cotton, L.J.'s expression, the latter that of Bowen, L.J.

I will first consider the question apart from authority, and then examine the decisions relied on.

The Companies Act, 1862, requires (section 8) that in the case of a company where the liability of the shareholders is limited, the memorandum shall contain the amount of the capital with which the company proposes to be registered divided into shares of a certain fixed amount; and provides (section 12) that such a company may increase its capital and divide it into shares of larger amount than the existing shares, or convert its paid-up shares into stock; but that, "save as aforesaid, no alteration shall be made by any company in the conditions contained in its memorandum of association."

What is the meaning of the distinction thus drawn between a company without limit on the liability of its members and a company where the liability is limited, but, in the latter case, to assure to those dealing with the company that the whole of the subscribed capital—unless diminished by expenditure upon the objects defined by the memorandum—shall remain available for the discharge of its liabilities? The capital may, no doubt, be diminished by expenditure upon and reasonably incidental to all the objects specified. A part of it may be lost in carrying on the business operations authorized. Of this all persons trusting the company are aware, and take the risk. But I think they have a right to rely—and were intended by the Legislature to have a right to rely—on the capital remaining undiminished by any expenditure outside these limits, or by the return of any part of it to the shareholders.

Experience appears to have shown that circumstances might occur in which a reduction of the capital would be expedient. Accordingly by the Act of 1867 provision was made enabling a company under strictly defined conditions to reduce its capital. Nothing can be stronger than these carefully-worded provisions to show how inconsistent with the very constitution of a joint-stock company with limited liability the right to reduce its capital was considered to be.

Let me now invite your lordships' attention to the facts of the present case. The company had purchased prior to the date of the liquidation no less than 4,142 of its own shares — that is to say, considerably more than a fourth of the paid-up capital of the company had been either paid, or contracted to be paid, to shareholders in consideration only of their ceasing to be so. I am quite unable to see how this expenditure was incurred in respect of or as incidental to any of the objects specified in the memorandum. And, if not, I have a difficulty in seeing how it can be justified. If the claim under consideration can be supported, the result would seem to be this—that the whole of the shareholders, with the exception of those holding seven individual shares, might now be claiming payment of the sums paid upon their shares as against the creditors, who had a right to look to the moneys subscribed as the source out of which the company's liabilities to them were to be met. And the stringent precautions to prevent the reduction of the capital of a limited company without due notice and judicial sanction would be idle if the company might purchase its own shares wholesale and so effect the desired result. I do not think it was disputed that a company could not enter upon such a transaction for the purpose of reducing its capital, but it was suggested that it might do so if that were not the object, but it was considered for some other reason desirable, in the interest of the company, to do so. To the creditor, whose interests I think sections 8 and 12 of the Companies Act, 1862, were intended to protect, it makes no difference what the object of the purchase is. The result to him is the same. The shareholders receive back the moneys subscribed, and there passes into their pockets what before existed in the form of cash in the coffers of the company, or of buildings, machinery, or stock available to meet the demands of the creditors.

What was the reason which induced the company in the present case to purchase its shares? If it was that they might sell them again, this would be a trafficking in the shares, and clearly unauthorized. If it was to retain them, this would be to my mind an indirect method of reducing the capital of the company. The only suggestion of another motive (and it seems to me to be a suggestion unsupported by proof) is that this was intended to be a family company, and that the directors wanted to keep the shares as much as possible in the hands of those who were partners, or who were interested, in the old firm, or of those persons whom the directors thought they would like to be amongst this small number of shareholders. I cannot think that the employment of the company's money in the purchase of shares for any such purpose was legitimate. The business of the company was that of manufacturers of flannel. In what sense was the expenditure of the company's money in this way incidental to the carrying on of such a business, or how could it secure the end of enabling the business to be more profitably or satisfactorily carried on? I can quite understand that the directors of a company may sometimes desire that the shareholders should not be numerous, and that they should be persons likely to leave them with a free hand to carry on their operations. But I think it would be most dangerous to countenance the view that for reasons such as these they could legitimately expend the moneys of the company to any extent they pleased in the purchase of its shares. No doubt if certain shareholders are disposed to hamper the proceedings of the company, and are willing to sell their shares, they may be bought out; but this must be done by persons, existing shareholders or others, who can be induced to purchase the shares, and not out of the funds of the company.

It is urged that the views I have expressed are inconsistent with the forfeiture and surrender of shares in a company. I do not think so. The forfeiture of shares is distinctly recognized by the Companies Act, and by the articles contained in the schedule, which, in the absence of other provisions, regulate the management of a limited liability company. It does not involve any payment by the company, and it presumably exonerates from future liability those who have shown themselves unable to contribute what is due from them to the capital of the company. Surrender no doubt stands on a different footing. But it also does not involve any payment out of the funds of the company. If the surrender were made in consideration of any such payment, it would be neither more nor less than a sale, and open to the same objections. If it were accepted in a case when the company were in a position to forfeit the shares, the transaction would seem to me perfectly valid. There may be other cases in which a surrender would be legitimate. As to these I would repeat what was said by the late Master of the Rolls in the Dronfield case: "It is not for me to say what the limits of surrender are which are allowable under the Act, because each case as it arises must be decided upon its own merits."

I turn now to the authorities. In Teasdale's case James, L.J., said: "There is no doubt that a company may give itself power to purchase its own shares, to take surrenders of shares, and to cancel the certificates of shares." But in the subsequent case of Hope v. The International Financial Society that learned judge said: "I am reported to have said in Teasdale's case that the power to purchase shares would be good. I am not quite sure whether that was not too wide a deduction from the cases to which I was then referring, and certainly it was not necessary for the decision of the case. But, however that may be, when the company deals with an individual shareholder, and does what appears to be right under the circumstances—viz., to accept a surrender from the shareholder who cannot pay, and to release him from further liability—that might be good, although incidentally and to a small extent it may be said to diminish the capital." In the case which gave rise to these observations a company, having 150,000 shares issued, passed a special resolution that the directors should have power to apply the company's assets to purchase from shareholders willing to sell any number of shares not exceeding 100,000, and that such shares should not be re-issued by the directors without the authority of a general meeting. The Court of Appeal, affirming Bacon, V.C., held that this scheme was invalid. James, L.J., said: "Either this is a purchase of shares in the sense of trafficking in shares—which is a purchase not authorized by the memorandum of association—or it is an extinguishment of the shares, and therefore a reduction of the capital of the company." And the present Master of the Rolls made the following observations: "I agree with the Lord Justice that the dilemma is made perfect; for if you assume that there was to be a re-issue of these shares the shares are not cancelled; they are existing shares, and the only way of getting rid of them again is to sell them. It is said that a selling of shares is not of itself a trafficking in shares. Well, that may be quite true. If I make a present of a horse, I cannot be said to be dealing in horses; but I apprehend, if I buy a horse for the purpose of selling it again, I do deal in a horse. So, then, if you take that to be the reasonable meaning of the resolution, then the resolution is this—that the company are to buy the shares for the purpose of re-issuing them, that is, for the purpose of selling them again. They do not say so in terms, but that is the necessary effect of what they intend to do by the resolution. That seems to be a trafficking in shares and a carrying on of the business which is not within the terms of the memorandum of association. It is true that there may not be a continuing business, but no more was that which was done in the case of The Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche. That was only to be one transaction; but because the transaction was a business transaction not contemplated or mentioned in the memorandum of association, it was not allowed. If that, therefore, was the intention of this resolution, then it broke the rules by enabling or forcing the company to enter upon a business which is not mentioned in the memorandum of association. But if it was not intended to re-issue these shares, then it seems to me to follow that the amount of capital represented by them was necessarily extinguished."

It appears to me that every word which I have just quoted from the judgment of the Master of the Rolls is strictly applicable to the circumstances of the present case. Again, in the case of Guinness v. Land Corporation of Ireland, Cotton, L.J., after referring to section 38 of the Companies Act, 1862, said: "From that it follows that whatever has been paid by a member cannot be returned to him. In my opinion it also follows that what is described in the memorandum as the capital cannot be diverted from the objects of the society. It is, of course, liable to be spent or lost in carrying on the business of the company, but no part of it can be returned to a member so as to take away from the fund to which the creditors have a right to look as that out of which they are to be paid."

The learned judges of the Court of Appeal in the present case did not purport to depart from the views thus expressed, but their judgments were based upon the decision of that court in the case of In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. In that case, disputes having arisen as to the conduct of the business, the directors agreed with Ward, one of the largest shareholders, to purchase his shares and also his interest as landlord in the mines worked by the company. This arrangement was confirmed by an extraordinary general meeting of the company, and was carried into effect in March, 1872. The business of the company was very prosperous for several years, but in 1879 it was ordered to be wound up; and the question then arose whether Ward was liable to be placed on the list of contributories. The late Master of the Rolls held that he was, on the ground that the company had no power to purchase the shares, but this decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. Upon the question whether the company had the power contended for, I agree with the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls rather than that of the Court of Appeal. But I am not prepared to say that the judgment of the Court of Appeal refusing to make Ward a contributory was erroneous, looking at the circumstances which intervened subsequent to the purchase and prior to the winding up. It is not necessary, however, to detain your lordships by a consideration of this question, as it can have no application to the present case. The transaction here is inchoate, and the court is asked to compel its completion. This, I think, for the reasons I have given, they would not be justified in doing.

I ought to notice one other case, as it was much relied on by the learned counsel for the respondents. I refer to Phosphate of Lime Co. v. Green. In that case the learned judges appear to have considered that the transaction amounted to a purchase of shares in the company which was prohibited by its articles of association; but they held that it had been ratified by the shareholders. No question was raised in argument or determined as to the powers conferred by the memorandum of association, and it is to be observed that at that time it was not so clearly settled as it has been since the judgment in The Ashbury Co. v. Riche, that a transaction not within the scope of the memorandum is incapable of ratification.

I move your lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor restored, and that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House; and do repay to the appellants any costs received from them.

Lord Watson.—These points were discussed in the argument upon this appeal: Was the purchase of 533 shares of "James Schofield & Sons (Limited)" from the respondents in May, 1880, made by G. W. Schofield for behoof of the company with the sanction of its directors? If so, was the transaction ultrà vires of the company? The order appealed from cannot stand if either of these questions be answered in the negative.

I think it is established by the evidence that both parties to the agreement of May, 1880, understood and acted upon the footing that the purchase was made by G. W. Schofield for the company, and that G. W. Schofield, after the shares were transferred to him in May, 1883, held, or at least intended to hold, them as trustee for the company. I doubt whether it is also proved that the purchase was submitted to, and considered and approved by, the board of direction, in terms of the articles of association; but I do not think it necessary to determine that point, because I am of opinion that, assuming the transaction to have been duly completed in accordance with the articles, it was nevertheless ultrà vires of the company.

In order to appreciate the real character of the transaction, it is necessary to advert to the position of the concern and its course of dealing in the purchase of its own shares. The company was registered, with limited liability, in the year 1865, for the purpose of carrying on the business of manufacturing flannel goods, and it continued to trade from that time until April, 1884, when it went into liquidation. Its nominal capital was £150,000 in 15,000 shares of £10 each. None of its shares were sold in the market after July, 1875, and no dividend was paid after the year ending the 31st of December, 1877; but at the date of the liquidation the company had acquired by purchase and then owned 4,142 of its own shares, of which 3,609 were entered in the register in the name of "James Schofield & Sons,"—a firm which had no existence—and the remainder (the 553 shares in question) in the name of G. W. Schofield. All of these shares had been bought by the company at par, or, in other words, not at market value, but for the amount which had been paid upon them by previous holders; and 1,389 shares were purchased on these terms between May, 1880, and the date of the liquidation.

In the case of the 533 shares the price was made payable three years after the date of the agreement of sale, in exchange for a transfer, the purchaser meantime paying interest at five per cent., and undertaking to indemnify the sellers from further calls. Interest was regularly paid from the funds of the company, and the transaction was closed in May, 1884, by a transfer of the shares to G. W. Schofield, the sellers giving a receipt for the full price (£3,305) on receiving payment of £505 in cash and being credited in the books of the company with £2,800, the amount of the unpaid balance, as a loan to the company. That is the sum which the respondents claim in the liquidation, and for which the Court of Appeal has held that they are entitled to rank in competition with the creditors of the company.

The articles of association of "James Schofield & Sons (Limited)" give the directors very extensive power to purchase its own shares for the company; and it is provided (Article 181) that "shares so purchased may, at the discretion of the board, be sold or disposed of by them, or be absolutely extinguished, as they deem most advantageous for the company." These powers are of course unavailing in so far as they may include purchases which are either beyond the scope of the memorandum of association, or contrary to the provisions of the Companies Acts. But I assent to the respondents' argument that they must be construed ut magis valeant quam pereant, and must be held to authorize all purchases of the company's shares effected on its behalf by the directors which can be shown to have been legitimate and within the objects specified in the memorandum.

In the case of a company limited by shares, the Act of 1862 requires that the amount of its capital and the shares into which it is divided shall be set forth in the memorandum of association; and section 12, which prescribes the extent to which the conditions contained in the memorandum may be modified, empowers the company to increase but not to diminish its capital. That limitation has been so far relaxed by the Act of 1867 as to permit a company to reduce its capital with the sanction of the court, after due notice to creditors, upon such terms as the court may think fit to impose. The Act of 1877—upon the preamble that doubts had been entertained whether the power of reduction given by the preceding Act extended to paid-up capital—enacts (section 3) that the word "capital," as used in that Act, shall include paid-up capital. That declaration clearly expresses the will of the Legislature that neither the paid-up nor the nominal capital of the company shall be reduced otherwise than in the manner permitted by the statutes.

One of the main objects contemplated by the Legislature in restricting the power of limited companies to reduce the amount of their capital as set forth in the memorandum, is to protect the interests of the outside public who may become their creditors. In my opinion the effect of these statutory restrictions is to prohibit every transaction between a company and a shareholder, by means of which the money already paid to the company in respect to his shares is returned to him, unless the court has sanctioned the transaction. Paid-up capital may be diminished or lost in the course of the company's trading; that is a result which no legislation can prevent, but persons who deal with and give credit to a limited company naturally rely upon the fact that the company is trading with a certain amount of capital already paid, as well as upon the responsibility of its members for the capital remaining at call; and they are entitled to assume that no part of the capital which has been paid into the coffers of the company has been subsequently paid out, except in the legitimate course of its business.

When a share is forfeited or surrendered, the amount which has been paid upon it remains with the company, the shareholder being relieved of liability for future calls, whilst the share itself reverts to the company, bears no dividend, and may be re-issued. When shares are purchased at par and transferred to the company, the result is very different. The amount paid up on the shares is returned to the shareholder, and in the event of the company continuing to hold the shares (as in the present case), is permanently withdrawn from its trading capital. It appears to me that, as Jessel, M.R., pointed out in In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., it is inconsistent with the essential nature of a company that it should become a member of itself. It cannot be registered as a shareholder to the effect of becoming debtor to itself for calls, or of being placed on the list of contributories in its own liquidation. Accordingly, when a company buys and holds its own shares, the device is sometimes resorted to of taking the transfer to a nominee who is entered in the register, and holds the shares as trustee for the company, which undertakes to indemnify him from future calls. In that case, if the company goes into liquidation before its capital is fully paid up, the trustee is liable personally as a contributory for the amount then unpaid; but the amount withdrawn is never restored, and calls made upon the shares whilst the company is a going concern bring no addition to its capital. In Teasdale's case, which was frequently referred to in the argument before us, James, L.J., is reported to have said: "There is no doubt that a company may give itself power to purchase its own shares, to take surrenders of shares, and to cancel the certificates of shares." There was no question of purchase in that case, which related to a surrender of original shares in exchange for new shares, by means of which the nominal capital of the company was largely increased, whilst the paid-up capital remained intact. The learned Lord Justice took occasion to modify the opinion thus attributed to him in the subsequent case of Hope v. The International Financial Society. In that case the purchase of its own shares was not one of the specified objects of the society; but the directors were authorized to purchase the shares of certain members who desired to withdraw from the concern by a special resolution of the society, which provided that shares purchased in terms thereof should not be re-issued by the board without the authority of a general meeting. The Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of Bacon, V.C., held that the scheme involved an improper application of its funds, and was ultra vires of the company. James, L.J., said: "Mr. Kay, it appears to me, has succeeded in placing his opponents on the horns of a dilemma. This is a purchase of shares in the sense of a trafficking in shares, which is a purchase not authorized by the memorandum of association, or it is an extinguishment of the shares, and therefore a reduction of the capital of the company." He clearly distinguishes the cases of purchase from that of surrender. After referring to his reported observations in Teasdale's case as being too wide a deduction from the authorities, and unnecessary for the decision of the case, he says: "But however that may be, when the company deals with an individual shareholder, and does what appears to be right under the circumstances—namely, to accept the surrender from the shareholder who cannot pay, and to release him from further liability—that might be good, although incidentally and to a small extent it may be said to diminish the capital." Brett and Baggallay, L.JJ., followed the same line of reasoning with James, L.J. They agreed that the resolution of the company to purchase and hold its own shares, subject to the disposal of a general meeting, was in substance either a resolution to deal in the shares, which was outside the memorandum of association, or a resolution to reduce its capital, which was contrary to the provisions of the Companies Acts. The decisions of the learned judges would, I apprehend, have been the same if the directors had been authorized to make the purchase by the articles of association. No authority thereby given could have enlarged the scope of the memorandum, or overcome the statutory prohibition.

Mr. Romer did not, in the course of his able argument for the respondents, impeach the soundness of the decision in Hope v. The International Financial Society. He sought to extricate his clients from the dilemma presented in that case by endeavouring to show that the purchase of the 533 shares in question was, in a reasonable sense, incidental to the carrying on of the proper business of "James Schofield & Sons (Limited)," or was a legitimate piece of domestic management, and was therefore within the scope of the memorandum; and, upon that assumption, he argued that the transaction was not in contravention of the Companies Acts, although it might lead to some diminution of capital. His argument was mainly rested upon In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., an authority requiring consideration because it is in respect of the principle said to be thereby established that the Court of Appeal has in this case given judgment for the respondents.

Other authorities were relied on by the learned counsel, but these (with one exception) I think it unnecessary to notice, because they were cases either of surrender of shares or of cancellation of allotments, and did not involve any question of purchase.

In Phosphate of Lime Co. v. Green a dispute had arisen between the company and two of its shareholders, which was eventually compromised. As stated by Willes, J.: "An arbitration was proposed, and negotiations took place between the directors and Green and Nicholls, which resulted in a compromise on or about the 24th of July, 1866. That compromise in effect was that, instead of paying back the money advanced to them, and returning the debenture bonds, Green and Nicholls should give up to the company 400 shares, on which £10 per share had been paid up, to be cancelled; and it was agreed that this should be considered as a settlement of the claim of the company against them." The learned judges, in delivering their opinions, assumed that the transaction had the character of a sale of the shares, and was struck at by the 19th of the company's articles of association, which expressly prohibited the purchase of its own shares under any circumstances; but they held that the shareholders, with full knowledge of the transaction, had ratified that which had been done by the directors. None of the learned judges seem to have considered whether the transaction was within the limits of the memorandum or consistent with the provisions of the Companies Acts and neither of these points was raised by the arguments addressed to them.

In deciding In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. the Court of Appeal had fully in view the previous decisions of this House in The Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche, and of their predecessors in Hope v. International Financial Society. It appears from the report that disputes had arisen between the board of directors and Ward, one of their number, from whom and his partner Addy the company had a sub-lease of coal mines which it worked, and that these disputes seriously interfered with the business of the company. In order to terminate their differences the parties entered into an agreement, sanctioned by a special resolution of the company, in terms of which Ward, on the 25th of March, 1872, transferred his shares to the company for £5,000, and on the same date executed, along with Addy, a separate indenture, by which they assigned to the company their whole interest as lessees for the sum of £10,000. The company was registered as owner of the shares shortly after the execution of the transfer in 1872, and retained them until 1879, when a winding-up order was obtained. At the time of the transfer, and for several years following, the business of the company was prosperous, and large dividends were paid. The liquidators included Ward in the list of contributories, and, on an application for the removal of his name, Jessel, M.R., held that the transfer was void as being not only outside the objects of the memorandum, but a diminution of the paid-up capital, forbidden by the Companies Acts, and, consequently, that Ward was still liable to contribute. This judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal, who directed the applicant's name to be removed from the list. Cotton, L.J., was of opinion that, the purchase having been made in the interest of the company, and not being in any sense a traffic in shares, did not go beyond the memorandum, and that it was not such a diminution of capital as the statutes prohibit. Upon the latter point his lordship observed: "The principal argument of the respondent against the validity of the transaction was that it was a reduction of the capital of the company. If this transaction is to be held invalid on that ground, I do not see how a surrender or forfeiture of shares is ever to be supported." James, L.J., was also of opinion that dealing with shares which did not amount to traffic was not beyond the scope of the memorandum, and he regarded the transaction as "a mere domestic matter" which could not be questioned after the company had first confirmed it and had then acquiesced in it and taken the benefit of it.

In Guinness v. Land Corporation of Ireland Cotton, L.J., thus explained the principle upon which In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. was decided: "The article there empowered the directors in their discretion to apply money in purchasing shares so as to get rid of shareholders who caused difficulty in the internal management of the company, and as the power had been used, and reasonably used, for that purpose, and not as a means of diminishing the capital of the company, the shares not being in any way cancelled or put an end to, but being re-issuable, we were of opinion that the directors had the power which they purported to exercise."

When a company, in order to get rid of a troublesome shareholder, buys his shares and continues to hold them, as in In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., the object may be different, but the result, so far as regards the capital of the company, is precisely the same as if it had purchased the shares as an investment. If the shares are purchased with the view of being re-sold, that is simply a speculation with the funds of the company. If they are purchased with the view of being retained by the company, that is a permanent withdrawal of the money invested in them from the trading capital of the company. I do not agree with Cotton, L.J., in thinking that if such a transaction is invalid no forfeiture or surrender could be supported. When shares are forfeited or surrendered and not re-issued that affects only the nominal amount of the shares so far as unpaid; when they are bought and not reissued that diminishes the paid-up as well as the nominal capital.

Notwithstanding the general prohibition of alterations upon the memorandum of association, which diminish the capital, whether paid up or nominal, of a company limited by shares, the Companies Acts contemplate the possibility of diminution of unpaid capital in certain cases, although the memorandum remains unaltered. Section 26 of the Act of 1862 and the regulations of Table A (17 to 22) show plainly that the Legislature intended companies to have the power of forfeiting shares. There is no reference in the Acts to surrenders of shares; but these have been admitted by the courts, upon the principle, as I understand it, that they have practically the same effect as forfeiture, the main difference being that the one is a proceeding in invitum, and the other a proceeding taken with the assent of the shareholder, who is unable to retain and pay future calls on his shares. Whatever may be the case in regard to surrender, I do not think the purchase of its own shares by a company bears any analogy to forfeiture. It appears to me that a transaction by which, as in this case and in In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., the company gave back his money to the shareholder, and accepted and held the shares in his stead, in point of fact operates as a diminution of its paid-up as well as of its nominal capital; and I have been unable to discover any good reason why such a diminution should be held to be legal in the face of statutory enactment to the contrary.

I am not prepared to say, nor is it necessary to say, that the decree in In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. directing the removal of Ward's name from the list of contributories was erroneous. If his non-liability to contribute in the liquidation had been wholly dependent upon the original validity of the agreement of March, 1872, for the sale and purchase of his shares, I should have agreed with the decision of Jessel, M.R.; but it appears to me that there were special circumstances in that case which might have justified the order made by the Court of Appeal, although I am unable to concur in the reasoning upon which it was based. The respondents are not resisting an attempt by the liquidators to include them in the list of contributories; they are seeking to enforce, in a question with creditors, the contract under which their shares were transferred to the company, and their success must depend upon the validity of that contract.

In the present case I should have been of opinion, even on the assumption that the reasoning of the Lords

Justices in In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. was sound, that the purchase of the respondents' 533 shares was a transaction ultrâ vires of the company. It was not an isolated transaction with a single troublesome shareholder, who was obstructing the business of the company, but was part and parcel of a scheme carried out by the directors, under the articles of association, by which they acquired for the company more than one-fourth of the whole shares of its undertaking, and returned to the shareholders, from whom they purchased, more than one-fourth of its paid-up capital. It does not appear to have formed any part of the scheme to re-sell or re-issue the shares; and matters stood in the position I have described at the date of the liquidation. I do not doubt that, as suggested by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, the object of the directors was to keep "James Schofield & Sons (Limited)" as a sort of family concern, which was a perfectly lawful object if pursued by legitimate means. But the directors and shareholders of a company limited by shares, who desire to have the concern in the hands of themselves and their friends, and to keep its shares out of the market, ought to use their own money for that purpose, and not the trading capital of the company. In my opinion the application of the company's funds in furtherance of any such object is altogether illegitimate, because it is foreign to the proper business of the company, and in violation of statute law. If it were held to be incidental to the business of the company, and not a diminution of its capital, there seems to be no reason why "James Schofield & Sons (Limited)" should not have purchased at par a half or two-thirds, instead of a fourth, of its own shares.

I concur therefore in the judgment which has been moved.

Lord Fitzgerald.—Lord Herschell has stated accurately that there are three questions awaiting our decision. The first is whether the shares in question were purchased by Mr. G. W. Schofield on his own account or as agent for the company? If I had to determine what the true character of that transaction was, and if that was necessary for our decision, I should hesitate very much to say that the agreement of the 1st of May, 1880, was entered into by G. W. Schofield on behalf of the company, and not upon his own account.

The second question is whether, assuming that these shares were purchased for the company, and that the company had power to buy its own shares, the purchase was completed in accordance with the articles of association? Upon that question I make the same observation, that it is not necessary for our present decision to express any decided opinion upon it, but the impression upon my mind is that if I had to decide that question I should say that the transaction was not completed in accordance with the articles of association, and was therefore inoperative.

The third question is the important one in the case. It is a question of very great public importance, and one cannot but feel satisfied that at last it has come to the point where it is necessary to pronounce an authoritative decision upon it. The question is put thus in the reasons for the appeal; the third reason is, "Because the company had no power to make or authorize any such purchase of its own shares." That is answered in the reasons given for the respondents thus, "Because the purchase by the company of the said shares was not ultrâ vires, but under the circumstances was and is a transaction in every way binding on the company." The question now is which of these reasons we are to adopt.

I have read the notes of the two very elaborate opinions which have been already delivered upon this subject, and I have also read the notes of the very weighty opinion which has yet to be delivered by Lord Macnaghten. Upon carefully reading these notes and deliberately considering them, I have laid aside what I intended to be my own judgment in the case, and I intend to do little more than, upon this question, to state my entire concurrence in the views which have been expressed by your lordships who have spoken and in those which are about to be expressed by my noble and learned friend. I would add that I consider that the decision which the House has been enabled to arrive at is the most wholesome one in the public interests and for public purposes.

I would not say another word, but that I wish to advert to a case to which I called attention in the course of the argument—it was a case which came up for decision before the Court of Appeal in Ireland, and in which a very elaborate judgment was delivered by Fitz-Gibbon, L.J. I refer to In re Balgooley Distillery Co. I only wish to observe that I think that affords the ablest criticism which has taken place up to this morning upon the authorities and upon the question which we have now to determine. I will only repeat that I express my entire concurrence, upon the third question, in the decision of the House and in the reasons given for it.

Lord Macnaghten.—The learned counsel for the appellants raised three points for your lordships' consideration.

In the first place, they contended that the shares belonging to Whitworth's executors, which were the subject of the agreement of May, 1880, were not really purchased on behalf of the company. From facts either proved or admitted, and from documents in evidence, they asked your lordships to infer that in making that agreement George William Schofield was acting on his own account, though he meant all the while to treat the company as the purchaser if the bargain turned out to be a bad one. That is a charge of dishonesty for which, as far as I can see, there is not a shadow of foundation.

In the next place, assuming the purchase clauses in the articles to be valid, it was contended that the requirements of those clauses were not duly complied with. This is a more difficult question. In the unsatisfactory state of the evidence I do not propose to give any final opinion upon it. I will only make one or two observations. Article 179 provides that "any share"—that is, any share in James Schofield & Sons (Limited)—"may be purchased by the company from any person willing to sell it, and at such price, not exceeding the then market value thereof, as the board think reasonable." Now it does not appear that the board ever exercised any judgment or thought in the matter. From the year 1875 the company's shares were not saleable or sold in the market, or dealt with by the public. After that date any shares that any member wished to sell were bought by the company as a matter of course. Except in a few instances where shares were sold below their par nominal value, the price given was invariably a sum equal to the amount paid up, and that although the company was steadily going from bad to worse, trading at a loss, and at the same time borrowing money to buy up the shares of members who wanted to withdraw. Why the price was kept up under these circumstances it is not necessary to inquire. Whatever the reason may have been, the sum which the board agreed to pay for the shares belonging to Whitworth's executors cannot, I think, by any figure of speech, be described as the market value, or as bearing any relation to the market value, of the shares. If that be so, there seems to be a difficulty in the way of enforcing against the company the completion of a contract founded on something like a breach of trust on the part of the directors.

The third point is one of general importance. It raises the question whether it is competent for a company formed under the Act of 1862, on the principle of limited liability, to purchase its own shares when it is authorized by its articles to do so. The consideration of that question, as it appears to me, necessarily involves the broader question whether it is competent for a limited company under any circumstances to invest any portion of its capital in the purchase of a share of its own capital stock, or to return any portion of its capital to any shareholder without following the course which Parliament has prescribed. If the case were not in some degree embarrassed by the decision in In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., and by dicta in earlier cases, I should answer both questions in the negative without the slighest doubt or hesitation. It appears to me that the notion of a limited company taking power to buy up its own shares is contrary to the plain intention of the Act of 1862, and inconsistent with the conditions upon which, and upon which alone, Parliament has granted to individuals who are desirous of trading in partnership the privilege of limiting their liability.

The Act of 1862 requires that the objects for which a limited company is established shall be stated in its memorandum. Those objects cannot be enlarged by anything to be found in the articles, or by anything outside the memorandum. Whatever may fairly be regarded as incidental to the objects stated in the memorandum the company is authorised to do. Everything beyond that is prohibited. Further, every limited company is required to state in its memorandum the amount of capital with which it proposes to be registered, divided into shares of a certain fixed amount. That is equivalent to a declaration that the capital is to be devoted to the objects of the company. The effect of that statement, taken in connection with section 38, is explained very clearly by Cotton, L.J., in Guinness v. Land Corporation of Ireland. After commenting on section 38, the Lord Justice proceeds thus :—"From that it follows that whatever has been paid by a member cannot be returned to him. In my opinion it also follows that what is described in the memorandum as the capital cannot be diverted from the objects of the society. It is, of course, liable to be spent or lost in carrying on the business of the company, but no part of it can be returned to a member so as to take away from the fund to which the creditors have a right to look as that out of which they are to be paid."

If that be a correct exposition of the law, as I think it is, it seems to me to be decisive on the present question. If the purchase of shares in James Schofield & Sons (Limited) was not one of the objects of that company, how could its capital be properly employed in that purchase? Bowen, L.J., indeed, founding himself on In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., assumes that cases may occur where the purchase of its own shares is incidental to the legitimate objects of a limited company, and such a case he considers the present to be. On that two observations arise. If the exercise of such a power can be regarded as incidental to the objects of a limited company, there seems to be no need for giving the power in express terms either in the memorandum or in the articles. Every company must have it. Every company may exercise it in a proper case. In the next place, whatever may be thought of the special circumstances to be found in In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., there are no special circumstances here. It was said that the company was a family company. But a family company, whatever the expression means, does not limit its trading to the family circle. If it takes the benefit of the Act it is bound by the Act as much as any other company. It can have no special privilege or immunity. It was said that the board did not want Whitworth's shares to be sold to outsiders, or put on the market. Unfortunately there was nothing special in that. That was part of the regular practice of the company, a practice which became more and more confirmed as the company's affairs became more and more embarrassed. The company's balance-sheets for the last few years of its existence are in evidence. On the one side, among the debit items, they show the amount due to the company's bankers; on the other side, under the head of "shares purchased," they show the amount spent by the company in the purchase of its own shares. The figures are instructive. In December, 1880, the company owed its bankers, who were secured creditors, £20,202. Up to that date, from its commencement in 1865, it had spent £16,202 in the purchase of its own shares. By December, 1883, the debt to the bankers had increased to £30,490, and the sum spent in the purchase of its shares amounted to £32,935. By means of these purchases that large sum, more than one-fifth of the nominal capital of the company, had been withdrawn from the fund to which, as Cotton, L.J., says, the creditors have a right to look. In 1884 the company went into liquidation, and the creditors are unpaid.

In the face of the figures to which I have referred, Mr. Romer, who argued the case for the respondents with extreme ability and ingenuity, hesitated to maintain that the particular purchase was incidental to the objects of the company. But he urged that the vendors had nothing to do with that; they were not concerned with the management of the company. It was enough for his argument if it were conceded that the purchase of its own shares might be incidental to the objects for which the company was formed. Your lordships then asked in what case and under what circumstances such a purchase could be said to be incidental to the objects of a limited company? In answer to that question the learned counsel not unnaturally turned to In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., and suggested that at any rate it might be so when the power was used as an incident of domestic management to buy out shareholders whose continuance in the company was undesirable. That was the way in which the proposition was put in The Dronfield case, where matters had come to a deadlock. But, I would ask, is it possible to suggest anything more dangerous to the welfare of companies and the security of their creditors than such a doctrine? Who are the shareholders whose continuance in a company the company or its executive consider undesirable? Why, shareholders who quarrel with the policy of the board, and wish to turn the directors out; shareholders who ask questions which it may not be convenient to answer; shareholders who want information which the directors think it prudent to withhold. Can it be contended that when the policy of directors is assailed they may spend the capital of the company in keeping themselves in power, or in purchasing the retirement of inquisitive and troublesome critics? I took the liberty during the argument of referring to a case which is reported under the name of Harben v. Phillips, 31 W. R. 173, 23 Ch. D. 14. It was the case of a large shipping company in which the shareholders were divided into two hostile camps. One party, with the old directors at their head, wished to make London the port of departure for their fleet. The other party were determined that the business should remain at Southampton. Both sides were perfectly honest, each was fully convinced that the company would be ruined if the view of their opponents prevailed. Could it be suggested that in such a case directors might lawfully employ the company's funds in buying up a sufficient number of shares to silence opposition? or is the purchase allowable only where the undesirable shareholder stands alone, and the other members are all of one mind? In the latter case the action of the directors may not be open to misconstruction; but still the purchase would not be "a mere domestic matter," as it was termed by James, L.J., in In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. It must involve the employment of funds which have been dedicated to other purposes, and the use or misuse of which concerns other persons besides the shareholders. Nor can it be considered incidental to the objects of the company merely because it may be very convenient. After all, the inconvenience sought to be avoided arises either from restrictions which Parliament has thought right to impose, or from the common misfortune of having to pay for what one wants out of one's own purse when there is no other way of getting it. If the capital proposed to be expended in the purchase of its shares "is in excess of the wants of the company," the transaction may be carried out under the provisions of the Acts to which I shall have presently to refer. If the capital of the company is not in excess of the company's wants, it certainly ought not to be diverted from its proper objects. But even then there is no reason why there should be a deadlock. The end in view may still be attained by means to which no exception can be taken. If shareholders think it worth while to spend money for the sake of getting rid of a troublesome partner who is willing to sell, they may put their hands in their own pockets and buy him out, though they cannot draw on a fund in which others as well as themselves are interested. That, I think, is the law, and that is the good sense of the matter.

There remains, however, a more serious objection still. It seems to me that if a power to purchase its own shares were found in the memorandum of association of a limited company it would necessarily be void. There are two conditions of the memorandum—the condition defining the objects of the company and the condition defining its capital—one or both of which would be affected by such a power. It must, therefore, be considered in connection with each. Suppose the dealing in its own shares were stated as an object for which a company was proposed to be established, could it be said that the subscribers were associated for a "lawful purpose" within the meaning of section 6 of the Act of 1862? If it were the only object of the company no one would say so. Does the purpose of the association become lawful if legitimate objects are combined with an object which is not legitimate? It is significant that the Stock Exchange will not grant a settling day or allow a quotation to any company which purports to have the power of buying in its own shares. But let me suppose a case where the purchase of its own shares is not one of the objects of the company, properly so called, but a case where the subscribers to the memorandum think that the power of purchasing its own shares might be useful in the management of the company if it were permissible by law. Then it seems to me that one way of trying whether it is permissible or not would be to read it into the memorandum in connection with the condition which states what the capital is to be. Let me try it here in that way, using the very language of Cotton, L.J., who thought the power in the present case valid because it was only "a power to authorize the board, whenever they thought it desirable for the purposes of the company, to buy the shares." The condition would then run thus: "The capital of the company is £150,000 in 15,000 shares of £10 each; but the board may buy back shares whenever they think it desirable for the purposes of the company to do so." It seems to me that a condition so qualified would be repugnant and contradictory to itself. At any rate, the qualification would have the effect of reducing one of the statutory conditions of the memorandum to an empty form.

So far I have not relied upon the Acts of 1867 and 1877, which are to be construed as one with the Act of 1862, because I think the question is clear on the earlier Act; but I may say that the Act of 1867, as explained by the Act of 1877, seems to prohibit a company from purchasing its own shares except under certain stringent conditions. When Parliament sanctions the doing of a thing under certain conditions and with certain restrictions it must be taken that the thing is prohibited unless the prescribed conditions and restrictions are observed. Now the Act of 1862 makes no provision for reduction of capital. The Act of 1867 allows a limited company to reduce its capital under conditions which carefully protect the interests of creditors. The Act of 1877 explains that the power to reduce capital includes a power "to pay off any capital which may be in excess of the wants of the company," and it dispenses with some of the prescribed conditions when the reduction does not involve either the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital or "the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital." It follows that if the operation be effected by payment of capital to any one shareholder all the prescribed conditions must be followed. Payment of capital to any one shareholder is just as much a reduction of capital and just as detrimental to the interests of creditors as the payment of the same amount among all the shareholders rateably. It is none the less a payment off of capital within the meaning of the Act of 1867, as explained by the Act of 1877, because the shareholder to whom the payment is made renounces in return the right to participate in the joint stock of the company.

One word with regard to powers of forfeiture and surrender of shares, which were referred to in argument as affording some support to the views of the respondents. Forfeiture is contemplated by the Act of 1862; it is mentioned in section 26; every company is to return to the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies once a year "the total amount of shares forfeited." There can be no question as to the power of a company in a proper case to forfeit shares. Surrender of shares stands on a different footing. It is not mentioned in the Companies Acts, but I conceive there can be no objection to the surrender of shares which are liable to forfeiture. A surrender of shares in return for money paid by the company is a sale, and open to the same objections as a sale, whatever expression may be used to describe or disguise the transaction.

If you agree in the result at which I have arrived you will prevent a distinction being set up between the powers of statutory corporations governed by the Companies Acts and the powers of those governed by the Companies Clauses Acts for which, as it appears to me, it would be difficult to find any foundation in reason. In the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, provision is made for forfeiture, and for forfeiture only. By the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, companies are authorized to accept surrenders of shares not fully paid up; but it is expressly enacted that "the company shall not pay or refund to any shareholder any sum of money for or in respect of the cancellation or surrender of any share." It has never been suggested, so far as I am aware, that a company governed by the Companies Clauses Acts can purchase its own shares. Your lordships have held that the principles which were laid down in Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche, as to the limit of the powers of incorporated companies, apply with equal force to companies governed by the Companies Acts and to companies incorporated by special Act of Parliament. It would be a singular thing if your lordships were compelled to hold that one class of companies can purchase its own shares while the other is prohibited from so doing.

It is necessary to say a few words with regard to the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. Much reliance, of course, was placed on that decision, and your lordships were warned against the danger of disturbing its authority, having regard to the time which has elapsed since it was pronounced, and to the probability of its having been acted upon to a considerable extent. So far as my experience goes that decision has never been recognized in the profession as an authority for the general proposition that a limited company may purchase its own shares; and I am confirmed in this view by the criticisms on the case to be found in Mr. Buckley's well-known work, and in the notes in Mr. Palmer's excellent collection of precedents.

I do not think that your lordships' judgment in the present case will touch the decision in In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., though it will, of course, displace much of the reasoning on which that case was decided. If I may respectfully say so, though I agree with the reasoning of Jessel, M.R., on the main point, still I think the decision of the Court of Appeal was right. It seems to me that it may be supported on very simple grounds. Mr. Ward's name was not on the register when the company was ordered to be wound up. To make him a contributory it was therefore necessary to rectify the register. After winding up, the court has that power under sections 35 and 98. But it is a judicial power, as it has been called, and it is to be exercised by the court, to use the language of section 35, "if satisfied of the justice of the case." Those are not mere idle words. They mean, I think, what they say. Although they have been sometimes overlooked, Lord Cairns, I may observe, relied upon them in In re Sichel, 16 W. R. 292, L. R. 3 Ch. 119, as showing that the court is bound to go into all the circumstances of the case, and to consider what equity the applicant has to call for its interposition. Now the arrangement under which Ward retired was an honest arrangement. It was in accordance with a provision of the articles which had never been determined to be invalid. It was expressly sanctioned at an extraordinary general meeting, at which all the shareholders were present with the exception of the holder or holders of eleven shares out of 1,600. Ward's name was off the register for seven years. During part of that time the company had been extremely prosperous, and all the shareholders who remained in the company had received dividends largely increased by reason of Ward's retirement. Moreover, there was no creditor whose debt was incurred while Ward was a shareholder, or who had been induced to trust the company by having Ward's name held out as a member. The power to make a person who is not on the register contribute to debts when the company is wound up is a power given by statute. The same statute requires the court, before exercising the power, to be satisfied of the justice of the case. In In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. the liquidator, as representing shareholders, had no equity; he had none as representing creditors. It would be a strange travesty of justice to compel a person to pay debts with which he has nothing to do at the instance of an applicant who has no equity to set the court in motion.

The present case is wholly different from In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co. There it was sought to undo a transaction which could not be undone altogether so as to restore the parties to their original position and which could not be undone at all without committing injustice. Here the applicants are seeking to enforce against the company a contract which has not yet been fully performed and which was beyond the powers of the company. Under these circumstances the application ought, I think, to have been refused by the Court of Appeal as it was by the Vice-Chancellor.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the appeal allowed, with costs.

Order appealed from reversed; order of the Vice-Chancellor of Lancaster restored; the respondents to pay to the appellants the costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House, and to repay to the appellants any moneys and costs received from them.

Weldon v. Maples and Others. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Security for costs—Special circumstances—Abuse of process of the court—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 15.

An appellant may be ordered to give security for the costs of an appeal where a primâ facie case of abuse of the process of the court has been made out.

Application by the defendants for an order that the plaintiff should give security for the costs of an appeal from an order of the Divisional Court (Stephen and Charles, JJ.), affirming an order of the master and judge in chambers striking out the statement of claim and dismissing the action.

The affidavit filed in support of the application is fully set out in the judgment of Bowen, L.J.

J. Digby, for the defendants, relied upon two grounds—the alleged poverty of the plaintiff, and that the appeal was an abuse of the process of the court.

He cited Harlock v. Ashberry, 30 W. R. 112, 19 Ch. D. 84; Usill v. Brearley, 3 C. P. D. 206; Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley, 33 W. R. 709, 10 App. Cas. 210; Waddell v. Blockey, 27 W. R. 233, 10 Ch. D. 416; Grepe v. Loam, 32 Solicitors' Journal, 23.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 9.—Bowen, L.J.—This case is of some importance, because it goes beyond the ordinary case in which security for the costs of an appeal can generally be obtained. As a general rule security for costs is obtained upon an affidavit showing that the appellant has no means of paying the costs if the appeal fails. The affidavit here falls short of that. But the order which we have to apply is ord. 58, r. 15, which states that "such deposit or other security for the costs to be occasioned by any appeal shall be made or given as may be directed under special circumstances by the Court of Appeal." The rule does not confine cases in which security for costs will be ordered to cases of poverty alone. If there are special circumstances in which the court thinks it just to make the order, the order will be made without regard to the suggested limit of poverty. It seems to me that in the present case there is this ground which constitutes a special circumstance—namely, that a primâ facie case has been made out of abuse of the process of the court. I have carefully gone through the affidavit which states the whole story. I do not go into the merits of the case, with which we have nothing to do. The question, to my mind, is whether the plaintiff is not primâ facie abusing the process of the court and threatening not to pay the costs if she fails in the appeal.

Now, in 1883, the plaintiff brought an action against Sir Henry de Bathe, and Sir Henry de Bathe is entitled, under various orders of the court, to costs against the plaintiff, which have been taxed at £126 16s. 5d. There have also been eighteen different summonses or applications by the plaintiff dismissed in that action, in respect of which about £40 is still owing to Sir Henry de Bathe for costs. On the 8th of July, 1887, the Court of Appeal in that action ordered the plaintiff to give security for the costs of three appeals. In 1887 the plaintiff also brought an action against Sir Henry de Bathe jointly with her husband, and this action was dismissed by order of the master as frivolous, whose decision was affirmed by the judge at chambers and the Divisional Court. The plaintiff appealed from that order, and the Court of Appeal, on the 8th of July, 1887, ordered the plaintiff to give security for costs in respect of that appeal.

The plaintiff also brought an action in 1887 against Messrs. Maples, Teesdale, & Co., the solicitors for Sir Henry de Bathe, against three of their clerks, and against Sir Henry de Bathe. This action was based upon allegations of perjury said to have been committed in the previous action by the various defendants. On the 6th of July, 1887, this action was dismissed by the master as frivolous, and upon appeal the judge in chambers also considered that the statement of claim disclosed no real cause of action, but offered to allow the plaintiff to amend her claim, which she refused to do, and the judge thereupon dismissed the appeal. The Divisional Court affirmed this order. The costs due to the defendants in respect of that action were taxed at £26 9s. 6d.

The plaintiff has not paid any of these costs.*

Later in the same year the plaintiff began a fresh action against the same defendants. In this action the master ordered the statement of claim to be struck out and the action dismissed as frivolous. The plaintiff appealed, and this order was affirmed by the judge at chambers and the Divisional Court. The plaintiff is now appealing to this court from that order. The claim is substantially the same as in the former action against the same defendants which was dismissed as frivolous. The above facts show a strong primâ facie case of abuse of the process of the court. I say primâ facie because we have not now to decide whether or not the action is frivolous. Furthermore, it appears from the affidavit that the plaintiff has announced her intention of not paying any costs if she fails. Upon those two sets of facts I apply the powers vested in us by ord. 58, r. 15. The court ought to protect parties against the abuse or threatened abuse of the process of the court. One word more as to a suggestion that was thrown out during the course of the argument—namely, that execution ought to have been issued before the present application was made. That does not appear to me to be the true view to take of the matter, for the court will not compel a party to take such a harsh proceeding as to put in execution before making the application. We think, therefore, that the plaintiff must find security for £10.

FRY, L.J.—I entirely agree.

Solicitors for the defendants, Maples, Teesdale, & Co.

* The affidavit, after stating the above facts, proceeded (so far as material) as follows:—

10. "The plaintiff has not paid any of the above-mentioned costs, although such as have been taxed and ascertained have been demanded of her; neither has she given security for the costs of her appeals as ordered."

12. "The plaintiff has stated on oath that she is without any settlement and wholly unprovided for, and that she has not the remotest intention of paying costs so as aforesaid found due and ordered to be paid by her to the defendants. She further deposes that she will be made a bankrupt sooner than pay the defendant, Sir H. de Bathe, one shilling, and has stated in open court that she has not the means to pay the said costs."

Chan. Div. Kay, J. — Dec. 13, 14.

BROWN v. ALABASTER. (a.)

Right of way—Implied grant—Way formed during unity of possession—Grant of part of tenement—Way convenient, but not of necessity.

Where, during unity of possession, a particular and defined way is formed and used over property which is afterwards severed and granted by the owner to different persons, the right of using the way as it is then used may pass by implication, although it be not a way of necessity, and although the general words of the conveyance are not sufficient to pass such right.

An owner of land erected three houses thereon facing a road, with gardens at the back. Behind these ran a way which gave access from the gardens of two of the houses to a side road, which ran at right angles to the front road on the other side of the third house. The owner assigned to the defendant the plots of land with the two houses thereon, "with their rights, easements, and appurtenances," and afterwards assigned to the plaintiff the third plot, the dimensions of which comprised so much of the way as lay between the two other plots and the side road. The gardens of the defendant's houses could also be reached from the road in front by two passages, but these were unsuitable for carrying away rubbish, &c., from the gardens. The plaintiff disputed the defendant's right to use the way over his land to the side road.

Held, that the defendant was not entitled to this as a way of necessity, but that the right of using the way passed to him by implied grant from the owner, although the general words in the assignment to him were not sufficient to pass such right.

Trial of action.

W. Letts, being possessed for a term of years of a plot of land situate at the corner of Augusta-road and Park-road, at Moseley, in the parish of King's Norton, Worcestershire, erected thereon three houses facing on Park-road. One of these, called "Normanhurst," which belonged to the plaintiff, was situate at the angle formed by the two roads. The house next to it was called "Cottisbrook," and beyond it a third, called "Westbourne." Both these houses belonged to the defendant. The three plots of land on which the houses respectively stood were in the shape of a long parallelogram, and each of the houses had a garden at the back. The main entrances to the houses were from Park-road, but both Cottisbrook and Westbourne had also entrances leading to the house from the road by a passage which ran along the side of each house, that to Cottisbrook running between it and Normanhurst, and that to Westbourne running along its further side. These passages ended in a cul-de-sac, and then turned inwards at right angles, passing through a portion of the buildings, and thus led into the gardens at the back. They were four feet wide, paved with encaustic tiles, and were approached from Park-road by one step, with two steps of descent into the gardens. They were closed with doors at each end, and, at their passage through the buildings, they had doors on the right and left hand, which communicated with the hall on the one side and with the offices on the other.

There was also another means of access to the gardens of Cottisbrook and Westbourne, as to which the action arose, through a way which ran parallel to Park-road along the plot of land at the lower end of the gardens into Augusta-road. It was walled in, and had a door at the road, and also two doors in the wall which gave access to the gardens of Cottisbrook and Westbourne.

The assignments of these properties by Letts and his mortgagees to the defendant was dated the 14th of December, 1878, and the pieces of land were thereby expressed to be assigned "together with the two messuages or dwelling-houses erected thereon, with their rights, easements, and appurtenances."

The plaintiff derived his title to Normanhurst under an indenture of the 13th of November, 1879, by which Letts assigned that piece of land and the messuage thereon to the plaintiff's vendor. The parcels were therein described as those comprised in the original lease of that portion of the land to Letts, dated the the 5th of October, 1877, in which the piece of land was described as being of a certain length on each side, and as containing so many square yards. These dimensions included so much of the site of the way behind the gardens as lay between Augusta-road and the opposite limit of the Normanhurst property. And the indenture of the 13th of November, 1879, contained no reservation by Letts of any right of way over the same. The way had been formed and existed in its present state prior to either of the above assignments by Letts, and had been used by the defendant since he acquired his two houses. The plaintiff disputed his right of using the way, and brought this action, claiming a declaration that the defendant was not entitled, as against him, to any right of way from or to his houses over or across his land to or from Augusta-road, and that he, his agents and servants, might be restrained from passing over or otherwise trespassing upon the plaintiff's land.

A surveyor and house agent, who was called on behalf of the plaintiff to prove a plan of the properties, said, in cross-examination, that in his opinion the passages to the gardens of Cottisbrook and Westbourne from Park-road were unsuitable for the carrying away of rubbish, &c., from the gardens, and that the use of the way at the back of the gardens was convenient for the occupiers of those two houses.

Methold, for the plaintiff.—The assignment of the 14th of December, 1878, contained no words sufficient to pass this right of way: James v. Plant, 4 Ad. & El. 749, 5 B. & Ad. 791; and it is not a way of necessity, but only of convenience, for the gardens can be reached by the passage from Park-road: Pheysey v. Vicary, 16 M. & W. 484; Gayford v. Moffatt, L. R. 4 Ch. 133, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 42. [KAY, J.—Jessel, M.R., referring to this case in Corporation of London v. Riggs, 28 W. R. 610, 13 Ch. D. 798, said that it was obvious Lord Cairns thought a way of necessity meant a way suitable for the user of the premises. Can these gardens be suitably used without this way?] The defendant can alter the nature of the passage to Park-road. A way of necessity is not a defined way, and the grantor has the right of marking its course: Bolton v. Bolton, 11 Ch. D. 968, 27 W. R. Dig. 230.

Marten, Q.C., and Horace Browne, for the defendant.—The evidence shows that this is a way of necessity. But, as it was a clear formed way, it passed by implied grant under the assignment to the defendant: Pearson v. Spencer, 11 W. R. 471, 3 B. & S. 76; Hinchliffe v. Earl of Kinnoul, 5 Bing. N. C. 1. It would pass by general words: Langley v. Hammond, 16 W. R. 937, L. R. 3 Ex. 161: Bayley v. Great Western Railway, 26 Ch. D. 434, 32 W. R. Dig. 227. A grant of part of a tenement carries all continuous and apparent easements, or quasi-easements, necessary for its reasonable enjoyment: Wheeldon v. Burrows, 28 W. R. 196, 12 Ch. D. 31; Ford v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 34 W. R. 426, 17 Q. B. D. 12.

They also referred to Palmer v. Fletcher, 1 Lev. 122; Clarke v. Cogge, Cro. Jac. 170; Compton v. Richards, 1 Pr. 27; Pyer v. Carter, 5 W. R. 371, 1 H. & N. 916; and Russell v. Watts, 32 W. R. 621, 25 Ch. D. 559; on app., 34 W. R. 277, 10 App. Cas. 590.

Methold, in reply.—A right of way is not a continuous and apparent easement: Gale on Easements, 5th ed., p. 25. A way of necessity is limited to what the necessity requires: Holmes v. Goring, 2 Bing. 76; Proctor v. Hodgson, 10 Ex. 828, 2 W. R. C. L. Dig. 218; Dodd v. Burchell, 1 H. & C. 113, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 50. In Hinchliffe v. Earl of Kinnoul the jury had found the way to be of necessity.

KAY, J., after stating the facts and describing the position of the properties, went on to say:—The question is whether the indenture of the 14th of December, 1878, passes a right of way from the gardens of Cottisbrook and Westbourne through this passage into Augusta-road. When this assignment was made this right of way was in no sense an easement. The question, therefore, is twofold—(1) was it a way of necessity, and (2) did it pass by implied grant under the assignment? As a way of necessity it would be difficult for the defendant to sustain the right, for a way of necessity is not a right of passing over a defined way, but is merely a direct means of access to a tenement, and it is clearly established that a grantor is entitled to elect what course such a way shall follow. There is no question of any election in this case—the right claimed is to pass over a particular road, which is enough to show that it is not a way of necessity. If it were such a way, then, whether formed or not, a way would have passed with the property. That is to say, if there had been no back doors, and access to the gardens had only been through the tiled passages, in such case if the owners of Cottisbrook and Westbourne were held to be entitled to a way of necessity to their gardens, then the owner of Westbourne would be entitled to a way over both Cottisbrook and Normanhurst and the owner of Cottisbrook to a way over Normanhurst alone. It would be impossible to hold that having already a way to the road in front through the tiled passages, they were also entitled to a way in some direction or other from the gardens to the other road. I am therefore of opinion that this is not a way of necessity.

Then comes the question whether this right of way will pass, as a continuous and apparent easement, by implied grant. It is stated in Gale on Easements that a right of way is not a continuous easement, but no authority is given for the statement. In Hinchliffe v. The Earl of Kinnoul a lessee claimed a right of way over a passage on one side of his house which communicated with a coal-shoot and with certain pipes for conveying water and soil from the house. These formed part of the tenement, for Tindal, C.J., in giving judgment, says, at p. 24:—"We cannot, therefore, feel any doubt but that, under the description contained in the lease, the coal-shoot and the several pipes passed to the lessee as a constituent part of the messuage or dwelling-house itself."

Now there was in that case another means of approaching the coal shoot over the tenement, but the jury found that the passage was not merely convenient, but necessary, for the use of the coal shoot, and there is this passage in the judgment, at p. 25: "Since, therefore, as it appears to us, the right in question passed to the lessees under the reversionary lease of 1819, as incidental to the enjoyment of that which was the clear and manifest subject-matter of the demise, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question argued at the bar before us, how far the same right might or might not pass to the lessees under the express words used in the lease itself as 'an appurtenant unto the said piece or parcel of ground, messuage, or tenement, erections, buildings, and premises, belonging, or appertaining.' There are strong authorities in the law books to show these words capable of a wider interpretation, and of carrying more than is an appurtenant in the strictly legal sense of that word, where such interpretation is necessary in order to give that word some operation." And after a reference to the authorities the judgment continues: "But we think it at once sufficient, and at the same time safer, to rely upon the ground on which we have already held that the right claimed by the plaintiff may be supported, and to give no opinion upon this second point." That ground having been stated on p. 24 to be that "upon the facts found in the special verdict such right did pass as a necessary incident to the subject-matter actually demised, although not specially named in the lease. The rule laid down in Plowden's Comm., 16a, is, "that by the grant of anything, conceditur et id, sine quâ res ipsa haberi non potest."

Therefore, in that case the way was really a way of necessity. That decision has often since been commented on and followed.

In Langley v. Hammond there was a grant of part of certain demised premises, "together with all ways, &c., therewith now used, occupied, and enjoyed," and Lord Bramwell, in giving judgment, said "suppose a house to stand 100 yards from a highway, and to be approached by a road running along the side of a field, used for no other purpose, but only fenced off from the field, which I assume to be the property of the owner of the house. I should wish for time to consider before deciding that on the conveyance of the house the right to use that road, not being a way of necessity, would not pass under such words as these," that is the words "used, occupied, and enjoyed with," which were the words relied on in the case of James v. Plant. In the later case of Watts v. Kelson, 19 W. R. 338, L. R. 6 Ch., at p. 174, Mellish, L.J., said "We may also observe that in Langley v. Hammond Bramwell, B., expressed an opinion, in which we concur, that even in the case of a right of way, if there was a formed road made over the alleged servient tenement, to and for the apparent use of the dominant tenement, a right of way over such road might pass by a conveyance of the dominant tenement with the ordinary general words." This is a mistake, for the words in Langley v. Hammond were not ordinary, but extraordinary, as they were in James v. Plant.

In Pearson v. Spencer, where the owner of a farm had divided it by his will into two portions, and one portion was landlocked, so that it was necessary to pass over the other portion to reach it, and the devisor had, during his life, used a way in a certain direction over that portion, the right to use this way was held to pass by the devise of the landlocked portion. This was distinctly an advance in the doctrine, for it was held not that a way merely passed by the devise but a particular way. In giving judgment Erle, C.J., said:—"We have been much struck with the argument of Mr. Mellish, in which he contended that, if this right of way were taken as a right of way of necessity simply, the way claimed by the defendant could not be maintained; because we are inclined to concur with him that a way of necessity, strictly so called, ends with the necessity for it, and the direction in which the plaintiff says the way ought to go would so end. But we sustain the judgment of the court below on the construction and effect of James Pearson's will taken in connection with the mode in which the premises were enjoyed at the time of the will. The testator had a unity of possession of all this property; he intended to create two distinct farms with two distinct dwelling-houses, and to leave one to the plaintiff and the other to the party under whom the defendant claims. The way claimed by the defendant was the sole approach that was at that time used for the house and farm devised to him. Then the devise of the farm contained, under the circumstances, a devise of a way to it, and we think the way in question passed with that devise. It falls under that class of implied grants where there is no necessity for the right claimed, but where the tenement is so constructed as that parts of it involve a necessary dependence, in order to its enjoyment in the state it is in when devised, upon the adjoining tenement. These are rights which are implied, and we think that the farm devised to the party under whom the defendant claims could not be enjoyed without dependence on the plaintiff's land of a right of way over it in the customary manner." This, then, is a distinct decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber that a way following a particular and defined route, and which is not a way of necessity, may nevertheless pass by implied grant from an owner who has unity of possession both of the close granted and of the adjoining close.

In the case of Wheeldon v. Burrows the Court of Appeal drew a distinction between the effect of an implied grant and an implied reservation with regard to the much-contested question as to what rights are so reserved to a vendor; and Thesiger, L.J., in the course of his judgment, which was approved by the rest of the court, uses this language: "We have had a considerable number of cases cited to us, and out of them I think that two propositions may be stated as what I call the general rules governing cases of this kind. The first of these rules is, that on the grant by the owner of a tenement of part of that tenement as it is then used and enjoyed, there will pass to the grantee all those continuous and apparent easements (by which, of course, I mean quasi-easements)"—and this interpretation by means of the term "quasi-easements" was needed, because a man can have no easements over his own land —"or, in other words, all those easements which are necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the property granted, and which have been and are at the time of the grant used by the owners of the entirety for the benefit of the part granted. The second proposition is that, if the grantor intends to reserve any grant over the tenement granted, it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant." That is to say, he draws a distinction between an implied grant and an implied reservation. The point again came before the Court of Appeal in Bayley v. Great Western Railway. There the railway company had purchased a piece of land on which was a stable, and the property had been conveyed to the company, together with "all rights, members, or appurtenances to the hereditaments belonging or occupied or enjoyed as part, parcel, or member thereof." The vendor had many years previously made a private road from the highway to the stable over his own land for his own convenience, and had used it ever since. The soil of the road was not conveyed to the company, and no express mention of it was made in the conveyance. It was held that a right of way passed to the company under the general words in the conveyance; and Bowen, L.J., in the course of his judgment, said:—"This particular case is not a case of a way of necessity, though I do not say that there might not be ways which would pass by implication as ways of necessity, even if they were only reasonably necessary and not physically necessary." I do not intend to rest my decision in this case on that dictum, the way here not being, in my opinion, a way of necessity. But there is another case before the Court of Appeal—Ford v. Metropolitan Railway Co.—where a house was divided into two blocks, and part of the back block had been demised without any express grant of access thereto. Access was gained through a hall from the street. The railway company, in the exercise of their compulsory powers, removed the hall, and by thus injuring the access to the lessees' rooms lessened their value. It was held that the access through the hall was not a way of necessity, but was in the nature of a continuous and apparent easement which passed under the demise of the rooms, and that the company's interference with this quasi-easement was sufficient to give rise to a valid claim for compensation. And this decision did not rest upon the use of any extraordinary words in the lease, such as "used or enjoyed therewith," but was based on this, that the court, looking at the whole of the surrounding facts and finding a formed way to the rooms existing over the property, held that this constituted a right of access, although there were no special words in the lease referring to it, or any general words which would carry such a right. And it is doubtful whether general words could have any such effect. In Thompson v. Waterlow, 16 W. R. 686, L. R. 6 Eq. 36, Lord Romilly said that he did not think such words would constitute a grant of a right of way that had not previously existed as a right. This dictum was commented on by Lord Blackburn in Kay v. Oxley, L. R. 10 Q. B. 360, where he says:—"I cannot agree that, upon the construction of words like those in the conveyance here in question, they cannot as a matter of law create a right of way that did not previously exist as a right." I leave this contest of authority as I find it, but it is clearly law that a right of passage over a particular formed way like this is, leading to gates in a wall, part of the demised premises, and without which those gates would be perfectly useless, may pass by implied grant, although in some sense not a continuous and apparent easement, or rather because, being a formed road, it is considered in contemplation of the authorities as so passing in the absence of any general words at all. These gardens, although not absolutely inaccessible, could only be reached through the houses themselves, unless through the gates. That a right of way through these gates was intended to pass by the assignment, and that the owners of Cottisbrook and Westbourne were intended to have the use of this back way is, looking at the facts, beyond all doubt. Then, this not being for all purposes a way of necessity, do I want an express grant? It seems to me that the authorities are clear that an express grant is not needed. I hold, therefore, that the right to use this back way in the same way in which it was used at the date of the deed did pass by implied grant under the indenture of the 14th of December, 1878, and I so decide. The plaintiff seeks a declaration that the defendant is not entitled to use this way to Augusta-road. This I cannot grant. On the contrary, I hold that he is entitled to use the way, and I make a declaration accordingly. The plaintiff must pay the costs of the action.

BECKETT v. TASKER.

Married woman—Separate estate—Settlement—Contract during coverture—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 1, 5, 19.

By a settlement before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, real estate devised to a married woman for her separate use was settled for her separate use without power of anticipation for life, then to her husband for life, then to the children of the marriage, there being none at the date of the settlement. After the Act and during coverture the wife made a promissory note in favour of the plaintiffs, who, after the death of the husband, obtained judgment on the note.

Held, that the settled estate was not liable to satisfy the judgment.

Appeal from an order of Huddleston, B., refusing to set aside an order of the master appointing a receiver of the rents and profits of a widow's real estate.

By a post-nuptial settlement of the 27th of March, 1882, real estate which had been devised to Mrs. Tasker for her separate use (without any restraint on anticipation) was conveyed to trustees to pay the rents to the wife for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, remainder to the husband for life, remainder to the children of the marriage, of whom there were none at the date of the settlement.

In 1885, while her husband was alive, Mrs. Tasker joined in making a joint and several promissory note.

After his death an action was brought in the Mayor's Court upon the note against the makers.

Judgment was signed by default, and the action having been removed to the Queen's Bench Division an elegit was issued.

Mrs. Tasker, having mortgaged the real estate, the return was nulla bona.

On Mrs. Tasker's application the Mayor's Court varied the judgment by adding that as regards her the execution upon the judgment "be limited to the separate estate of the defendant not subject to any restraint against anticipation"; and on the plaintiff's application the further words were added, "unless by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the property shall be liable to such execution notwithstanding such restraint."

The master's order, made ex parte, having been affirmed by Huddleston, B., at chambers, Mrs. Tasker appealed.

Harper, for the plaintiffs.

DAY, J.—I am of opinion that the order appointing the receiver must be set aside. It is admitted that, independently of the Act of 1882, and subject to the question as to the validity of the settlement, this property would not have been liable under a contract entered into by the defendant during her coverture. As the law stood before the Act, the death of the husband would not have in any way affected the liability of the wife under such a contract, and I do not think that the law has been altered in this respect by any of the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The effect of section 1, sub-section 4, is, in my judgment, that a contract entered into by a married woman binds not only the separate property she is possessed of at the date of the contract, but also all separate property thereafter acquired during the coverture; but the property in this case is not separate property of which the defendant was possessed at the date of the contract, nor is it separate property which she acquired afterwards during the coverture, and, as she only contracted to be liable in respect of such property, she has not, in my opinion, in any way bound the property which is the subject of this settlement. Then it is said that, this being a settlement of a woman's own property made by herself, the 19th section provides that no such settlement shall have any greater force or validity against her creditors than a like settlement made by a man would have against his creditors; but I do not think that that section affects any settlement made, as this was, before the date of the Act. Neither can I see on the materials before us that this settlement is void as against an execution creditor. The husband took a life estate in the property determinable on his bankruptcy, and consented that on his bankruptcy his interest should cease and go over to the children of the marriage. I am not therefore disposed to say that there was no consideration, so that, without pursuing the subject farther, I do not think there is anything in the point taken on this part of the case.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that before the Act of 1882 was passed, whenever a married women entered into a contract she only bound the separate estate free from restraint on anticipation which she had at the time the contract was entered into. Before the Act, therefore, as it is not suggested that, assuming the settlement to be good, this property altered its character until the death of the husband, it was clearly not liable for his debt. But it is said that the Act of 1882 has enlarged the remedy of the creditors. I do not think that it is so. It is contended that section 1, sub-section 4, has affected this change, inasmuch as this property, which, during the coverture, was separate property, subject to a restraint on anticipation, ceased on the death of the husband to be subject to that restraint, and became separate property acquired after the date of the contract within the meaning of the sub-section. In my judgment that is not so, because I think that the words apply to married women and not to widows, and apply only to all separate property which the married woman and not the widow may thereafter acquire. The learned counsel for the plaintiffs also says that the 5th section gives a larger right to the creditors. That section provides that every woman married before the commencement of this Act shall be entitled to have and to hold, and to dispose of, as her separate property all real and personal property her title to which, whether vested or contingent, and whether in possession, reversion, or remainder, shall accrue after the commencement of this Act, and it is contended that by the operation of this section, when the periodical payment of income comes due from this property and comes into the hands of the wife, it is immediately liable for the payment of this debt. I do not think that so large a change was contemplated by the Legislature, because, if it were so, this section would practically do away with all restraints upon anticipation, or, at any rate, with the larger part of their value. In my opinion, also, this section is confined to property the title to which accrued after the passing of the Act and does not apply to this property. Then, with respect to the 19th section, I entertain no doubt that the whole of the latter part relates to settlements made after the passing of this Act, and has no operation on settlements which were in existence at the time the Act was passed.

The other part of the argument also presents some difficulty; but on consideration I do not think that this settlement was voluntary. At the time it was effected there were no children of the marriage, and the birth of issue is of the essence of tenancy by the curtesy. The operation, therefore, of the settlement was to give the husband an immediate life estate on the death of the wife, whether there were children of the marriage or not, while he, on the other hand, submitted to the condition that in any case his life estate should cease on bankruptcy, a restraint which would seriously hamper the use of it by him for the purpose of raising money on it. The mere fact that a settlement is voluntary is not enough of itself to make the settlement void under the statute of Elizabeth. It is, however, an important element in determining the question, and it is the only ground upon which the settlement has been attached in this case. It has not been suggested that there was a de facto intention to cheat creditors worked out through the machinery of a settlement. As, therefore, I am of opinion that the settlement is not voluntary, the groundwork of the attack upon it, in my opinion, fails, and I think, therefore, that the order appointing a receiver must be set aside.

LANCASTER BURIAL BOARD v. M'GOUGH. (a.)

Burial board—"Exclusive right of burial"—Burial Acts (16 & 17 Vict. c. 134 incorporating part of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85)—Glass shade placed on grave by grantee of grave—Removal by board—Right of board to make rules.

Although section 33 of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85 authorizes a burial board to sell the exclusive right of burial in any part of their burial-ground, this grant does not include the right to place anything on the grave (such as a glass shade) which the board may object to. The board have full jurisdiction, under section 38, to manage, regulate, and control their burial-ground.

This was an appeal by the Lancaster Burial Board against the decision of the judge of the county court of Lancashire holden at Lancaster.

The respondent had obtained damages in the county court from the appellants for removing from a grave in Lancaster Cemetery, the property of the respondent, and converting to their own use a glass shade and galvanized wire guard, the property of the respondent. The respondent had placed the glass shade and other objects on the grave without the permission of the appellants, who had for upwards of ten years declined to admit shades and stands. The appellants removed the same from the grave and placed them elsewhere, which fact they communicated to the respondent.

The grave was in the unconsecrated part of the cemetery. The property which the respondent had in it depended on a grant from the burial board, which granted "unto the said James M'Gough the exclusive right of burial in the grave space, . . . to hold the same, to him, his heirs and assigns, in perpetuity for the purpose of burial, subject, nevertheless, to the payment of the fees or sums reserved by the Burial Acts (16 & 17 Vict. c. 134, incorporating sections 10 to 42, inclusive, of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85), and also subject to the regulations now in force or which may hereafter be issued with regard to interments in the said cemetery by her Majesty's Secretary of State or by the said board or any other competent authority."

R. O. B. Lane, for the appellants.—The grant to the respondent was for "the exclusive right of burial only." By section 33 of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, "any burial board, under such restrictions and conditions as they think proper, may sell the exclusive right of burial . . . in any part of any burial-ground possessed by such board, and also the right of constructing any vault or place of burial, . . . and also the right of erecting and placing any monumental gravestone, tablet, or monumental inscription in such burial ground." Section 38 of the same Act vests the general management, regulation, and control in the burial board. The regulations of the Secretary of State do not prohibit the glass shade and other objects from being placed on the grave, but the same were removed by the board under the justification of their general power to regulate the cemetery. The county court judge assumed that the respondent had a property in the grave beyond the mere right of burial. The objects placed on the grave were unobjectionable as such, but the broken glass from similar objects is very dangerous. The board were clearly within their rights under section 38.

He cited Matthews v. Jeffrey, 29 W. R. 282, 6 Q. B. D. 291, and Ashby v. Harris, 16 W. R. 869, L. R. 3 C. P. 523.

it. If there is any abuse in the character of the emblems there is an appeal to the Ordinary. This grave is in the unconsecrated portion of the cemetery, and there is nothing in the regulations to prevent the shade and other objects from being placed on it. A grant of a right to bury includes a right to the grantee to do all customary acts in respect thereof. The grant is doubtless subject to the rules of the board, but such rules must be reasonable, and the board must be kept under proper control.

He cited Spooner v. Brewster, 3 Bing. 136.

WILLS, J.—The judgment of the county court judge was wrong. It is true that the right of the board to make rules may or may not lead to abuses, but the question is what did the appellants convey to the grantee. They granted him the "exclusive right of burial" in the grave space, and the grant is confined by those words. I cannot conceive that these words can be extended to include anything else. The right to place glass shades or other things on the grave is not included in this grant. In Ashby v. Harris the grant was in perpetuity with the right to keep a monument in repair. That case is not an authority to extend the rights of the grantee under the present circumstances. Section 33 of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, confers a power on the board to grant a grave for the right of burial only, and the rules of the board contain nothing analogous to the grants in Ashby v. Harris. Spooner v. Brewster is not in point.

GRANTHAM, J.—I concur in the judgment of my brother Wills, but I wish to add that the act of the board in removing the shade and other objects must have been very painful to the feelings of the respondent, and I wish that the board had not stretched their rights to such an extent. However, they had the legal right to do so.

REG. v. BECKLEY AND OTHERS. (a.)

Commitment for trial by justices of division other than that in which offence committed—Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), s. 22.

A person charged with an offence committed in one petty sessional division of a county may be committed for trial by the justices acting for any other division of the same county.

At a general court of quarter sessions of the peace in and for the county of Cambridge the defendants had been tried and convicted upon an indictment charging them with conspiracy.

When they were called upon to plead it had been objected by counsel that the indictment ought to be quashed, as the provisions of the Vexatious Indictments Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 17), s. 1, which, it was conceded, applied to the offence charged in the indictment, had not been complied with.

The offence with which the defendants were charged was committed at Swaffham Prior, in the county of Cambridge, a place within the petty sessional division of Bottisham, in the said county.

The defendants were arrested at various places not within the county upon a warrant, which recited that information had been laid of an offence committed in the parish of Swaffham Prior, and commanded the constables of Cambridgeshire to apprehend the defendants and bring them before the justices at Bottisham.

The justice who signed this warrant resided and usually acted within the petty sessional division of Cambridge, in the said county.

The defendants were, on the 6th of July, remanded by a justice of the peace for the county residing within and usually acting for the said Cambridge division of that county, and ordered by his warrant to be brought up on the 9th of July at the Shire Hall, Chesterton, the place for holding the petty sessions for the division of Cambridge within the said county, and on the said 9th of July the case was partly gone into and they were further remanded until the 16th of July to the same petty sessional division. On the 16th of July further evidence was given on behalf of the prosecution at the petty sessions held at Chesterton aforesaid, when it was for the first time objected on behalf of the defendants that the justices sitting at Chesterton had no jurisdiction to hear and determine a case arising within another petty sessional division—viz., at Bottisham—and that the justices were bound to remand the case for hearing at Bottisham according to the terms of the warrant. The justices overruled the objection, and sitting within the petty sessional division of Cambridge, holden at Chesterton, heard and determined the case and committed the defendants for trial. Of the justices who so heard and determined the case one only was a justice who resided within and occasionally acted within the Bottisham petty sessional division.

It was contended on the part of the defendants that by virtue of 9 Geo. 4, c. 43, s. 6, it was not competent for the justices sitting at the Cambridge petty sessional divisional of Chesterton to hear or determine or to send for trial a case arising within another petty sessional division of the county, and that the justice, in remanding the defendants on the 6th of July to the Cambridge division, was acting without jurisdiction, and that for these reasons the provisions of the Vexatious Indictments Act had not been complied with, consequently that the indictment ought to be quashed.

The chairman overruled the objection and refused to quash the indictment, and the question for this court was whether he was right in law in so holding.

Cooper, for the defendants, submitted the same objection to the commitment as in the court below.—The duty of the committing justice is defined by the 22nd section of Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), when a person is charged before him with an offence committed in another place than that in which such justice has jurisdiction. He should, if the evidence is sufficient to put the accused party on trial, "order him to be taken before some justice or justices of the peace in and for the county or place where and near unto the place where the offence is alleged to have been committed." Here the offence was committed within the petty sessional division of Bottisham, the remand to the petty sessional division of Cambridge was irregular and illegal, and the commitment was also illegal. It may be admitted that the justices, being justices for the county, were competent to deal with the case if it had been properly brought before them; but here, by the express terms of the warrant, the defendants were ordered to be taken to the Bottisham Petty Sessions, not to the Cambridge Petty Sessions. The 9 Geo. 4, c. 43, s. 6, defines the jurisdiction of justices at petty sessions, and provides for the determination of all matters within the division.

No counsel appeared for the Crown.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this con-vision was right. The objection is that the offence of conspiracy is, under the Vexatious Indictments Act, one of the offences which are not to be triable at sessions without certain previous authorization, the authorization in this case being the commitment by the justices of the petty sessional division of Cambridge, whereas it is argued that the proper justices to commit for trial would have been the justices habitually acting for the division in or near which the offence was alleged to have been committed. Authority for this contention is attempted to be invoked from an act which is applicable to cases of an offence committed in one county and for which the arrest takes place in another.

This case stands upon quite a different principle, inasmuch as the committing justices have admittedly jurisdiction in the county. Here the offence is committed and everything takes place within the county of Cambridge, and it matters not in what division of the county the offence was committed provided it is not an offence which by any statute is specially directed to be tried by the magistrates acting within that division. It is the first occasion on which this point has been taken, and I am glad it is taken and set at rest by the unanimous decision of this court.

But it is clear that there is nothing in the objection. The committal under the Vexatious Indictments Act has been duly sanctioned by two justices of the county, and he prisoners have been quite properly tried.

POLLOCK, B.—I would add that the argument founded on the 9 Geo. 4, c. 43, s. 6, presupposes that that statute was intended to limit the powers of justices in the county. But from the preamble it is clear that the Act was passed for the regulation of the contemplated new petty sessional divisions. Without express words the law is very jealous not to cut down the authority of magistrates; and I do not in that Act find any express words having the effect contended for. I think the conviction should be affirmed.

MANISTY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was contended that the 22nd section of Jervis's Act defined, at least by analogy, the duty of the justices in this case. I do not think the case provided for by that Act is in the least analogous: it provides for the case of a person arrested in one county for an offence committed in another. There is no statutory provision whatever for the case of an offence committed in one division of a county and brought for hearing before the justices of another division of the same county.

HAWKINS and A. L. SMITH, JJ., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

A solicitor employed by the vendor in connection with a sale of property is only entitled to be paid in respect of business connected with the sale the scale fees prescribed in part 1 of schedule 1 to the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881.

Therefore, where the sale is by public auction, and the commission to the auctioneer is paid by the vendor, the solicitor is only entitled to be paid the "deducing fee," and is not entitled to be paid remuneration in respect of other business done by him in connection with the sale.

In re Faulkner, ante, p. 59, 36 Ch. D. 566, overruled.

Appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court refusing to order a review of taxation of costs.

In 1886 Mr. Newbould, a solicitor in London, was employed by Mr. Bailward in connection with the sale of certain freehold property in Gloucestershire. Except as to a small part which was sold by private contract, and as to which no question was raised, the property was sold by public auction in fourteen lots, the auctioneer being employed and his commission paid by the vendor, and not by the solicitor. Mr. Newbould (who had not given notice of election, under General Order, clause 6, to be paid otherwise than according to the prescribed scale) delivered his bill of costs, in which he made various charges for writing letters and making certain journeys in connection with the sale, attending and instructing the auctioneer as to the sale, making list of tenants and their holdings to enable the auctioneer to go over the property and prepare for sale, sending to auctioneer copy plan of estate and extract from valuation as to proposed division into lots, perusing and approving posting bill announcing sale as prepared by auctioneer, drawing list of reserve prices for each lot, sending copies of particulars and conditions of sale, attending auctioneer, attending the auction in Gloucestershire, and preparing and getting contracts signed, and receiving deposits. Upon taxation the master allowed the scale fee for "deducing title," but disallowed all these items without going into the propriety of each. Mr. Newbould carried in objections to the disallowance on the ground that the taxing master having decided that Mr. Newbould, as vendor's solicitor, was not entitled to any negotiating or conducting fee, the above charges for work done were fair and reasonable, and could not be said to be covered by the fee for deducing title.

In answer to the objections the taxing master said:—"I have considered the above objections and adhere to the disallowance of the items referred to therein. It appears to me that the principle laid down by Chitty, J., and the Court of Appeal in In re Field, 54 L. J. Ch. 661, decides this question."

The Divisional Court (Stephen and Charles, JJ.), affirming the order of the judge in chambers, dismissed a summons to review the taxation.

Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., and F. C. Philips, for the appellant.—The taxing master only allowed a "deducing fee" and certain out-of-pocket expenses. The solicitor is not entitled to a "conducting fee," as the auctioneer was paid by the client, but he is entitled to charge for work properly done by him in connection with the sale, and for which the auctioneer has not been paid: In re Faulkner, ante, p. 59, 36 Ch. D. 566; General Order, clause 2 (c), clause 4. The work is not within the scale, and so the solicitor must be paid reasonable remuneration for it. The cases of In re Field, 33 W. R. 553, 29 Ch. D. 608, and In re Emanuel & Simmonds, 34 W. R. 613, 33 Ch. D. 40, were cases of leases, and the decisions are not applicable to sales.

Cock, Q.C., and Cyril Dodd, for the respondent.—In re Faulkner is not consistent with the other cases. The scale is intended to include all charges; and if the solicitor was not satisfied with that he might have made a special agreement under clause 6. "Auctioneer's charges" in clause 4 can only mean charges which the solicitor may have had to pay outside the conduct of the sale; they cannot cover these charges.

Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The solicitor in this case was employed in regard to a sale of his client's property. The sale was carried out, and the question for us to determine is, How is the solicitor entitled to be paid in respect of such employment? The remuneration of a solicitor "in respect of business connected with sales" is regulated by the General Order, clause 2 (a). He is to be paid the remuneration prescribed in part 1 of schedule 1 to that order. In the case of In re Field the Court of Appeal in effect decided that in respect of all business connected with leases the remuneration of the solicitor having the conduct of the business was to be that, and that alone, prescribed in part 2 of schedule 1, and that the solicitor was to be paid in no other way. That view was challenged in argument in In re Emanuel & Simmonds, where Mr. Charles says that "Pearson, J., seems to have read In re Field as deciding that all business connected with a lease comes within the scale fee, but the case does not decide that." The answer given to that by Cotton, L.J., is that "the remuneration for all business connected with the lease is to be included in the ad valorem remuneration." He then goes on:—"To my mind the only question we have here is this: whether in this particular case it can be said that this agreement, or anything in it, is anything but business connected with the lease?" That is the question which we have to settle if the same rule applies to sales as to leases. It is said, however, that the case of a sale is different from the case of a lease. It seems to me, looking at the language of clause 2, that the same interpretation must be given to 2 (a) as to 2 (b). The language of the two is almost identical. Reading that rule subject to the interpretation placed upon it in those cases, it seems to me that the only question is whether these are charges in respect of business connected with the sale. If that is answered in the affirmative the solicitor is entitled to be paid solely in accordance with the scale in the schedule.

The decision of North, J., in In re Faulkner is, no doubt, contrary to this view. North, J., says, "The question, then, is this: the solicitor having done certain work for which, if he had paid the auctioneer himself, he would clearly be entitled to receive the scale fee, is he not to be paid for that work at all because the auctioneer has been paid by the client?" That is the question which he puts. How does he answer it? "I think that case is not provided for by rule 11. The scale fee for 'conducting' does not apply, because the auctioneer has been paid by the client, but that leaves the solicitor entitled to remuneration for doing those parts of the work of 'conducting the sale' for which the auctioneer has not been paid." It seems to me that this last sentence from the word "but" to the end is directly in the teeth of the decisions in the Court of Appeal. I can see no ground for giving a construction to 2 (a) different from that given to 2 (b). The scale is in each case made applicable in precisely the same words.

The only question remaining is whether this was business connected with the sale. It was scarcely urged that it was not. The solicitor, therefore, is only entitled to be paid according to the scale fees prescribed in part 1 of schedule 1. When he brings himself within the scale, he is to be paid according to the scale; but if he cannot bring himself within the scale, he cannot be paid according to the scale, and so cannot be paid at all. The solicitor has brought himself within the scale as to the "deducing fee"; he has not brought himself within the scale as to the "conducting fee," because the client has paid the commission to the auctioneer. The solicitor, in fine, is only to be paid according to the scale, and only according to that part of the scale within which he can bring himself. We disagree, therefore, with the decision in In re Faulkner, and we think that this appeal should be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

FRY, L.J.—I entirely concur.

half-yearly instalments, consisting partly of principal and partly of interest, calculated so as to pay off the whole debt and interest in twenty-five years,

Held, that, inasmuch as the improvements were such as were authorized by the Act of 1882, the trustees might from time to time apply capital in their hands in payment of such part of the instalments as should consist of capital, but that the tenant for life must keep down the interest.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application for liberty to apply capital in the redemption or otherwise providing for the payment of a rent-charge under the Settled Land Acts Amendment Act, 1887, s. 1. The summons asked for a declaration that any money now or hereafter in the hands of the trustees of the settlement created by the will of Lord Sudeley (being capital money or money applicable as capital money under the Settled Land Act, 1882) might properly be from time to time applied in payment of instalments or proportionate repayments of a loan of £2,704 due to the Lands Improvement Co.

Under the will the present Lord Sudeley was tenant for life of the estates. On the 15th of May, 1879, the Inclosure Commissioners, in pursuance of the Lands Improvement Co.'s Acts, made an absolute order charging the inheritance of the settled lands with the payment to the company of the yearly sum of £176 13s. payable half-yearly, being a proportionate repayment of the loan of £2,704 for the improvement of the estate with interest at £4 5s. per cent. per annum. The instalments were arranged in the usual form in such a manner that part of the £88 6s. 6d. payable half-yearly represented capital, and the rest represented interest. The first payment consisted of £30 17s. 4d. capital, and £57 9s. 2d. interest, and the payments of capital were increased and those of interest diminished till the last instalment, which would be payable on the 25th of March, 1904, and would consist of £86 9s. 9d. capital and £1 16s. 9d. interest.

Inasmuch as the tenant for life would be entitled to the interest on the capital in the hands of the trustees the proposed payments would not affect the remainderman.

The improvements had been carried out and consisted of drainage works, and Lord Sudeley, who had hitherto paid the whole of the instalments, now asked that in future that portion of them which represented capital might be paid out of capital in the hands of the trustees of the settled land.

Haldane, for the summons.—This is an application under the Act of 1887, and the question is whether payment of the instalments of this rent-charge as they become due is within the words of section 1, "otherwise providing for the payment thereof." Drains are authorized improvements under sections 21 and 25 of the Act of 1882; and under section 28 and section 2 of the Act of 1887 the tenant for life has to repair them. [KAY, J.—Section 66 of the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, says that the tenant for life must keep down rent-charges.] That was the view of the Court of Appeal in In re Knatchbull's Settled Estate, 33 W. R. 569, 29 Ch. D. 588, but the Act of 1887 was passed expressly to obviate the effect of that decision. I would ask to have the interest paid out of capital also, and for leave to amend the summons with that object. [KAY, J.—I do not think you can do that. You get the benefit of the discount as it is, if the capital is paid.]

KAY, J.—I think it may be done, assuming, of course, that the improvements which have been made are within the Settled Land Act, 1882, and that, the trustees tell me, is the case. That being so, I think the words of the Act of 1887 are sufficient to justify the trustees in applying capital moneys in their hands, or which may come to their hands, in paying such portion of the instalments due to the Lands Improvement Co. as represent capital: but I do not think it would be right for them to pay the interest on the unpaid portion of the loan for the time being. The Act does not seem to apply to interest on the unpaid portion of capital expended on improvements, and I think the tenant for life ought to keep down the interest. The Act of 1887 was not intended for that, and it is going pretty far to relieve the tenant for life from paying the capital expended in such improvements as drainage; because, as everybody knows, you cannot maintain or repair drainpipes, except to a very slight extent, you can only do the work over again when it is exhausted, and that has to be done frequently. However, that is covered by the fact that it is one of the things that may, under section 25 of the Act of 1882, be done out of capital money. I think that the remainderman will not be injured any more than he is intended by the Act to be injured if the trustees pay the money in this way instead of having originally spent a lump sum in drainage.

Summons allowed.

Judgment—Foreign judgment—Domicile—Legitimacy according to law of domicile.

Although the parties claiming to be entitled to the estate of a deceased person may not be bound to resort to the tribunal of the country in which the testator was domiciled, and although the courts of this country may be called upon to administer the estate of a deceased person domiciled abroad, and in such case may be bound to ascertain as best they can who, according to the law of the domicile, are entitled to that estate, yet, where the title has been adjudicated upon in the country to the courts of which the question is referable by the law of the domicile, such adjudication is binding, and must be followed by the courts of this country.

A foreign judgment cannot, as between the same parties, be impeached in this country on the ground that it proceeded on a mistake of law.

A foreign judgment binds, notwithstanding the discovery of fresh evidence, for the courts of this country will not either re-hear cases tried by, or hear appeals from, foreign tribunals; and if the judgment of a foreign court is erroneous, the regular mode provided by every system of jurisprudence, of procuring it to be examined and reversed, ought to be followed.

Administration action.

The testator, who died possessed of personal property in England, Switzerland, Italy, and elsewhere, was by birth an Englishman. He died in France, where he was domiciled, and (as Stirling, J., found) a Swiss by nationality.

According to the French law (that of his domicile), the law to be applied in dealing with the right to his personal property was that of his nationality, and by the effect of the treaty of November 2, 1869, between France and Switzerland, it had in the present case (that of a Swiss by nationality dying in France) to be applied by the Swiss tribunals.

(a.) Reported by HENRY T. LAW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Under the Swiss law the plaintiff, if he were, as he alleged, the testator's only legitimate child, was entitled to nine-tenths of his succession. The defendant, who claimed under the will, was concerned to dispute the plaintiff's legitimacy.

Litigation relating to the plaintiff's legitimacy between the plaintiff and the defendant commenced in Switzerland in 1879, and proceeded with varying success until, on February 5, 1884, the District Court of Zurich decided in favour of the plaintiff's legitimacy. It appears that on this occasion the court invoked the aid of the provisions of the French law, because the Swiss and cantonal laws contained no directions as to whether the proof of legitimate birth could be afforded by any other means than the civil registers, which registers gave no elucidation of the legitimacy of the birth in the present case, no marriage certificate having been discovered.

By the Code Civil, Art. 197, it is provided that where there exist children of two deceased persons who lived publicly as husband and wife, the legitimacy of the children cannot be disputed merely on the ground of the non-production of the act of celebration of marriage in cases where this legitimacy is proved by the actual enjoyment of a status which is not contradicted by the acte de naissance.

The plaintiff's acte de naissance at Naples referred to a declaration by the testator stating the plaintiff to be born to him by the plaintiff's mother, the testator's lawful wife. There was put in a declaration of absence as to the mother of the plaintiff under Code Civil, 115 and 119, which the court accepted in lieu of proof of her death, and there was proof of the testator and the plaintiff's mother having lived openly as husband and wife in 1819—1821.

On May 19, 1885, the Zurich Court of Appeal went into some further evidence, and decided that the question of the "family rights" or status of the plaintiff was to be decided according to English law, and that, according to that law, a presumption of legitimacy arose from the parents of a child (as was the fact) when recording the birth in the registry of births or of baptisms describing the child as lawful and themselves as husband and wife, so that the burthen of proof does not lie upon the child to prove his legitimacy, but upon the party who disputes it to prove his illegitimacy. Starting from this basis, the court came to the conclusion that certain entries in the Neapolitan Registers of Births and Baptisms afforded a sufficient proof of the legitimacy of the plaintiff, subject to evidence to the contrary being given, and, the defendant having failed to adduce such proof to the contrary, the court affirmed the decision of the Court of First Instance in favour of the plaintiff's legitimacy. Subsequent proceedings failed to disturb this decision, including an attempt to obtain an alteration of the judgment, in view of the discovery of proof of the marriage of the mother of the plaintiff, in 1825, during the lifetime of the testator, who gave her on that occasion a dowry of 1,000 ducats.

The testator married in 1840 Carolina Shulthess; the plaintiff's mother, as was discovered later, died in 1864.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, alleged that the judgment of the Zurich Court of Appeal of the 19th of May, 1885, was a judgment in rem binding on the defendant and conclusive in this country, and asked to have it enforced accordingly.

This report deals only with the question as to how far the Swiss judgments were enforceable in this country.

Everitt, Q.C., and Curtis Price, for the plaintiff.—The testator was a Swiss subject. The Swiss judgments are binding here by the comity of Courts. By analogy to the English law on this point they are binding, although they may have been given upon a mistaken view of the English law. Castrique v. Imrie, L. R. 4 H. L. 414, 18 W. R. H. L. Dig. 6, 7; Godard v. Gray, 19 W. R. 348, L. R. 6 Q. B. 139. It appears from the evidence that the parties submitted to the jurisdiction of that court. If the matter were res integra the court would have to ascertain the law of France, the country of the testator's domicile and then it would be informed that the rights of succession were regulated according to the Swiss law and by the Swiss tribunals, the law of the testator's nationality: Doglioni v. Crispin, L. R. 1 H. L. 301, 15 W. R. H. L. Dig. 8. The judgment of the Swiss court as to the legitimacy relates to status, and is a judgment in rem. It is therefore binding everywhere: Niboyet v. Niboyet, 27 W. R. 203, 4 P. D. 1. There is ample evidence of the plaintiff's legitimacy: Slaney v. Wade, 1 My. & Cr. 338, 357; Monkton v. Attorney-General, 2 Russ. & My. 147; Lord Braybroke v. Inskip, 8 Ves. 416, 429: Piers v. Piers, 2 H. L. Cas. 331; De Thoren v. Attorney-General, 1 App. Cas. 686, 25 W. R. Dig. 427; Lyle v. Ellwood, 23 W. R. 157, L. R. 19 Eq. 98; even if the testator thought that he remained a British subject, that would not prevent him from acquiring a foreign domicile: Whicker v. Hume, 13 Beav. 366. The matter is res judicata, and no fresh evidence can be received: In re May, Ex parte House, 32 W. R. 337, 25 Ch. D. 231; Marriott v. Hampton, 7 T. R. 269. The English courts cannot examine and review the judgment of a foreign court: Henderson v. Henderson, 6 Q. B. 288; Geyer v. Aguilar, 7 T. R. 681; De Cosse Brissac v. Rathbone, 6 H. & N. 301, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 37; Castrique v. Behrens, 30 L. J. Q. B. 163, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 37; Messina v. Petrococchino, 20 W. R. 451, L. R. 4 P. C. 144. This court is not a court to hear appeals from the courts of Zurich if the decisions of those courts are wrong, they ought to be reviewed by the tribunals of that country.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Nasmith, for the defendant.—The testator died in France a British subject, and his estate ought to be administered according to English law, and the plaintiff is excluded by the will. The Swiss courts confessed themselves incompetent to deal with the matter, and they had recourse to French law. They, therefore, had no jurisdiction, and there is no judgment of a competent court to enforce. The testator considered that the plaintiff's mother was not his wife, as he subsequently married, and in favour of that subsequent marriage being a valid marriage there is both cohabitation and interest, and against it there is only a rumour of a former marriage. A case of this kind must be looked at altogether, and according to all the circumstances: Andrewes v. Uthwatt, 2 Times L. R. 895. All the facts should have been before the foreign court: Castrique v. Imrie. The evidence came before the courtpiecemeal. If it had all come before the court at one time, is it not probable that the result would have been different?: Godard v. Gray. Our courts have never accepted the judgment of a foreign court on a question of the validity of a marriage, which is the real question here: Sinclair v. Sinclair, 1 Hagg. Cons. Rep. 294, 297. Not every decision in rem is binding: De Mora v. Concha, 33 W. R. 846, 29 Ch. D. 268; Abouloff v. Oppenheim, 31 W. R. 429, 10 Q. B. D. 295. The testator never having acquired any other nationality, it remained British: Phillimore's International Law, 3rd ed., vol. 1, p. 183, 446; Wheaton's International Law, 2nd ed., p. 109.

July 26.—Stirling, J. [after referring to Enohin v. Wylie, 10 W. R. 467, 10 H. L. Cas. at p. 13; Ewing v. Orr Ewing, 10 App. Cas. 502; and Doglioni v. Crispin continued]:—The rule to be extracted from these cases appears to be this, that although the parties claiming to be entitled to the estate of a deceased person may not be bound to resort to the tribunal of the country in which the testator was domiciled, and although the courts of this country may be called upon to administer the estate of a deceased person domiciled abroad, and in such case may be bound to ascertain as best they can who, according to the law of the domicile, are entitled to that estate, yet where the title has been adjudicated upon by the courts of the domicile such adjudication is binding, and must be followed by the courts of this country. [His lordship having dealt with the question of Swiss nationality, and found that the testator died Swiss, continued:—]

The testator's nationality, then, being Swiss at the time of his death, it follows that the Zurich tribunals are those which, according to the law of the testator's domicile, have jurisdiction to decide on the right of succession to his estate. This being so, I have here an advantage similar to that which the court had in Doglioni v. Crispin, that the claim of the party litigating in this court has been actually raised and decided in the courts which, according to the law of the testator's domicile, were the proper and competent tribunals to decide on the right. Those tribunals have decided that the plaintiff is entitled to nine-tenths of the testator's personal estate of which the funds which form the subject-matter of the present action are part. And in accordance with the principle laid down in Doglioni v. Crispin I consider I am bound by their decision.

Various objections have, however, been raised to this decision, and on them it may be right that I should say a few words.

First it is said that the decision is founded on English law, and that the foreign tribunals have taken an erroneous view of our law. The complaint in substance is to this effect. It was said that an improper weight was attached to these documents, that the tribunal dealt with them as establishing a primâ facie case on behalf of the plaintiff which it was incumbent on the defendant to displace, whereas the true mode of dealing with the evidence was that indicated by Chitty, J., in Andrews v. Uthwatt, where he said that "it was an erroneous mode of trying such a case as that before him by picking out a few facts and isolating them, and thus to endeavour to raise from them a presumption of marriage, and then challenge the other side to produce evidence to the contrary, at the same time arguing that the other side was required by law to produce so strong a case as to render it reasonably impossible that a marriage did take place. The proper mode was rather to take the evidence as a whole and thus to see whether the presumption of marriage was sufficiently rebutted."

To this it was answered that there was nothing in the proceedings of the foreign courts so inconsistent with English law as to render it improper to recognize or enforce their judgments in this country, and that in truth and substance the Zurich Court of Appeal did, in the judgment of the 2nd of October, 1886, deal with all the facts and arrive at an honest and fair conclusion adverse to the defendant. This observation appears to be of considerable weight, but I do not consider it necessary to determine whether it is to any extent well founded, for it was further urged, and it appears to me correctly, that it is established by the decisions in Castrique v. Imrie and Godard v. Gray that a foreign judgment cannot, as between the same parties, be impeached in this country on the ground that it proceeded on a mistake as to the English law. In the former case Lord Blackburn, then Mr. Justice Blackburn, in advising the House of Lords [L. R. 4 H. L., at p. 434], said:—"We think . . . that all that can be required of the tribunal that has to decide a question of foreign law is that it should receive and consider all the evidence as to what foreign law is and bonâ fide determine on that as well as it can." And Lord Hatherley says this (at p. 445):—"Without expressing any opinion (for I purposely wish to avoid doing so) with reference to a decision of my own, which has been cited in the case of Simpson v. Fogo, as to what might be done in the case of a court wilfully determining that it will not, according to the usual comity, recognize the law of other nations, when clearly and plainly put before it, without saying anything as to what would justify the courts in our own country in hesitating to give effect to a foreign judgment if obtained by fraud or misrepresentation, it is enough for me to say upon the present occasion that in this case the whole of the facts appear to have been inquired into by the French courts judicially, honestly, and with the intention to arrive at the right conclusion, and, having heard the facts as stated before them, they came to a conclusion which justified them in France in deciding as they did decide." Then at page 448 Lord Colonsay says:—"It appears to me that we cannot enter into any inquiry as to whether the French courts proceeded correctly either as to their own course of procedure or their own law, nor whether, under the circumstances, they took the proper means of satisfying themselves with respect to the view they took of the English law. Nor can we inquire whether they were right in their views of the English law. The question is whether, under the circumstances of the case, dealing with it fairly, the original tribunal did proceed against the ship and did order the sale of the ship." Then, in Godard v. Gray, Blackburn, J., after citing the above passage from Lord Hatherley's speech, proceeds to examine certain dicta and opinions to the effect that the defendant in an action on a foreign judgment is at liberty to show that the judgment was founded on a mistake, and he concludes this portion of the judgment of himself and Mellor, J., as follows:—"The decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench in The Bank of Australasia v. Nias, of the Court of Common Pleas in The Bank of Australasia v. Harding, and of the Court of Exchequer in De Cosse Brissac v. Rathbone seem to us to leave it no longer open to contend, unless in a court of error, that a foreign judgment can be impeached on the ground that it was erroneous on the merits or to set up as a defence to an action upon it that the tribunal mistook either the facts or the law." He then proceeds to discuss the doctrine laid down by the learned author of Smith's Leading Cases, that, "if the judgment appear on the face of the proceedings to be founded on a mistaken view of the English law, it is not conclusive," and he holds it not to be well founded.

This view appears from Schibsby v. Westenholz, L. R. 6 Q. B. 155, at p. 159, to have subsequently met with the approval of Mr. Justice Lush. It must be stated, however, that Hannen, J., in Godard v. Gray did not agree in the reasoning of Blackburn and Mellor, JJ.; at page 154 he says this:—"I do not think that any authority binds us, nor am I prepared to decide that a defendant not guilty of any laches, against whom a foreign judgment in personam has been given, is precluded from impeaching it on the ground that it appears on the face of the proceedings to be based on an incorrect view of the English law, even though there may be no evidence that the foreign court knowingly or perversely refused to recognize that law. I do not, however, enter at length upon the consideration of this question, because I have arrived at the conclusion that the defendants in this case were guilty of laches. It does not appear on the face of the proceedings, nor at all, that the French court was informed of what the English law was. It was the duty of the defendants to bring to the knowledge of the French court the provision of the English law on which they now, for the first time, rely, and, having failed to do so, they must submit to the consequences of their own negligence. The French courts, like our own, can only be informed of foreign law by appropriate evidence, and the party who fails to produce it cannot impeach the judgment obtained against him on account of an error into which the foreign court has fallen, presumably in consequence of his own default." It appears to me that this applies to the present case. The defendant did not, so far as appears, take any step to produce to the Zurich tribunals evidence as to the English law on which he now relies, and having failed to do so he must take the consequences of the error (if error there be) into which those tribunals have fallen. It was said, however, that the whole of the facts were not before the Zurich courts when the judgment of May 19, 1885 (that relied on by the plaintiff in his statement of claim) was given, and that the cases of Castrique v. Imrie and Godard v. Gray show that all the facts must be brought before the foreign tribunal. In support of this argument the language of Lord Hatherley in Castrique v. Imrie, cited in Godard v. Gray, at p. 449, was relied on.

The passage is, "The whole of the facts appear to have been inquired into by the French courts judicially, honestly, and with the intention to arrive at the right conclusion; and, having heard the facts as stated before them, they came to a conclusion which justified them in France in deciding as they did decide." I am of opinion, however, that the language of the very learned judges, when fairly construed, does not warrant the conclusion sought to be derived from it—a conclusion which seems to me not to be in accordance with the decision in De Cosse Brissac v. Rathbone, which is cited by Lord Blackburn as being one of the cases that governed the court of first instance. In that case the fifth plea was as follows:—"The defendant further says that the enforcement of the said judgment in England is contrary to natural justice on the following grounds:—That since the hearing of the said suit in which the said judgment was pronounced, and after the pronouncing of the said judgment, the defendants have discovered fresh evidence that was not known to them, or either of them, before the pronouncing of the said judgment, and which, with reasonable diligence, they could not have discovered before the pronouncing of the said judgment, and which said evidence shows and proves that the said judgment is erroneous in fact and law on the merits." This plea was overruled. This is the judgment of Martin, B.:—"We are all of opinion that this question is so concluded by the authorities that it is impossible for us to decide contrary to them, and the case must go to a court of error. I may observe that the question does not come before me for the first time; for many years past I have had occasion to consider it." Consequently, this is a decision that a foreign judgment binds, notwithstanding the discovery of fresh evidence, and, consequently, although the whole of the facts were not before the foreign tribunals, no reasons are given, but the grounds of the decision do not appear to be far to seek. The principle on which the Bank of Australasia v. Nias, 16 Q. B. 717, was decided appears to be that the courts of this country do not sit to hear appeals from foreign tribunals, and that if the judgment of a foreign court is erroneous the regular mode provided by every system of jurisprudence of procuring it to be examined and reversed ought to be followed. Neither do the courts of this country sit to rehear cases which have been tried abroad. Every system of jurisprudence provides a mode by which a judgment may be reversed and a cause reheard on the discovery of fresh evidence, and to the regular mode so provided recourse ought to be had, as, in fact, has been unsuccessfully done by the defendant in the present case. It was further said that the courts of this country will not accept as conclusive the decision of a foreign court as to the validity of a marriage, and in support of this proposition the case of Sinclair v. Sinclair was relied on. Whether this proposition is or is not well founded it does not appear to me to apply, for this court is not called on to give effect to a decision of a foreign court as to the validity of a marriage, but as to the right of succession to the estate of a testator.

Lastly, it is said that the judgment of the Zurich Court of the 5th of February, 1884, if not contrary to natural justice, shows at all events on the face of it an admission of incompetence to decide the question at issue, inasmuch as it is there laid down that Swiss law contains no provisions applicable to the case, and consequently the court had recourse to French law. I understand this simply to mean that, failing to find any express provisions in the Swiss law, the court, in arriving at its decisions, was guided by the French law, which they say is, on this subject, the mother of modern law. In like manner our own courts, in the absence of express decision, are sometimes guided by Roman law, in accordance with what is laid down by Parke, B., in the case of Acton v. Blundell, 12 M. & W. 324, at p. 353. But, however this may be, it does not lie with the defendant now to raise this objection, for it is stated that, whatever their motives may be, both parties expressly consented to its application. I am of opinion, therefore, that effect ought not to be given to the defendant's objection to the decisions of the Swiss tribunals, and that they are binding on this court and ought to be recognized and have effect given to them in the distribution of the testator's estate. There will be a declaration to the effect adopted by Sir Cresswell Cresswell in the case of Doglioni v. Crispin, that the judgment of the Zurich District Court of the 5th of February, 1884, affirmed by the Zurich Court of Appeal, is, and ought to be deemed and taken as, of legal force and effect in this action, and that regard ought to be had thereto in the distribution or the administration of the estate, or of so much as is in the jurisdiction of the court.

HANCOCK v. HANCOCK. (a.)

Married woman—Separate estate—Property acquired since the 1st of January, 1883—Effect of covenant in prior settlement to settle after-acquired property—Covenant by husband only—Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ss. 5, 19.

A marriage settlement made in 1870 contained a covenant by the husband for the settlement of any future acquired property of the wife exceeding a specified amount (except jewellery, rings, and other articles of that nature). The wife, after the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, became absolutely entitled under a will made in 1883 to a share of the residuary estate, which exceeded the specified amount, without any limitation as to separate use.

Held, that sections 5 and 19 of the Act, taken together, prevented the wife from saying that the separate use given to her by the Act excluded the operation of the settlement, and that, therefore, the wife's share was bound by the covenant to settle future-acquired property.

Petition.

(a.) Reported by G. E. JEFFERY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The settlement dated the 19th of October, 1870, and executed prior to the marriage of Mary Rebecca Hancock and George William Brown contained a covenant by the intended husband with the trustees, that, "in case at any time during the intended coverture any real or personal estate (exceeding in amount or value £20 at one time and from one source, and not consisting of jewels, rings, or other articles of that nature) shall be given, devised, or bequeathed to, or descend or devolve upon or vest in the said Mary Rebecca Hancock or any person or persons in trust for her or in the said G. W. Brown in her right, then and in any and every such case the said G. W. Brown shall make, do, and execute, or join or concur with the said Mary Rebecca in making, doing, and executing all such acts, deeds, matters, and things as shall be necessary or proper for vesting such real or personal estate in the trustees or trustee, for the time being, of these presents, upon and for such trusts, intents, and purposes as (having regard to the nature and quality of the property) will correspond, or best or nearest correspond, with the trusts, intents, and purposes hereinbefore declared concerning the property hereby settled, or such of the said trusts, intents, and purposes as may be then subsisting, undetermined, or capable of taking effect." The settlement contained no such covenant on the part of the intended wife, nor any agreement or declaration to that effect.

The property comprised in the settlement belonged to the wife, and was limited in the usual way, life interests being given to the husband and wife with remainder to the children of the marriage.

By her will dated the 6th of March, 1883, Mrs. Brown's mother gave all her residuary estate to be equally divided between her children and the issue of any deceased child, but the will did not contain any declaration that the shares of the daughters were given for their separate use.

The testatrix died on the 22nd of September, 1883. An action was commenced for the administration of her estate, and in it the sum of £1,500 New Three per Cent. Annuities was carried over to the separate account of Mrs. Brown, and her assignees (if any) and her incumbrancers (if any).

This petition was presented by Mrs. Brown asking for a declaration that her share under her mother's will was not bound by the settlement, but that it belonged to her for her separate use absolutely, and that, subject to the payment of costs, the sum of £1,500 New Three per Cent. Annuities might be transferred to the petitioner.

Mulligan, for the petitioner.—The fund in court ought to be paid to the petitioner on her separate receipt. There is not in the settlement any covenant or contract by the wife to settle her after-acquired property. The covenant is by the husband alone, and such a covenant does not bind the wife's after-acquired property; Ramsden v. Smith, 2 W. R. 435, 2 Dr. 298; Dawes v. Tredwell, 29 W. R. 793, 18 Ch. D. 354. There is no recital of any intention to settle after-acquired property. Apart from section 19 the petitioner would clearly be entitled to this property for her separate use. That section has been considered in In re Queade's Trusts, 33 W. R. 816; In re Stonor's Trusts, 32 W. R. 413, 34 Ch. D. 195; and In re Whitaker, Christian v. Whitaker, 35 W. R. 217, 34 Ch. D. 227. In the last two cases there was a covenant by the wife. In re Queade's Trusts is an express decision in the petitioner's favour.

Simpson, for the respondents.—If the petitioner is entitled to this fund it would be impossible to say the settlement is not interfered with by the Act. In re Stonor's Trusts and In re Whitaker, Christian v. Whitaker, are in my favour. [NORTH, J.—In those cases the wife was bound.] Here by executing the settlement she assented to her husband's covenant, and she is, therefore, bound just as much as if she had expressly covenanted. Dawes v. Tredwell and Ramsden v. Smith are both cases of construction—viz., what property was bound by the covenant.

He also referred to Lee v. Lee, 25 W. R. 225, 4 Ch. D. 175.

Mulligan replied.

NORTH, J.—In this case a settlement was made on the 19th of October, 1870, on the occasion of the marriage of the petitioner with her present husband. The settlement contained a covenant by the husband to settle all the after-acquired real and personal property of the wife. In substance the covenant was the same as the similar covenants in Ramsden v. Smith and Dawes v. Tredwell. In my opinion the covenant is by the husband alone, and not by the wife. In 1883 Mrs. Brown's mother made her will giving her property equally between her children. The mother died in September, 1883, and in an action to administer her estate a sum of £1,500 stock has been transferred to the separate account of Mrs. Brown. Both the execution of the will and the death of the testatrix took place after the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the question is whether, under section 5 of the Act, Mrs. Brown is entitled to this sum absolutely for her separate use notwithstanding her husband's covenant. There are three decisions which it is important to consider. The first is In re Stonor's Trusts. In that case the settlement was executed in 1862, and it contained a joint agreement by the husband and wife for the settlement of after-acquired property of the wife, except property to which she should be entitled for her separate use. After the Act she became entitled to some property which was not settled to her separate use, and Pearson, J., held that section 19 of the Act prevented the application of section 5, and that consequently the property was bound by the settlement.

The next case is In re Queade's Trusts. In that case the settlement, which was a post-nuptial one, was made in 1847, and it contained an agreement by the husband and wife that the after-acquired property of the wife should be settled. In 1883 the wife became entitled to some property, and the question arose whether this property was bound by the agreement. The agreement was expressed in terms which were binding on both the husband and the wife, but the wife was not, in fact, bound by it, because at the time when the settlement was made she was a married woman and, moreover, an infant. It was just as if the wife had not been bound at all, and the case is distinguishable from In re Stonor's Trusts. Chitty, J., held that the property was not bound by the agreement, and that the wife was entitled to it; that case is very like the present.

Then there is the later case of In re Whitaker, Christian v. Whitaker, and it seems to me that that case has settled the law, and that I am bound to follow it. In that case the settlement was executed in 1873, and by it the husband and the wife (before the marriage) had jointly covenanted to settle the after-acquired property of the wife, except that to which she should be entitled for her separate use. Under the will of her father the wife, in 1884, became entitled to £10,000 which was not given to her for her separate use, and the court held that section 5 of the Act was modified by section 19, and that, reading the two sections together, the property did not belong to the wife for her separate use so as to be excepted from the settlement. No doubt in that case the covenant was a joint one and not a covenant by the husband alone. But, having regard to the reasons given by the Lords Justices, I do not think that that circumstance makes the difference which Chitty, J., in In re Queade's Trusts, thought that it did, and I must, therefore, come to a different decision from the one arrived at in that case.

The result of the judgment of the Lords Justices in

In re Whitaker is that sections 5 and 19 of the Act are to be read together so as to prevent anything from being taken away from the husband and children which they would have had under the settlement if the Act had not taken it away. The effect of a covenant by the husband alone was clearly stated by Sir George Jessel in Dawes v. Tredwell thus:—"The covenant, to my mind, is plain, and I consider it clear beyond doubt that the husband has only agreed to do what he has power to do. Now he can do two things. If the property vests in him at law, which is the case with a great deal of personal property, or if he has the power of disposition by law, as in the case of leaseholds, he is to assign it. If it is real estate it vests in the wife, not in him, but he has an interest in it and has a power of concurring with her in conveying, and he is bound to convey his interest and to join with her in conveying the whole property, if she is willing to do so, but the covenant does not affect property as to which he has no control whatever." Putting it in another way, a covenant by the husband affects the property of the wife so far as it is under his control, and he is also bound to concur with her in settling any other property, if she is willing to do so. In the present case, if the property is bound at all, it is bound by the covenant of the husband, and sections 5 and 19 of the Act taken together prevent the wife from saying that the separate use given to her by section 5 excludes the operation of the settlement.

The fund in court is bound by the settlement. If, however, any part of the fund has arisen from real estate of the mother, Mrs. Brown may not, as to that part, be bound by the settlement, but, so far as the fund represents personal estate of the mother, Mrs. Brown is bound, and the fund must therefore be transferred to the trustees of her settlement.

BENDELOW v. GUARDIANS OF WORTLEY UNION. (a.)

Nuisance — Infectious disease — Small-pox hospital — Interlocutory injunction.

The defendants fitted up a cottage as a small-pox hospital. The grounds in which the cottage stood were bounded by a public road on one side, open fields on two other sides, and the plaintiffs' property on the fourth side. The evidence being conflicting, a medical referee was appointed, who reported that there was appreciable danger to persons dwelling in the plaintiffs' houses.

Held, that an injunction should be granted.

This was a motion for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants, the Guardians of the Union of Wortley, in the parish of Ecclesfield, near Sheffield, acting as the rural sanitary authority for Wortley, their servants and agents, from using or permitting to be used the cottage occupied by them as a small-pox hospital at Upper Hirst, in the hamlet of Birley Carr, in Ecclesfield, or any other premises at Upper Hirst aforesaid so as to occasion a nuisance to the plaintiffs.

The cottage in question, which had been recently fitted up by the defendants as a small-pox hospital, stood in grounds bounded on one side by a public road, on two other sides by open fields, and on the fourth side by property of which the plaintiff Bendelow was the freeholder. It was separated from this property by a wall 13ft. high. The property consisted of twenty-one acres of land with farm buildings and three dwelling-houses standing upon it. The other plaintiffs were the tenants of these three houses, which were situate at distances varying between 130ft. and 160ft. from the hospital.

There was considerable conflict of evidence as to whether the hospital was dangerous to the persons residing in the plaintiffs' houses.

When the motion was first brought on it was suggested by the court that a medical gentleman should be appointed to inspect the place and report whether there was danger to the plaintiffs by reason of the situation or management of the hospital or otherwise. The matter consequently stood over until this report was obtained.

A medical referee was accordingly appointed, who reported as follows:—

"As a result of my inspection, I am satisfied that the small-pox hospital, by reason of its proximity to the above-mentioned houses belonging to or occupied by the plaintiffs, is a danger to persons who are susceptible to small-pox and who are dwelling in these houses, and, further, that the hospital, by reason of its proximity to the Hirst Common Lane, is a danger to persons susceptible to small-pox and who frequent that lane.

"I am of opinion that, by the exercise of precautions which I believe are taken in the management of the hospital, it is possible to prevent danger of infection arising from personal communication, but the danger which exists is that of aerial communication of infection from the aggregation of persons suffering from small-pox in the hospital.

"In estimating the amount of danger, it is proper to state that this danger is not great, that the danger is one of possibility rather than of probability of small-pox being caused by the hospital. . . .

"I should add that I have in this report considered only the danger to the plaintiffs from infection by small-pox, and have not had any regard to any effects upon health caused to the plaintiffs by mental anxiety resulting from the use of the Hirst as a small-pox hospital."

Pearson, Q.C., and Warrington, for the defendants, said that the question in all these cases was what was the amount of danger necessary to cause a nuisance. The above-cited cases showed that an injunction would not be granted unless the plaintiffs made out that there was real and substantial danger. In the present case the only risk was from aerial communication, and the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Fleet v. Metropolitan Asylums Board showed how little importance could be attached to that.

Hastings, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J.—This case is one which is very near the line. The first question is, what is the law applicable, and that, after the discussion which it has undergone in recent cases, is tolerably clear. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiffs. They must make out, not only that patients suffering from infectious disease are gathered together in this hospital, but also that there has been some injury to their rights as owners of the property on which they live. Then comes the question, What is the amount of injury required in order to constitute a nuisance? The expression used in Fleet v. Metropolitan Asylums Board is that there must be provable injury to the plaintiffs' property. Upon the evidence at first adduced in this case I felt considerable doubt, and I suggested that a medical man should be sent down to report. [His lordship read the report as above set out, and continued:—] What meaning am I to attach to that report? I think it shows that there is a real appreciable danger to persons susceptible to small-pox, though not very great. On the other hand, the nature of the disease is such that if once a person suffers from it the injury is irreparable in the sense in which that word is used in cases of injunction. The plaintiffs have, in my opinion, made out a case of real and appreciable injury, though not a great one, and are entitled to an injunction. The injunction will be suspended until the 19th of December, in order to obviate the necessity of removing existing patients, and the defendants must undertake to introduce no fresh patients, and to adopt every precaution to prevent communication between persons in the hospital and persons outside.

WILKINSON v. JAGGER. (a.)

Friendly society—Odd Fellows' Society—Right of lodge to secede from district—Acknowledgment of registry—Evidence of secession—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), ss. 11 (sub-section 10), 22 (sub-sections (d) and (e)), 30.

By the rules of the Odd Fellows' Society, any branch of the society desiring to secede shall call a special general meeting and go through certain forms. In a dispute between the parent lodge and the members seceding from it as to whether the proper forms had been carried out or not, the parent lodge contended before the county court judge that, so long as the registration of the lodge stood, it was not competent for the seceding members to deny that they were a branch of it. On the Registrar of Friendly Societies declining to cancel the registration, on the ground that he could not deal with the matter until the dispute had been settled by the county court, the county court judge, conceiving that he was concluded by section 11, sub-section 10, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, refused to receive evidence of secession, and gave judgment against the defendants.

Held, on appeal, that it was the duty of the county court judge to receive evidence of secession.

Held, also, that the appeal was properly made by notice of motion, and not by special case.

This was a motion by way of appeal by the defendants from the judgment of the county court judge of Huddersfield, who had given judgment for the plaintiffs for £25 16s. 9d., with costs, under the following circumstances:—

The National Independent Order of Odd Fellows' Society is a friendly society registered under the Friendly Societies Act, 1875. It consists of branches called districts and the districts consist of lodges. The districts and lodges as well as the order are registered as friendly societies.

The Huddersfield District (the officers of which were the plaintiffs in this action) is made up of fourteen lodges. The defendants were the officers of one of these, which was established in the year 1852, but was not registered until the 25th of December, 1880.

The relations inter se of the order, districts, and lodges are governed and regulated by three sets of rules, known and distinguished as "General," "District," and "Lodge Rules."

The object of this friendly society is to provide a certain weekly allowance to members during sickness and a certain sum for funeral expenses when a member, his wife, or his widow dies. All subscriptions are paid by members into their own lodges, and out of the funds so raised each lodge pays all such money for its own members. The funeral fund is created by means of a quarterly levy made by the district upon the lodges at the rate of 1s. 8d. per member, and out of this fund the district pays all funeral moneys that are required by any of the lodges.

The plaintiffs (the district) made a levy on the defendants (the lodge) of £25 16s. 9d. for the quarter ending in April, 1887. The defendants refused to pay this levy, and the plaintiffs then brought an action in the Huddersfield County Court to recover the amount.

But in July, 1886, the defendants desired to secede from the district and to form an independent society. The procedure for secession is prescribed by the 3rd General Rule and the 54th District Rule in almost identical terms.

The 3rd General Rule is as follows:—"3. Any branch of this society being desirous of seceding shall first call a special general meeting. Every member shall have seven days' notice thereof, and the summons calling the meeting shall require the member to fill up a form which shall be supplied him, stating whether he assents to or dissents from the proposed secession; when if three-fourths of the members of the branch are in favour thereof, the whole of the papers, with a statement of the accounts and the names, ages, addresses, and the nature of the disease of the sick members, shall be sent to the central office. The executive committee shall ascertain the liabilities of such members, and after deducting the necessary amount to meet the same the remainder of the funds shall be divided equitably among the members. The seceding lodge shall be required to pay to the district the amount of liability for each sick member and the share of each of any others who desire to remain members of the order."

The defendants took steps to secede under this rule, and informed the district officers of their proceedings; but on the 11th of December, 1886, the district secretary intimated that the plaintiffs considered that the secession proceedings were irregular and invalid, and that they must decline to allow the secession.

The plaintiffs objected to certain votes, but it was alleged by the defendants that there were more than the necessary majority in favour of the secession. The matter then passed into the hands of the solicitors of the parties, and ultimately, on the 24th of June, 1887, proceedings were instituted in the county court to recover the above amount.

The plaintiffs sought (1) to enforce payment of the above amount of £25 16s. 9d., the amount of levy for funeral money in the quarter ending April, 1887; (2) to enforce the rules of the society; (3) to settle the dispute between the parties; (4) to enforce payment of fines; and (5) to have it declared that the defendant lodge was still connected with and part of the plaintiffs' district.

At the hearing on the 8th of July, 1887, the plaintiffs put in the certificate of the Registrar of Friendly Societies that the defendant lodge had been registered as a branch of the Huddersfield District of the order, and it was not disputed that the registration had not been cancelled or suspended. The plaintiffs cited section 11, sub-section 10, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875: "The acknowledgment of registry shall be conclusive evidence that the society therein mentioned is duly registered unless it be proved that the registry of the society has been suspended or cancelled." The plaintiffs contended that so long as the registration stood it was not competent to the defendants to deny they were a branch of the district, and that they were liable to pay the amount sued for in the action.

The defendants urged that this section was not conclusive of the case, and that the real question was whether the proceeding for secession had been regularly and properly taken, and that if they had the defendants had seceded and were no longer liable to contribute to the district funds; that a dispute having arisen between the parties, the plaintiffs had expressly invoked the aid of the county court to decide this dispute, and they urged the judge to hear the merits and finally decide the case.

The county court judge considered that he was concluded by the words of the above sub-section; he suggested that an application should be made to the Registrar of Friendly Societies to cancel the registration, and adjourned the case to enable this to be done.

The defendants accordingly made a formal application to the registrar setting forth all the circumstances and desiring that the registration should be cancelled and the defendant lodge registered as a separate and independent society. The registrar gave notice of the application to the secretary of the plaintiffs' society, who said, in reply, that the plaintiffs opposed the application on the ground that the defendants had not complied with the provisions for secession contained in the rules. The registrar thereupon declined to accede to the application, and intimated he could not deal with the matter until the dispute had been settled by the proper tribunal, and this tribunal, he added, was the county court.

The county court judge, however, adhered to his view with respect to section 11, sub-section 10, and refused to entertain the question as to the secession or to receive evidence with respect thereto, and ultimately gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed with costs, but gave leave to appeal, and execution was stayed.

The defendants appealed.

Waddy, Q.C. (J. L. Walton with him), for the respondents.—There is a preliminary objection to the appeal. The appellants have misconceived their remedy. No appeal lies from the decision of the county court judge in this matter. The judge did not sit qua county court judge, but as arbitrator. The right course for the appellants would have been to have applied to the judge to state a case: ord. 59, rr. 9 and 10; County Court Rules, 1886, ord. 32; Reg. v. Sir Rupert Kettle, 17 Q. B. D. 761.

WILLS, J.—The Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), is undoubtedly involved, and it is desirable that there should be some finality of agreement as to the practice, whether an appeal lies from a county court in matters connected with this Act by special case, or whether the appeal should be by notice of motion. Section 22 is very difficult of construction. By sub-section (d) it is enacted that where the rules of a friendly society contain no direction as to disputes the person aggrieved may apply either to the county court or to a court of summary jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter in dispute. This section gives a person aggrieved a remedy either in a county court or else in a court of justices of the peace, at his option. But this proceeding in the county court is the same as a proceeding in an ordinary action—by plaint—and there is no reason why proceedings which, had they been in an ordinary action, would have been the subject of appeal to the superior courts by notice of motion, may not be similarly appealed against when they result from the application of a person aggrieved by a friendly society on such an application. Sub-section (d) permits a plaint to be brought in the county court, and the ordinary rules of procedure apply. I think that is the same spirit in which the same section was read by Chitty, J., in In re Royal Liver Friendly Society, 35 Ch. D. 332, 35 W. R. Dig. 62. Next we turn to sub-section (e) of the same section, that sub-section enacts that the county court judge or registrar may, at the request of either party, state a case for the superior courts, and otherwise, which are not necessary for the ordinary procedure. There being in the other parts of the Act no limit to the words "court," it is clear that it was not intended by sub-section (e) to limit the jurisdiction of the county court to appeals by special case only, nor to prevent appeals by notice of motion under sub-section (d), nor to establish a separate class of jurisdiction for friendly societies.

The Rules of the Supreme Court regulating appeals from county courts at present suspend the resort to special cases on appeal from county courts. The action of the plaintiffs was a proper action in the county court, and the present appeal is properly constituted.

GRANTHAM, J.—I concur with my brother Wills, but I wish to guard against being thought to say that special cases may not still be used on appeal from county courts under special circumstances, such as under the Agricultural Holdings Act. I also think that Chitty, J., in In re Royal Liver Friendly Society, based his decision on section 30 of the Act, and not on section 22. With these reservations I concur substantially in the judgment of my brother Wills.

SCHOFIELD v. VAUSE.

This was an appeal by the defendants, the officers and trustees of the Loyal Caledonian Lodge of the Manchester Unity Order of Odd Fellows' Friendly Society, from an order of the Vice-Chancellor of the Chancery Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster, granting an injunction against the defendants. The plaintiffs were, first, the trustees of a friendly society called the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Manchester Unity Friendly Society; secondly, the trustees of a subordinate society, called the Bolton District Branch of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and, thirdly, certain members of the defendants' society, being a minority of the members protesting against a resolution come to by a majority of the members, as being ultrà vires. The three societies were independent, separate friendly societies, but had for several years been connected together.

Romer, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the appellants.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and H. B. Buckley, for the respondents.

COTTON, L.J.—In this case there are concerned a great number of individuals, members of societies which play a very useful part in England. The case has been argued fully, and I think we ought not to delay giving our judgment upon it. The action is one with reference to the Order of Odd Fellows, and the defendants—I take their position first—are the members of a lodge who desire to secede from the order, and to withdraw themselves entirely from that union which existed between the different branches of the whole Order of Odd Fellows. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, are the unity, the centre; they represent the districts, and they represent some of the members of the lodge who dissent from the course taken by the majority. How the Odd Fellows' Union originally arose we do not quite know;

Wills, J.—I think that whatever the rules of the societies impose as a condition of secession must be complied with, and I think that on a very cursory reading of them the tenor is that effectual provision must be made so that the central body does not lose more than it ought to lose, pursuant to these rules, by the departure of the minor body. But then the appellants say that all this has been done. The county court judge has refused to that is not very plain. But, at any rate, when the defendants' lodge was formed there were Odd Fellows, and there were undoubtedly other lodges and other districts; and, as far as I understand, the Odd Fellows thus admitted to the order may originally have been admitted. At this time everyone who joined the lodge was admitted as a member of the Union of Odd Fellows, and at the different lodges formed in this way dispensations were granted by the central body, and then some of the persons (already members) were allowed to form what is called a lodge, with power to initiate into the order new members, and then those would become members of the lodge, but at the same time they would be initiated into and become members of the order. That is most important for consideration, because every member of this lodge is not a member of the lodge by itself, but, being admitted as a member of the order, he becomes a member of the lodge—that is to say, a certain portion of the members of the union to whom the regulations of the union had given a quasi-separate action and quasi-separate existence. That is to say, that the lodges had a power to a certain extent of regulating their affairs, and the lodges are separated one from another, and have power to a certain extent to regulate their affairs. All the lodges formed part of the districts, and all the districts formed divisions of the union; and what I understand this society is, is this, that funds are provided by contributions of the members of the different lodges for certain purposes; then a portion of those contributions for funeral expenses are handed over to the district. The district provides, in the first instance, for the funerals, and then there are contributions and payments to each lodge when necessary in order to make up what ought to have been, having regard to the number of funerals in the year, their quota. There are now no original members, or for many years there have been none of the centre, the unity, but if any lodge fails, any members of that lodge being also members of the order, as they must necessarily be, having duly performed their duties, fall into and become members of the district. When districts fail in like manner the members who have become members of the district fall into and become members of the unity. Therefore, in fact, we have these different societies regarded as friendly societies, and providing for their members in this position; that there are funds of each lodge; if those fail there is the security of the district; if the district fails there is the security of the central body, the unity.

That is a most important consideration, because it is not only the funds of the separate lodge on which the members have to depend, but there is a guarantee, as it were, to provide for the event of those funds failing by the district, and, finally, by the central body. Now, in my opinion, having regard to those facts, the case of the dissentient minority is conclusive here, because the dissentient minority say, "I joined the lodge and I have been paying my money to the lodge on these terms; that I have the benefit which the lodge could give me; if the lodge fails I have the additional benefit which the district can give me; if the district fails I have the benefit which I can have from the assistance rendered by the unity—by the centre." In my opinion that would entirely have settled the question; because, what are we considering here? Here this lodge, for reasons of its own, wishes to secede from that body—from that union—wishes to secede from the district, and wishes to secede entirely from the unity. In my opinion any member who has contributed his funds to a benefit society of the nature of which this lodge was when he joined it has a right to say: "Do not turn that which I joined into something entirely different; do not deprive me of the benefit which I have from the rules of the unity and from the intercourse between the lodge, the district, and the unity." I should mention, before I leave this part of the case, that it appears not only that the funds are contributed by the lodges to the district, but also that funds are contributed by the district to the unity. Then there are other matters here which are of importance. That, to my mind, as I have already mentioned, is sufficient to decide the case, and to my mind it is the strongest reason for holding that the decision of the Vice-Chancellor is right, and I should be quite content to decide it upon that point. But other points have been argued, and I believe my brothers will deal with those points. I in no way differ from them. Therefore, I will express my opinion shortly on these points. Everyone when he became a member of this lodge, as I said, became initiated into the order, and he promised, on his initiation, to obey the rules from time to time made by the central body. Now what happened here? We have a rule providing for the secession and breaking up of branches, and, whether or no there was a right before that to secede, in my opinion, there being a power to make rules in the central body, that was a rule which it was reasonable and proper for them to make. Because, what does it do? It says that if any branch shall secede—and the district has a similar rule—it shall only do so after providing for its liabilities to those who have joined it when it was intended to be one of the lodges of the unity. Whether that was a right of secession or not, that rule was passed years ago, and, as far as we can understand, was not dissented from by this lodge or by other lodges. This lodge is the only one we can now consider. That rule being passed by what was called the Annual Movable Committee, which consisted of members selected from the different districts of the Odd Fellows, in my opinion we must consider that rule as one which this lodge has bound itself to abide by, and, in my opinion, it was a rule clearly within the power of the Annual Movable Committee, whether or no, antecedently to that rule, there had or had not been a power of seceding from the order. Therefore, in my opinion, as each member when he entered the order—when he was initiated into the order—promised to abide by such orders and rules as might from time to time be made by the Annual Movable Committee, this is one which this lodge or its members are bound to obey, and, in my opinion, the Vice-Chancellor was quite right in holding that they were not entitled to treat this as a separate body—that is to say, to secede, as they intended to do, from the union without following the provisions prescribed by the rule. This rule—"F.," I think—which applies to secession and breaking up of branches, is a rule of the existing body in the district and in the unity.

Now that settles the case to my mind. It is contended that what they were going to do was to register under the new Act, and that if they so registered not as a branch they would have the power of passing a rule so as to bind their own members to enable them to act separately. But they have not so registered, and their own registration was a registration not of themselves as a separate society, but of the rules of the Caledonian Lodge, No. 418 of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Manchester Unity, Friendly Society. That is, recognized as a lodge of that unity, recognizing the position which in fact they occupy, not a position of independent action, but simply a connection of certain members of the unity—members initiated into the order. But that, so far as the power was delegated to them, was a power entertain this question, because he says the registrar has not cancelled the registration. I think that that is a mistaken idea, and that the judge is the proper person to entertain it. The registrar certainly would refuse to ascertain it for himself, having no means of doing so, and no court or tribunal and no power of having witnesses to appear before him. It seems to me that the proper line for him to take is the same line that is taken by the

of making rules to regulate their own proceedings, but all subservient to the general rules of the district and the general rules of the order. There was a registration of such a nature as that, and I do not see how, if any rule were passed to give themselves another and separate existence, that rule could be one which could be sanctioned as duly passed by them, when in their registration they have registered themselves as a branch only of that general unity, as a branch of Odd Fellows subject to all the rules and regulations which they agreed to submit to when the lodge was formed, when each and every of its members joined that lodge. In my opinion the appeal fails. There is one point which, perhaps, I ought to mention. It was contended that whatever the rights of the parties might be, yet the conduct of the central body had been such as to prevent their getting assistance in the way sought. In my opinion that is an erroneous view. The whole contest between the lodges and the centre was, Can the lodges sever and set themselves up as separate and distinct societies? That was the point between them, and as the only object of the central body was to prevent that being done, as the only object of this lodge was to enable them to sever, in my opinion the lodge was in the wrong and not the central body when it required them, as it did, to register as a branch, and not as a separate society. Of course that involved their putting an end to and cancelling the registration which they had already got under the Act of 1851. In my opinion there was nothing unreasonable in that, the object of both sides being in substance that which I have mentioned. In my opinion there is no ground, as the rights are what I have stated them in my opinion to be, for refusing the relief here which has been granted by the Vice-Chancellor.

Bowen, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that when you get to the bottom of the case it determines itself by the application of the very simplest principles of the law of contract. All members of this lodge are members of the order. This is fundamental. By the act of initiation they become members of the order grouped in a particular lodge, and promise that they will, to the best of their ability, conform to all rules duly passed by the authorized committee of the lodge, district, or order. The district and the lodge are not different incorporations. They consist of an aggregate of individuals, all of whom belong to the order. That is the cardinal point of the whole matter to my mind. The members of the order may group themselves into lodges and into districts, and each district, viewing itself for that purpose as a centre, and each lodge viewing itself for that purpose as a centre, for the moment may acquire by registration a separate existence; but, if they do, it is only a separate existence quoad themselves as a district and its lodges, and it neither destroys nor affects in any way their outstanding obligations to the order of which they are members, and to a group of members to which they belong—to a larger body. They cannot by anything they do to themselves as a group destroy the contractual obligations which already exist between themselves and the larger body. Now let us apply those principles. What have we got in the first place? Why, we have got the fact that the funds contributed to the lodge are by their own rules funds in the management and in the distribution of which the lodge—that is to say, the group of members forming the lodge—the district, and all the other members of the order have some interest under the rules; they have varying interests, but they have all got some interest. Now, was there an original power of secession when this district and this lodge was created? Mr. Romer and Mr. Clare, with great clearness and ability, have told us this morning and yesterday that there must be an original power of secession, both upon the practice, by which it appears, and by virtue of which it is supposed, that some secessions took place, and also by the application of the Statute of Frauds. Be it so. Let us assume that they start with general powers of secession—that is to say, that you could not compel members of the order to go on continuing members of the order if they chose to cut themselves adrift. It may be so. But where do they get the right, if they secede, to carry away the funds, in the management of which the district to which they belong, and the lodge to which they belong, have already acquired some interest? They cannot do that; they are breaking the law of contract.

If they wish to set up an independent lodge, they cannot take the funds which have been devoted to one purpose, and which have been intended to be carried out in compliance with one set of rules—they cannot abrogate the rules, and set up a lodge with the same money on their own account. That is really to take the money of one person and to devote it to objects which are determined upon by another. It is as clear to my mind as daylight that by so doing you are interfering with the rights of the dissentient minority. The dissentient minority contributed their funds, not in order that they might be made into the funds of a lodge which had no connection with the order, but in order that they might be administered by a lodge which was a sub-branch of the order. It is an attempt to cut adrift the lodge from the order, and to carry with it the funds which have been dedicated, so to speak, to the carrying out and the working out of the objects of the order. But it seems to me, applying the same principle to the members of the district and the order, that all have an interest in the management of the funds contributed by the lodge, though the interest of the members may be more remote—I mean the members who belong to other districts and lodges may be more remote—still they all have an interest and a right to have a voice in the matter. I think that consideration is decisive of the case. But there is another matter to my mind equally decisive of it, and equally plain by the application of the simple principle of the law of contract. The order to which all these lodge members are affiliated, to which they all belong, passes a rule in the regular way by the constituted authority of the order, which authority receives a contingent of deputies who really represent this lodge as well as the other lodges—the order passes a rule, and, indeed, the district does just the same—it passes another rule which regulates the mode in which secessions are to take place. Now, considering the interest of the order and the district in the funds, how can such a rule be said to be ultrà vires? How can the Statute of Frauds have anything to do with it? It has become one of the accepted rules of the order in every case. Every subscription which has been made since the time it has been passed has been made on the faith that the members of the order all accepted it, and every initiation that has taken place since, has taken place on the footing that that rule is a rule of the order. Those who were initiated previously, if they had objected to that rule, or if they had got any ground of objection to it, ought to have said so at the time. It is clear to my mind that after the passing of that rule no member of the order, whether he belongs to a lodge or not, has a right to initiate the secession of a lodge or a district, except upon the terms of those rules. He breaks his court in a winding up. When a question occurs as to a company being actually allowed to be dissolved, the court requires to be satisfied that every liability has been discharged or provided for, but upon that application judges do not go into the question of whether a contention as to a liability is right or wrong. They leave that to be decided upon a different class of application, but they require to be satisfied that every liability has been dis-contract if he does, and the lodge, which is a created body of individuals, break that contract if they attempt to break that rule. There was a third point taken as to whether or no we could grant this injunction in consequence of the conduct of the order in insisting upon the registration of this branch lodge, the branch that did not choose to register, and did not think that it was bound to register under that particular Act. I agree entirely with what the Lord Justice said. To my mind that is a rule which the order had a right to pass, but be that as it may, it was accepted by the body, and it is too late now to complain that the members are not bound by it. I consider this a very clear case, and one that requires the application of no recondite principles.

FRY, L.J.—The importance of this case induces me to add a few words to what has been said by my learned brethren. The main if not the only question in this case has throughout appeared to me to be this: Upon what terms did the persons who became members of the order and members of this particular lodge become such members? There are three documents which have been put before us which throw the greatest light upon my mind in that inquiry.

The first of those is what has been called the dispensation, which was, in fact, an authority given by the then members of the order to certain officers and brothers of the order (to use the language of the dispensation), which authorized them to constitute the brothers so made to be a particular sub-organization of the order or lodge. But this dispensation provided that the officers and brothers of this new lodge should not deviate from the principles and regulations of the Manchester Unity of Independent Odd Fellows, but "should in all and every respect comply with these dispensation, presents, and laws, and them duly keep, observe, and enforce, according to the purport, true intent, and meaning of the Loyal Independent Order, or this dispensation shall be null and void." Further, the order by this dispensation undertake, in the case of the lodge being destroyed by fire or other accident, to render assistance to the distressed of the lodge. Its object, to my mind, was really to admit persons as members of the order, not to admit them as members of any separate society.

The next document which seems of any importance in this society is this. There is a form of certificate, which has been put before us, which was signed and given to the members as they were admitted to this order, to this lodge. It is a certificate that Brother So-and-So was admitted a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Manchester Unity, Friendly Society, by initiation in the particular lodge. There, again, it is obvious the certificate indicates the admission of the member as a member of the order.

Lastly, there is a form of initiation which has been put in evidence before us, which to my mind, I confess, seems to become really important as regards this question. After other preliminary inquiries as to his name and so forth, the lecture master, who was the officer presiding at the initiation, addressing the intended candidate, asks him whether he will, to the best of his ability, conform to all rules duly passed by the authorized committee of the lodge, district, or order. To that the member, if he is to be admitted, must give a reply in the affirmative. The same principle runs through the exhortation given by the lecture master to the candidate. He is to do everything which will promote the advantage of the order, and throughout the welfare of the order is the object of the anxiety and care of those who prepared these rules for the initiation. But I return to the words which I have already read—the promise to conform to all rules duly passed by the authorized committee of the order. That is one of the promises made by every member. It seems to me, then, that the only inquiry is this: Are these members, if they are carrying away with them the funds of the lodge, conforming to the rules duly passed by the authorized committee of the order?

The answer to that is plain. The authorized committee of the order has passed a rule that they shall only secede upon certain terms. That rule this body of members, each of whom is common to that promise, do not propose to obey. To my mind that is an end of the case. But I will go further, and I will inquire what is the nature of the terms upon which, according to the contract between the parties, the fund which is primarily under the management of the lodge is to be administered. Undoubtedly it appears to me that every member of the lodge has a primary interest in the fund; it has been contributed for their common benefit, and a dissentient member has a right to say, it appears to me—a member, that is to say, who dissents from the proposed secession has a right to say—"I have contributed to this fund, and you have contributed to this fund, upon terms of its being administered in a particular manner. In the administration I have an interest. I insist upon my right to relief in sickness, and to the right of those who follow after me to the terms of payment on my death, in accordance with the bargain we have entered into. Without my consent you cannot depart from that bargain, and although it is competent for you to leave the society, it is competent to you to leave it only on terms of leaving behind you those contributions which have been made for my benefit." To my mind that is a very plain right of the members in regard to this proposed secession. But I think also the district has a clear interest in the fund, for this reason, that the district has a fund which was to provide for the funeral expenses of the members of the lodges within that district. That is to be a fund provided equally by the lodges. Therefore each lodge in the district has a right to say to the other lodges, "We have combined together for the purpose of constituting the fund, and you have no right to carry with you any portion of that fund which has been contributed to with a common object." I think that probably the district members had a further interest, because there was a system of travelling cards, which, if I rightly understand, gave the member of one lodge who was travelling in the district of another lodge a right to relief in the event of his being distressed. That is not so material, but it appears to me also to give them an interest in the district funds.

Lastly, I think the members of the order who were neither members of the particular lodge, nor the district to which the lodge belonged, had an interest in this fund, because, as was distinctly pointed out by Mr. Romer in his opening, the order has a right to contributions from the district—has a right to make what are called levies, and those levies are for the benefit of all the members of the order; therefore, although the interest of the district members is not so direct, and perhaps not so immediate, as that of the lodge members, I think that every member of the Order of Odd Fellows has a certain interest in this fund which is administered and managed primarily by the committee of the lodge. I think, therefore, that there was no right whatever to secede in the manner which has been suggested.

Now it has been argued that the registration which was effected in the year 1873, under the Act of 1855, of charged or provided for effectually before they allow a company to be dissolved, and then they have the power of inquiring into it themselves if it becomes necessary to settle a disputed question of fact. The registrar has no such power, and, therefore, the registrar would say as long as there is a question open I shall not allow the registration to be cancelled. It seems to me that that would be the right course for him to take, and it follows that the county court judge is the right person to decide this question of mixed fact and law as to whether, upon the true construction of rule 54 of the District Rules, everything has or has not been done which is the necessary preliminary to the right to secede.

It seems to me, then, if he should establish that in favour of those who claim to have the right to secede, it is impossible that the parent society can have any further claim on them because they remained registered.

GRANTHAM, J.—The judgment of the county court judge shows that he did not do that which he is called on to do under sub-section (d) of section 22 of the Friendly Societies Act. He did not do what he was asked to do. We have determined by our previous decision that he had power to do it sitting as judge of the county court and not as an arbitrator. Has he done that? He has not, and therefore those who appeal against his decision are right in asking us to send it back to him and to say he ought to do it. One word with regard to the case in the Court of Appeal (Schofield and others v. Vause and others), which the respondents have referred to, because this case may be quoted again in the same way that Mr. Waddy quoted it. Mr. Waddy commenced his observations by saying that the county court judge was right, because the defendants had no power of secession, and he quoted this case and said he would give us this case as a distinct authority that they had no power of secession. No doubt, when you read the first part of the judgment of Cotton, L.J., and also of Bowen, L.J., it appears that the defendants had no power to do what they did in that case; but Cotton, L.J., goes on practically to point out that they have a power of secession, but must do that which has been set out by the section. After having determined they were wrong in doing what they did, he goes on to say:—"Now, what happened here? We have a rule providing for the secession and breaking up of branches, and whether or no there was a right before that to secede, in my opinion, there being a power to make rules in the central body that was a rule which it was reasonable and proper for them to make"—that is, to enable them to secede. Then, again, Bowen, L.J., also says, in different words, though to the same purport, that "the order passes a rule and, indeed, the district does just the same"—exactly what has happened here—"which regulates the mode in which secessions are to take place." Therefore, he said, they had a power, but they must do it in the way set out. Whether they have done it in the way set out or not we do not know, because the county court judge said he would not go into it. Under those circumstances it is clear that it must go back to him, and that he must do that which the statute determines he must do under sub-section (d) of section 22.

Judgment of the county court judge set aside. Case remitted to that judge to try the case on its merits. Appeal allowed, with costs of appeal.

this particular lodge, giving as it did to the lodge the power to vary its rules, gave to it a power to make a new rule which should constitute it an independent lodge. That I understand really to have been in substance the argument addressed to us yesterday by Mr. Romer. In my view that is entirely a fallacious argument. The power to vary the rules given by the Act of 1855 does not enable any society to depart from its contractual obligations; does not enable the particular members of this lodge, who are really members of the order, to depart from the relations which they had entered into with the order. And they must submit to the obligation of the contract. Then it was said again that whatever might be the capacity of the lodge to secede, nevertheless the conduct of the order in this case was so unreasonable that the court ought not to interfere by granting an injunction. When that is looked into it appears to come to the old question in a new form. It appears that on Whit-Monday, 1883, a resolution was passed by the Annual Movable Committee, delegates to which came from this lodge in question, which required that the members of this lodge and all other lodges should register under the Act of 1875. The lodge in this case said:—"We will not do anything to affect the registration of 1873 under the Act of 1855, because it created us a separate lodge, and if we register ourselves under the Act of 1875 it will place us in a subordinate position as a member of the order." I think the answer to that is very plain. Registration under the Act of 1855 did not constitute them a separate body, therefore they had no separate existence to protect. I think the question, although raised in that form, is only the old question whether the lodge had a right to secede or not—whether it was a separate body. Finally, I will make this observation. It has been attempted this morning to say that some objection can be found in the Statute of Frauds. We have not entered into that argument because, after the delay which has taken place, and after the opportunity which we gave to both parties to adduce such evidence, no evidence having been adduced or put in on that point, and there being no pleadings, we thought it was too late to enter upon that point. I therefore agree, for the reasons I have given, that the order of the Vice-Chancellor is right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

REG. v. LINCOLNSHIRE COUNTY COURT JUDGE. (a.)

County court—Judgment debtor—Equitable execution—Order for receiver to receive income of fund in hands of trustees—Order on trustees to pay—Prohibition.

W. H., by his will, authorized his trustees, at their absolute discretion, at such time or times as they should think proper, to pay and apply the income of a certain sum of money to or for the benefit of G. An action having been brought in the county court against G., in which the plaintiff recovered judgment, the county court judge made an order, by way of equitable execution, appointing a receiver to receive the interest of the said sum, and ordering the trustees to make certain periodical payments until the judgment should be satisfied.

Held, that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to make such order, and that a writ of prohibition must go.

Application for a writ of prohibition.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In an action of Dixon v. Grylls, in the county court of Lincolnshire, the plaintiff obtained judgment for £22. The defendant was interested in a sum of money under the will of his uncle, William Hargrave, which provided (inter alia) as follows:—The testator gave the residue of his property, real and personal, to his executors upon trust to convert the same into money and to set apart and invest a sum of £1,200, and he authorized them at their absolute discretion from time to time, and at such time or times as they should think proper, to pay and apply the whole or any part of the income of the said sum of £1,200 to or for the benefit of the defendant in such manner in all respects as they should think proper. On an application by the judgment creditor for the appointment of a receiver by way of equitable execution, the county court judge made an order by which the registrar was appointed to receive the interest of the above-mentioned sum in the hands of the executors of William Hargrave, and the executors were ordered to pay every half-year as it became due the sum of £10 (part of the interest of the said sum) until the judgment in the action should be fully satisfied.

A summons at chambers was taken out on behalf of the executors and trustees of the will of William Hargrave for a prohibition restraining all proceedings under the above order. The summons was referred to the court.

C. A. Russell, for the executors.—This is a case of a county court judge acting without jurisdiction. Therefore the proper remedy is prohibition. There could be no appeal, the order complained of being an interlocutory order. The judge purported to give himself jurisdiction by a decision which was erroneous in point of law, as in the case of Elston v. Rose, 17 W. R. 52, L. R. 4 Q. B. 4. In order that an application for a receiver might properly be entertained, it was necessary that there should be a fund of which a receiver could be appointed. The judge held erroneously in law that there was such a fund. The defendant's interest in this fund is not such an interest as can be attached by way of equitable execution. By the terms of the will the trustees have an absolute discretion to apply the income for the benefit of the defendant; they are not bound to pay it to the defendant, and therefore they cannot rightly be ordered to pay it to the receiver. At any rate, the judge had no jurisdiction to order the trustees to pay a definite sum at a definite time to the receiver. If it is right to appoint a receiver at all, he must be left to get what he can.

Chester, for the judgment creditor.—The proper remedy, if the executors were dissatisfied, was by way of appeal. The judge had jurisdiction to entertain an application for a receiver; and having jurisdiction, even if he exceeded his jurisdiction by misconstruing a document, this court will not interfere. But the judge construed the document rightly. The discretion of the trustees is only as to the times and manner of payment. Snowdon v. Dales, 6 Sim. 524, shows that such an interest as that of the defendant would pass to his trustee in bankruptcy. And the receiver can step in and take what a trustee in bankruptcy could take.

POLLOCK, B.—It is said that, this being a matter in which the county court judge has decided in respect of a suit as to which he originally had jurisdiction, the proper remedy is by way of appeal. The answer to that is that this is an interlocutory matter; and it is clear that the right of appeal from the county court, which is given by statute, does not extend to interlocutory matters. But where a judge of an inferior court acts beyond his jurisdiction, the aggrieved party is undoubtedly entitled to prohibition. The defendant here had an interest under the will of a relative, and the county court judge thought that the will gave him jurisdiction to make an order, not only against the defendant, but against the trustees. It is said, on behalf of the judgment creditor, that where it is once shown that the court ab initio has jurisdiction, if the judge then exceeds his jurisdiction by misconstruing any document, this court ought not to interfere. That is untenable. A judge of an inferior court cannot give himself jurisdiction by construing a document in one way rather than in another. I think that the county court judge construed this will wrongly. I am of opinion that a receiver ought not to have been appointed at all. But there is certainly no precedent for an order that trustees should pay over such money. The case of Pink v. De Thuisey, 2 Mad. 157, is not unlike this case, and is an authority against making any such order. The prohibition must go.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the first part of the order, the judge had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver of such debts as the debtor had control over. But this is virtually an order on the trustees, and affects them. It authorizes the receiver to take that which they alone have authority to apply at their absolute discretion. As to the next part, which orders periodical payments by the trustees, I cannot conceive how it can be said that there was jurisdiction to make such an order.

Prohibition granted.

SUCKLING v. GABB. (a.)

Practice—Costs up to and after payment into court—Effect of discontinuance—Rules of Supreme Court, ord. 26, r. 1; ord. 66, r. 1.

On a summons, under order 14, for the payment of a sum of money, the master ordered the defendant to pay money into court as to part of the claim, and gave leave to defend as to the remainder. After issue joined, the plaintiff discontinued the action. The taxing master gave the defendant the whole costs of the action from the beginning. On appeal for review of taxation,

Held, that the costs were not governed by ord. 26, r. 1, but were in the discretion of the court, under ord. 65, r. 1, and that the plaintiff was entitled to his costs up to the time of payment into court.

Langridge v. Campbell, 25 W. R. 351, 2 Ex. D. 281, distinguished.

This was an application for review of taxation of costs made before Field, J., at chambers, and referred by him to the court. The plaintiff was an executor and brought an action to recover £160 against the defendant. The defendant, before action, offered the plaintiff £54 in satisfaction of his claim. This the plaintiff refused, and on the 15th of June he issued his writ. On the 30th of June application was made before the master under order 14, and it was ordered that unless the defendant paid the sum of £60 11s. 9d. within a week, the plaintiff should have judgment for that sum; and unconditional leave to defend was given as to the remainder of the claim. That amount was paid into court by the defendant on the same day. On the 18th of July the defence was delivered, and, after interrogatories and answers, the reply was delivered on the 28th of July, and issue was joined thereon. In November the plaintiff gave notice of discontinuance. In taxing the costs on the discontinuance order, the master, "on the principle of Langridge v.

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Campbell," 25 W. R. 351, 2 Ex. D. 281, allowed the defendant his costs of suit from the commencement.

The plaintiff took out a summons to review the taxation, which was referred by Field, J., to this court.

T. W. Chitty, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff objects to the allowance of costs to the defendant of the proceedings prior to the payment into court. Costs are in the discretion of the court, except in the case where an issue is tried before a jury, in which case costs follow the event. When, therefore, an action is brought for a sum of money and the defendant pays money into court and the plaintiff afterwards discontinues the action, it is a matter of discretion how the costs are to be apportioned. Langridge v. Campbell is distinguishable on three grounds: (1) The money was paid in generally; (2) It was agreed that the costs were to abide the event; (3) There was a reference.

He cited also Buckton v. Higgs, 27 W. R. 803, 4 Ex. D. 174.

Lyndon Bell, for the defendant.—This question of costs is entirely due to the irregularity of the plaintiff. It is a case for which no precedent can be found, and with which the rules do not deal. By ord. 22, r. 7, when payment into court is made before delivery of a defence, the plaintiff may, within four days after receipt of notice of such payment and before reply, accept in satisfaction the sum so paid in. The money in this case was paid in before defence, and that being so the plaintiff ought to have taken the money out within four days and before reply. Not availing himself of this rule, he continues the action. The notice to discontinue in November was entirely irregular, for by ord. 26, r. 1, the right must be exercised before reply, and if after reply by leave of the court, which the plaintiff did not obtain. In Buckton v. Higgs there was no irregularity. The discontinuance being after reply the case is not within ord. 26, r. 1, and, issue having been joined, the case must be decided as if it had gone to trial and the defendant had succeeded. Wheeler v. United Telephone Co., 33 W. R. 295, 13 Q. B. D. 597, and Goutard v. Carr, 13 Q. B. D. 598 (n.), are in point. The latter case is an authority for saying that if the payment in goes to the whole cause of action, as it is admitted it did here, the defendant is entitled to the whole costs. The case of Goutard v. Carr is similar to Langridge v. Campbell; in both cases there was an agreement that costs should abide the event. In Wheeler v. United Telephone Co. there was no such agreement, and the Court of Appeal attached no importance to its absence. If there is discretion, it should, under the circumstances, be exercised in the defendant's favour.

POLLOCK, B.—This is a case of some practical importance. It comes to us as an appeal from Master Johnston's taxation of costs. The summons to review was taken out before Field, J., at chambers, and he referred it to this court. Our decision must be governed only by the facts of this particular case, although it does involve a rather important principle. [After stating the facts the learned judge continued:—] On these facts it is urged that the plaintiff is entitled to his costs up to the time of payment into court, inasmuch as he was compelled to bring the action. The defendant says No, because he did not avail himself of the rules, and the case ought to be treated as if it had gone to trial, for if it had done so it would have been found that £60 would have been sufficient to satisfy the claim, and then ord. 65, r. 1, would have applied.

Now the court has a discretion with regard to costs, except in those cases in which the rules say the costs shall go in a particular way. It is clear that in this case we have such a discretion, and the question here arises, Is the exercise of that discretion fettered in any way? The plaintiff has asked £100 more than he has received. The defendant paid £60 into court and the plaintiff did not take it out under the rules, and if the case had gone on to trial there would have been no cause for interference. The defendant therefore contends that the plaintiff ought to pay the whole costs. Is there any authority for the defendant's contention? The master's taxation was founded on the case of Langridge v. Campbell. That case is disposed of in very few words. There, by consent, an order of reference had been made, and costs were to abide the event. That amounted to an agreement between the parties that the costs were to abide the event. But this is made clearer by the case of Buckton v. Higgs, where the discretion of the court was not so fettered. In that case the defendant denied the breach of covenant, and paid money into court, and the issues were referred to a referee, who found that the money paid in was sufficient to satisfy the claim; the discretion was exercised by allowing the plaintiff his costs up to the time of payment into court. In that case Kelly, C.B., expressly explained his decision in Langridge v. Campbell; therefore, to the extent to which the master relied on that case I think he was wrong.

But our attention has been directed to two later cases —viz., Wheeler v. United Telephone Co. and Goutard v. Carr. Goutard v. Carr may be dismissed with this observation, that in that case there was an agreement that the costs were to abide the event.

Wheeler v. United Telephone Co. is not a decision which fetters our discretion at all. For in circumstances somewhat similar to the present the Court of Appeal considered that the case, having gone down to trial, was governed by ord. 65, r. 1. In the present case the facts that existed there do not exist here, and in deciding this case we do not see that our discretion is fettered in any way by modern rules.

It seems to me that when a claim is made for a large amount and a small amount is paid into court which the plaintiff takes out and goes on and then afterwards discontinues, he is not to be put in the same category with a man who drives the defendant to a trial. I am satisfied with ord. 65, r. 1, though it does fetter our discretion. It is a sound and good rule. If the case had gone down to trial that rule would have been applied. The case did not go to trial, and I am of opinion that we have an unfettered discretion. For these reasons I think the master was wrong in thinking that he was bound by Langridge v. Campbell; he must therefore review his taxation of the costs by allowing the plaintiff his costs up to the time of payment into court.

HAWKINS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It must be borne in mind that this was a claim by an executor, therefore the suggestions that it was extortionate and wicked have no application. Having regard to the possibility of losing on the remainder of the claim, and in that way incurring further costs, he prudently discontinued. Up to the time when the £60 was paid into court it is clear that the plaintiff was right and was entitled to his costs, and it is not easy to see how his subsequent conduct can retrospectively affect his right to them. It was on the discontinuance order that the master proceeded to tax.

What is the effect of the discontinuance order? It is quite clear that ord. 26, r. 1, applies, not only where the whole action is discontinued, but also where part only is discontinued, and it contemplates the payment by the plaintiff of the costs of the matter so withdrawn.

Under the present circumstances what costs is the plaintiff entitled to? The master disallowed him all costs on the authority of Langridge v. Campbell. The decision in that case depended on the agreement of the parties to abide the event. I think, therefore, that the principle on which the master went is mistaken.

The matter therefore resolves itself into the question, What is just and reasonable, and how ought our discretion to be exercised? I think that plaintiff was compelled to bring the action, and that he is entitled to his costs up to the time of the payment into court.

We ought, therefore, to allow the plaintiff such costs as were necessary to obtain the £60 due to him. And the defendant ought to have the costs incurred after the time when the £60 was paid, and also the costs which he reasonably incurred, before the payment of the £60, in respect of that part of the claim to which the master gave him leave to defend. The master, therefore, must review his taxation on these lines.

From Chan. Div. May 21, 23, 25.

LEVER v. GOODWIN. (a.)

Trade-mark—Imitation—Sale of goods as those of rival traders—Injunction—Form of account.

Where an injunction has been obtained by a plaintiff restraining a defendant from selling his goods in a form so resembling the plaintiff's as to lead purchasers to believe that they were the goods of the plaintiff, the order for an account should direct an account of all profits made by the defendant in selling his goods in that particular form, and should not be limited by excluding therefrom the profits on those of the goods which the defendant can prove were sold as his.

Decision of Chitty, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Chitty, J.

The plaintiffs, who were manufacturers of soap, brought the present action to restrain the defendants, who were also manufacturers of soap, from selling their soap in such a way as to pass it off as the plaintiffs' soap.

The defendants did not sell their soap retail, but they sold it to retail dealers, who then sold it retail to the public. The retail dealers knew that they were not buying the plaintiffs' soap.

At the trial Chitty, J., granted an injunction restraining the defendants from selling any soap not being manufactured by the plaintiffs in the wrapper and in the form of any one of three specified exhibits which were admitted to have been issued by the defendants, or in any form calculated or intended to pass it off, or to enable others to pass it off, as and for the goods of the plaintiffs. And it was ordered that an account should be taken of the profits made by the defendants in selling soap made by them in any wrapper such as that contained in the three specified exhibits, and in the form of those exhibits, and that the defendants should pay to the plaintiffs the amount found due on the taking of the account.

The defendants appealed.

The only part of the appeal which calls for a report is that dealing with the question as to the form of account.

Aston, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the appellants.—The account directed by Chitty, J., is too wide. No damages can be recovered unless the injury can be proved: Blofeld v. Payne, 4 B. & Ad. 410. [COTTON, L.J.—In a patent case it is clear that you can either get damages or have an account taken of profits.] The case of a patent is different; no one but the patentee can make the patented goods, and he is therefore clearly entitled to the profits. All that the plaintiff is here entitled to is the profit on the defendants' goods which are proved to have been passed off as the plaintiffs'.

They referred to Leather Cloth Co. v. Hirschfield, 14 W. R. 78, L. R. 1 Eq. 299; Davenport v. Rylands, 14 W. R. 243, L. R. 1 Eq. 302.

Romer, Q.C., Lockwood, Q.C., and John Cutler, who were called upon as to limiting the account by excluding soap which the defendants could show to have been sold as theirs, submitted, on the authority of Edelsten v. Edelsten, 11 W. R. 328, 1 De G. J. & S. 185, 196, that the account ought not to be so limited.

Chadwyck Healey replied.

COTTON, L.J.—There are two questions here—first of all, whether Chitty, J., was right in granting an injunction against the defendants; secondly, if that be decided against the appellants, what ought to have been the form of the decree as regards profits? Now consider what this case is. [His lordship then stated the facts, and came to the conclusion that the injunction had been rightly granted.] Then, ought there to be an alteration as regards the account of profits? Mr. Healey referred us to cases on the question of damages. In my opinion those cases are not relevant to the question as to the form of the account of profits. It is well known that both in trade-mark cases and patent cases the plaintiff is entitled, if he succeeds in getting an injunction, to take either of two forms of relief; he may either say, "I claim from you the damage I have sustained from your wrongful act," or "I claim from you the profit which you have made by your wrongful act." Mr. Chadwyck Healey contended that the only profit which the plaintiffs could call for was that profit which arose from the sale of this soap where the ultimate purchaser bought it, not as the defendants', but as the plaintiffs' soap. But, in my opinion, that is mistaking the whole gist of this action. The defendants, as I understand, do not sell anything to retail purchasers, what they sell they sell to middlemen—that is to say, to people who purchase from them as wholesale merchants, and who are going to sell it by retail; and the complaint against the defendants is this: "You have dressed up your soap in such a dress that those middlemen to whom you sell it are enabled, by its having that deceptive dress upon it, to sell it to the ultimate purchasers as the soap of the plaintiffs." The profit for which the defendants must account is the profit which they have made by the sale of the soap in that fraudulent dress to the middlemen. It is immaterial how the middlemen deal with it. If they find it for their benefit not to use it fraudulently, but to sell the soap to the purchasers from them as Goodwin's, that cannot affect the question whether the sale by the defendants to those middlemen of this soap in a fraudulent dress is a wrongful act. It still remains a wrongful act, because it put into the hands of the middlemen the means of committing a fraud on the plaintiffs by selling the soap of the defendants as the soap of the plaintiffs. In my opinion, therefore, the account of profits is right as it stands.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. [His lordship then dealt with the first question, and continued:—] The question raised by Mr. Chadwyck Healey as to profits and the form of the account struck me as somewhat novel and deserving of attention; but, having looked at Edelsten v. Edelsten, and having regard to the reasons given in the judgment of Lord Westbury in that case, I am satisfied that Chitty, J., was right, and for the reasons which have been given I am of opinion that the appeal fails.

Counsel—Authority—Compromise of action—Verdict upon terms.

It is within the general authority of counsel conducting a cause in court to consent to a compromise upon terms, unless the client has withdrawn his authority to the knowledge of the opposite party.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division refusing to set aside a compromise of the action.

The action was brought by Mr. Matthews and his wife for malicious prosecution, and was tried before Pollock, B., and a jury. At a few minutes past 11 o'clock upon the morning of the second day of the trial, before the plaintiffs' case was closed, in consequence of some observations from the judge, the defendant's counsel agreed to settle the case upon the terms of a verdict for the plaintiffs for £350, with costs, the defendant withdrawing all imputations. The defendant and his solicitor were not present in court, being on their way up from Brighton, and the solicitor had telegraphed to the junior counsel that he and the defendant would arrive at London Bridge station at 11.5 a.m. The defendant arrived in court soon after the case was settled and disposed of, and protested against what had been done. An application was made to have the compromise set aside, and in support thereof a joint affidavit was filed by the defendant and his solicitor, in which the defendant stated that he entirely repudiated the terms consented to in court, and that he had given no authority, nor had he been asked to consent to any terms of settlement; the solicitor also stating that he gave no authority to consent to any terms of settlement. The solicitor's managing clerk, who was in court at the time of the settlement, also stated in effect on affidavit that he had no authority, and that he had given the defendant's counsel no authority to consent to any terms of settlement; that he was not consulted as to the nature of the terms; and that he asked counsel to wait until the defendant and his solicitor arrived in court.

The Divisional Court (Stephen and Wills, JJ.), dismissed the motion.

The defendant appealed.

E. Wilberforce (H. R. Wilson with him), for the defendant.—Counsel has only authority to conduct the cause in court and to fight it; he has no authority to agree to a compromise. The judgment of Crowder, J., in Swinfen v. Swinfen, 5 W. R. 203, 1 C. B. N. S. 364, who dissented from the rest of the court, and the judgment of Sir J. Romilly, M.R., in Swinfen v. Swinfen, 6 W. R. 10, 24 Beav. 549, support this view. It is admitted that the weight of authority is against this contention, but none of the cases were decided in a court of error.

He also cited Swinfen v. Swinfen, 18 C. B. 485; Swinfen v. Lord Chelmsford, 8 W. R. 544, 5 H. & N. 890; Chown v. Parrott, 11 W. R. 668, 14 C. B. N. S. 74; Prestwich v. Poley, 13 W. R. 753, 18 C. B. N. S. 806; and Strauss v. Francis, 14 W. R. 634, L. R. 1 Q. B. 379.

Kemp, Q.C., and R. W. Harper, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This was an action for malicious prosecution, and during the course of the trial counsel for the defendant, in the defendant's absence, desiring to do the best he could for his client, submitted to a verdict for the plaintiffs upon terms—namely, for £350 damages, the defendant withdrawing all imputations. The defendant now applies to have that compromise set aside upon the ground that his counsel had no authority to compromise the action. That raises the question of the relation between counsel and client. That relation has been sometimes expressed as that of agent and principal. For myself, I do not adopt that phraseology. The relation between counsel and client is that of advocate and client. No one can become an advocate for another against that other's will; he is requested by that other person, the client, to act as his advocate. The client may withdraw that request at any moment, and the advocate cannot continue to act as advocate after the request has been withdrawn. When, however, the client has requested the advocate to act for him as his advocate, he has thereby represented to the opposite party that the advocate is acting for him as advocate, and a secret withdrawal of the request not made known to the opposite party cannot affect that party, if he acts upon the supposition that the relationship is still in existence. The request to act as advocate amounts to a request to do whatever it is the recognized duty of an advocate to do for his client. The duty of an advocate is to act for the client in the conduct of the cause in court. He acts as the client's superior, and has unlimited power to do what he thinks best for the interest of his client in the conduct of the cause. That unlimited power, however, is under the control of the court, which will see that nothing manifestly unjust is done, and will give the client relief in such a case. If the client were in court, and the advocate proposed to do something to which the client objected, the client could not direct the advocate as to the cause he was to pursue. No counsel would submit to such dictation. If the client were to insist upon his view, contrary to the opinion of the advocate, the client would have to withdraw the authority to act as advocate. That was the only mode in which the client could get rid of the paramount power of the advocate. If counsel were to do something outside what could be fairly described as the conduct of the cause, his act would not be binding upon the client, unless done with the client's express authority. The meaning of the words "conduct of the cause" had been well stated by Pollock, C.B., in Swinfen v. Lord Chelmsford, 8 W. R. 544, 5 H. & N., at p. 922:—"We are of opinion that, although a counsel has complete authority over the suit, the mode of conducting it and all that is incident to it—such as withdrawing the record, withdrawing a juror, calling no witnesses, or selecting such as in his discretion he thinks ought to be called, and other matters which properly belong to the suit, and the management and conduct of the trial—we think he has not, by virtue of his retainer in the suit, any power over matters that are collateral to it." The mode of conducting the suit, and all that is incident to it, is there laid down as the limit of the power, not of the authority, in its ordinary meaning, of counsel so long as the request to act as advocate is in existence. Besides the specific instances given by the Lord Chief Baron, he states that there are many other matters properly belonging to the suit and the management and conduct of the trial. Among those matters must be the power of counsel to consent to a verdict upon terms. Here it is not suggested that the client withdrew the request to act as advocate, and there is no symptom of any injustice to the client, and so the client cannot now come and ask the court to set aside the compromise.

BOWEN, L.J.—In this action for malicious prosecution the defendant instructed counsel to appear for him. The first day of the trial passed, and at the beginning of the second day the defendant was not present in court. He did not come to court till nearly 11.30 a.m. During that interval he left counsel in uncontrolled command, with the duty of doing his best in the interest of his client upon any emergency that might arise. Before the defendant arrived in court counsel agreed to a verdict being given against him, the defendant withdrawing all imputations. This course must now be taken to have been reasonable, the only question being whether the client was bound by it. Counsel, by appearing for a client, undertakes duties which are regulated by professional honour and etiquette, and counsel's retainer implies that the client is bound, within certain limits, by the conduct of his counsel. Those limits are laid down by Pollock, C.B., in the passage which has been read by the Master of the Rolls. By virtue of his retainer, therefore, counsel has complete authority over the suit, the mode of conducting it, and all that is incident to it. He is clothed with that authority by virtue of his retainer, and his being represented to the other side as so retained. Whether counsel can be called an agent or not, it is important to remember that he is not an agent in the ordinary acceptation of the term, and if he can be called an agent he is an agent of a very peculiar kind, the limit of whose authority is perfectly well understood. Supposing the client to be in court, in my opinion it is the duty of counsel to consult him where it is reasonable that he should be consulted. Counsel should, I am inclined to think, consult his client upon so important a matter as a compromise. It does not follow that counsel, if he thinks his client's course prejudicial, is bound to follow it. He has the alternative of returning his brief. But in this case the client was not present in court, and so he cannot complain that counsel, who was doing his best for his client, agreed to a compromise. Counsel was, so to speak, sailing the ship; and, whether we evolve his authority from his retainer or from his position as counsel, he had power to compromise the suit within reasonable limits. I wish to lay emphasis on this, that the duty of counsel and the authority of counsel come to the same thing. If the authority to compromise is withdrawn without the other side being made aware of it, such withdrawal cannot be allowed to prejudice the other side, who have acted upon the faith of the existence of that authority. It is within the duty of counsel to compromise an action, and, therefore, it is within the limit of his authority.

FRY, L.J.—This case seems to me to be a plain one. No instructions were given as to a compromise. The terms of the compromise included nothing that was properly outside the scope of the action; nothing manifestly unjust. It was within counsel's duty to do the best he could for his client in the matter of a compromise, and if within his duty it was within his authority. I may add that, in my opinion, it would be most disastrous in the interests, not of the bar, but of the public, if we were to hold that this compromise was not binding. The consequence would be that an advantageous offer made by the other side might have to be rejected if the client were not present in court.

DESINGE v. BEARE. (a.)

Will—Gift of property at "my bank"—Share certificates.

A testator who had a cash balance and also share certificates, some of which were inscribed in his name, and others payable to bearer at R.'s bank, made a bequest of "my property at R.'s bank."

Held, that only the cash balance passed under the bequest.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons raising a question whether a gift of "my property at Rothschild's Bank" in the will, dated in 1875, of Horatio Prater, M.D., a domiciled Englishman who died in 1885, passed certain shares in the Paris, Lyons, and Mediterranean Railway Co. The shares in question were actions au porteur (payable to bearer) and actions nominatives (shares inscribed in the testator's name), of the value of about £7,000. The latter shares show on their face the name of the owner, and pass by what is equivalent to transfer and registration, but payment of the dividends may be obtained by the bearer.

The testator, by his will, gave £500 to the Société Protective des Animaux, and also "half of my property at Rothschild's Bank," and the remaining half of his property to be divided between two public libraries in Paris, naming the Mazarin and the library in the Rue Richelieu.

There was a balance of about £320 in English money standing to the account of the testator at his death at Rothschild's Bank, where the actions were deposited.

Sir A. Watson, Q.C., and Wiglesworth (for R. F. Norton), in support of the summons, contended that not only the cash balance, but also the actions passed.

They cited Moore v. Moore, 1 Bro. C. C. 127; Fleming v. Brook, 1 Roper on Legacies, 4th ed., 258; Arnold v. Arnold, 2 My. & K. 365; Earl of Tyrone v. Marquis of Waterford, 8 W. R. 454, 1 De G. F. & J. 613; Guthrie v. Walrond, 31 W. R. 285, 22 Ch. D. 573; Brooke v. Turner, 7 Sim. 671; Marquis of Hertford v. Lowther, 7 Beav. 1.

Romer, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the executors, did not dispute that the cash balance passed, and were not called on as to the actions.

CHITTY, J.—I think it is somewhat strange that the testator should have annexed to the gift of the £500, a gift of one-half of £7,000, which is equivalent to £3,500. That, to my mind, is a slight circumstance. Something must have been intended to pass under the gift of property at Rothschild's Bank. In strict law the balance was a debt due from the bank, but to adopt part of the phraseology of Sir A. Watson in argument that is not the popular view, and when I say that, I am not speaking of the popular view in any lower sense, but I am speaking of it in the ordinary sense in which the term is used among business men. In will after will is to be seen a gift of "my money at my bankers." It is a perfectly intelligible phrase, about which there can be no doubt, and it is quite usual for business men to talk of so much money and so much cash at their bankers, and seeing that I must give some meaning to these words it appears to me to be quite right on the part of the applicants to say that it includes his balance, because that is property—namely, money—though in law a debt—property of his at his bankers.

That being so, is there on the facts before me anything else included? It was rightly argued that "property" is a large term. I am not at liberty, nor am I disposed, to cut it down, but it is property described with reference to a bank—at a bank. It is not property described with reference to a country or to a large district—to a county like Northumberland or to an island like Mauritius; but it is property described with reference to a limited locality—namely, at a bank. I think that the observations of Lord Eldon in Stewart v. The Marquis of Bute, 11 Ves. 657, put the matter in the tersest way. He was commenting on Lord Hardwicke's decision in The Countess of Aylesbury's case, 1 Ves. sen. 273, that bank-notes passed under words something of the same kind as here, and he says, "It was a bequest of 'my house and all that shall be in it at my death.' Lord Hardwicke held that cash passed, and bank-notes, which Lord Hardwicke there, I do not know why, considered as cash; but not promissory notes and securities, as they were the evidence of title to things out of the house and not things in it. Bank-notes, I think, are just in the same situation."

These actions were evidence of the testator's title to property, not at Rothschild's, but to property in the P. L. M. Railway Co. I have read that passage, not for the purpose of citing Lord Eldon's observations with regard to bank-notes, but because I think it expressly in point. If this case were to be decided on authority there are two cases which are authorities upon the general principle and not on the mere special language of any particular will. These are Brooke v. Turner and The Marquis of Hertford v. Lowther. I think it unnecessary to go through these or any other cases: they have been so often reviewed. In my judgment, giving the fair meaning to the word "property," taking it in connection with this limiting and restricting context, I think that none of the actions ought to pass. No distinction can be made between the two classes of actions—namely, those to bearer and those which are called nominatives.

Administration—Costs—Class inquiry.

Executors cannot, by payment into court or any other severance of a legacy, relieve the residue from bearing the costs of an inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining who are the persons entitled to take.

Petition.

Executors paid a sum of £9,500 into court under the Trustee Relief Act, stating in their affidavit that they were absolute strangers to the objects of the gift, and that, being unable to ascertain with certainty who composed the class of objects, they were unable with safety to distribute the fund out of court. They named thirty persons who were believed to be interested in the fund.

In January, 1887, twenty-nine of those persons presented a petition for an inquiry and division among the persons found entitled and payment of costs out of the testator's general estate. An inquiry was directed, and the rest of the petition was ordered to stand over.

It was certified that the thirty persons mentioned in the affidavit were the persons entitled, and on the petition now coming on for further hearing a question was raised as to the costs of the petition.

Romer, Q.C., and Stokes, for the petitioners, contended that the costs must be paid out of the general residuary estate, and cited In re Trick's Trusts, 18 W. R. 123, L. R. 5 Ch. 170; In re Birkett, 27 W. R. 164, 9 Ch. D. 576; In re Sharpe's Trustees, 15 Sim. 470; Tyson v. Jackson, 30 Beav. 384.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and C. Parke, for the executors, submitted that the parties entitled must, at their own expense, establish their title to the fund, and they referred to Boycott v. Newman, 4 W. R. 707; Attorney-General v. Lawes, 8 Hare, 32; Martineau v. Rogers, 4 W. R. 502, 8 De G. Methold, for one of the persons entitled who had presented a petition but had not proceeded with it.

Romer replied.

CHITTY, J.—In this case the executors were bound to pay the legatees described by the testator. No trust whatever was created by the words of the will; it is simply a money legacy. Within six months after the testator's death the executors, in order to avoid the trouble of ascertaining the legatees, paid the money into court. An inquiry was directed, but if the executors who were not trustees had taken the trouble which they ought to have taken it would not have been necessary to direct an inquiry. It is part of their duty as executors to ascertain who the legatees are; that is part of the ordinary course of administration, the costs of which are payable out of residue. I can see no distinction in principle between the costs of ascertaining the construction of the testator's will and the costs of ascertaining the members of a class of legatees. The preponderance of authority, taking In re Trick's Trusts and In re Birkett as two of the latest instances, is in favour of the proposition which I think is the right one—viz., that the executors cannot, by payment into court, or any other severance of a legacy, relieve the residue from bearing the costs of an inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining who are the persons entitled to take. The result therefore is that the costs must come out of the residuary estate in the executors' hands.

Petition.

This was a creditor's petition for the compulsory winding up of the company.

After the presentation of the petition the company passed an extraordinary resolution to wind up voluntarily.

On the hearing of the petition the petitioner asked for a supervision order.

Creditors whose debts amounted to more than one-half of the total amount of the company's debts appeared on the petition and pressed for a compulsory order.

One of these creditors had filed an affidavit in which he alleged that certain debentures which had been issued by the directors were illegal, and that it was important, in the interests of the creditors, that the validity of the debentures should be contested.

J. G. Wood, for the petitioner.

S. A. Sampson, for the company, consented to a supervision order.

R. F. Norton, for the creditors.—A majority of the creditors wish for a compulsory order, and I submit that under section 149 of the Companies Act, 1862, the court ought to have regard to their wishes.

North, J.—I am of opinion that I have no jurisdiction under section 149 of the Companies Act, 1862, to force on a petitioner an order which he does not ask; and even if I had jurisdiction to make a compulsory order I see no ground for making one in the present case. The legality of the debentures can be questioned in a winding up under supervision just as well as in a compulsory winding up. A supervision order will therefore be made, and Mr. Norton's clients will be treated as supporting the petition, and will be entitled to share in the costs accordingly.

Whitehouse v. Edwards. (a.)

Advances in testator's lifetime—Advancement—Creditors' deed—Release—Surety.

Testator's son agreed to purchase a business for £300 and a further sum payable by instalments. Testator advanced the £300, and joined with his son in promissory notes to secure the instalments, the first of which he paid when it fell due. The rest were paid by his executors out of his estate. Testator by his will gave his son a share in his residuary estate, directing that advances should be repaid or taken as part of the share. After the testator's death the son executed a creditors' deed, under which the vendor of the business proved for his unpaid purchase-money, but did not obtain satisfaction. The deed contained a release to the principal debtor and a reservation of rights against sureties.

Held, that the sums paid by the testator were advances within the meaning of the will, but that the sums paid by the executors were not; that such advances were not to be deemed advancements for the benefit of the son; and that, as to the subsequent instalments which the executors had paid, they might retain them out of the income of the son's share, or might prove under the creditors' deed, in which case they must adopt the proof already made by the vendor, and stand in his shoes.

(a) Reported by L. S. Bristowe, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The late George Frederick Whitehouse, who died on the 20th of May, 1886, by his will, dated the 2nd of October, 1885, after appointing the plaintiffs his executors and trustees, devised and bequeathed to them his real and residuary personal estate upon trusts after the death of his wife, as to one-fifth part for his son Daniel absolutely; and as to one other fifth part to invest the same and pay the income to his son George Frederick Whitehouse for his life, and after his death to stand possessed of the capital and income of that fifth part upon trust for his children at twenty-one or, in the case of daughters, marriage. And the testator proceeded as follows:—"And if there shall be no such child as aforesaid of my son, the said George Frederick Whitehouse, then, subject to the trusts and powers hereinbefore declared in favour of my said son, George Frederick Whitehouse, and his issue, I direct that his original share and also any share or shares which shall have accrued under this provision shall accrue to and be held in trust for my other children in equal shares, but so that the further share accruing to each of them shall be held by the trustees or trustee upon and subject to the like trusts and powers as are hereinbefore and hereinafter declared concerning their original shares." And the testator disposed of one other fifth part upon the like trusts in favour of another son, and the remaining fifth part upon trusts in favour of a daughter. And the will contained the following declaration:—"I declare that before any of my three sons the said Daniel Whitehouse, George Frederick Whitehouse the younger, and Henry Arthur Whitehouse shall participate under the trusts of this my will they shall repay to the trustees or trustee all sums of money that I have advanced to them during my lifetime; but the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will shall not be answerable or accountable in any way in case my said sons shall be unable to repay such sums of money so advanced by me to them as aforesaid; but such advances shall be taken to be as part of their share under the trusts of this my will."

In March, 1885, George Frederick Whitehouse, the son, entered into an agreement with John Cartland for the purchase from him of the business of a brassfounder at the price of £1,532 6s. 8d., of which £300 was payable at once, and the remainder by five instalments of varying amounts, to be paid at specified dates, the instalments being secured by joint and several promissory notes of the testator and his son. The testator advanced to his son the said sum of £300, and also subsequently paid the sum of £144 16s. 1d., being the amount of the first instalment which fell due, with interest and costs. The other instalments were all paid by the executors out of the testator's estate.

On June 12, 1886, George Frederick Whitehouse, the son, assigned all his property to the defendant Edwards for the benefit of his creditors. This deed was executed by Cartland as a creditor for the balance of his purchase-money. The deed contained a release from the executing creditors to George Frederick Whitehouse, the son, subject to a reservation of rights against sureties.

The present summons was taken out by the executors to determine (1) whether the sums paid by the testator and his executors constituted debts owing by G. F. Whitehouse, the son, to the testator's estate; (2) whether any and which of such sums were advances within the clause in the will; (3) whether such of them as were advances ought to be retained out of the corpus of G. F. Whitehouse's share; (4) whether such advances were primarily charged on the life interest in such share; (5) whether the executors had a right to retain the life interest of G. F. Whitehouse to satisfy the sums paid by the executors since the testator's death, and (6) whether the executors should prove under the creditors' deed.

W. P. Beale, for the plaintiffs.

Colt, for the defendant Edwards.

Willis Bund, for a beneficiary under the will.

The cases cited are referred to in the judgment.

Stirling, J., after stating the facts as above set forth, proceeded as follows:—Are all or any of the sums so paid by the testator or his executors to be deemed sums of money advanced during the testator's lifetime within the meaning of the clause in his will? Authority on this is scarcely needed, but Auster v. Powell, 1 De G. J. & S. 99, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 138, is in point. I think the two sums paid by the testator in his lifetime are such advances, but those paid by his executors, as to which the liability only was incurred in the testator's lifetime, are not. With regard to the two sums advanced by the testator in his lifetime, the mode in which they are to be dealt with is marked out by the will. Any sons to whom such advances have been made are directed to repay them, and, if they cannot, they are to be taken as part of their shares. It was contended that this meant that the advances to G. F. Whitehouse, the son, were to be repaid out of the income coming to him during his life, so that there could not be a complete ascertainment of the share until the income had been applied in repaying the advances. I do not think that is so. I think the testator intended that there should be a settlement and division at once, and that "share" means the corpus. This construction is also supported by the accruer clause and by the fact that one of the fifth shares is bequeathed absolutely.

It was then contended that the advances in question were to be deemed advancements for G. F. Whitehouse, the son, and the cases of Dyer v. Dyer, 2 Cox, 92; Redington v. Redington, 3 Ridg. P. C. 190; and Drew v. Martin, 12 W. R. 547, 2 H. & M. 130, were relied on.

In Dyer v. Dyer, which was decided in 1788, the Lord Chief Baron said: "The clear result of all the cases, without a single exception, is that the trust of a legal estate, whether freehold, copyhold, or leasehold: whether taken in the names of the purchasers and others jointly, or in the names of others without that of the purchaser: whether in one name or several: whether jointly or successive, results to the man who advances the purchase-money." That is supported by Jessel, M.R., in Marshal v. Crutwell, L. R. 20 Eq. 328, who says (p. 329), "As I understand it, the law is this: the mere circumstance that the name of a child or a wife is inserted on the occasion of a purchase of stock is not sufficient to rebut a resulting trust in favour of the purchaser if the surrounding circumstances lead to the conclusion that a trust was intended."

These cases do not directly apply here. The cases more particularly relied upon were Redington v. Redington and Drew v. Martin. Redington v. Redington, so far as applicable to the present case, is stated by Lord Hatherley in Drew v. Martin, 2 H. & M., at pp. 133, 134. [His lordship read the statement of Redington v. Redington there given, and also stated the case of Drew v. Martin, and continued:—]

Those cases differ from the present in one important respect. In both the contract was that of the testator himself. Here the contract was not that of the testator at all. It was a contract by the son to purchase and pay for a certain business. The father was only mixed up in it because a surety was required. That distinguishes the case from Redington v. Redington. But if Dyer v. Dyer applies, consider how the matter would work out. It is the son's contract. As between father and son, the son has no right to resort to the father for any part of the purchase-money, and if the son pays the purchase-money there is no advancement. If the son does not pay voluntarily, and judgment is recovered against him and payment obtained, there is no advancement. But if the vendor chooses to sue the father there is an advancement. The fact is, you must look at all the circumstances of the case. The testator here did not do anything to bind himself to treat these sums as gifts to the son. They are consequently not advancements.

Then the next question is with regard to the position of the executors. Cartland proved under the creditors' deed of June, 1886. It is immaterial whether he got anything. He did not obtain complete satisfaction, and the residue was paid by the executors: Green v. Wynn, 17 W. R. 385, L. R. 4 Ch. 204, and Bateson v. Gosling, 20 W. R. 98, L. R. 7 C. P. 9, show that this was not an absolute release of the debt so as to be equivalent to a covenant not to sue. The surety was not released, and the executors were right in paying as they did. They are, then, entitled to the promissory notes, and may recover upon them against the principal debtor, G. F. Whitehouse, or they may stand in the place of the principal creditor whom they have already paid, and come in under the creditors' deed. In that case they must adopt the proof already made by Cartland, and stand in his place. Would not, then, the release by the deed given to the principal debtor be effective as between the executors and him? It seems to me that it would, and I am confirmed in that view by Stammers v. Elliott, 16 W. R. 489, L. R. 3 Ch. 195. It seems to me that the position of the executors is this; they may choose whether they will stand upon the original contract, in which case they would be entitled to retain out of the income, or they may go in under the deed, and then they must give up that right of retainer. They must determine according to what is for the benefit of the estate. As to that I cannot decide. I give therefore the following answers to the questions raised by the summons:

(1.) All the sums paid by the testator and his executors constitute debts owing by G. F. Whitehouse to the testator's estate.

(2.) The sums paid by the testator in his lifetime are advances within the meaning of the clause in the will, and the others are not.

(3.) The last-mentioned sums forming advances are to be retained out of the corpus of G. F. Whitehouse's share if he cannot pay them.

(4.) Such sums are not primarily charged on his life interest.

(5.) The executors have a right to retain the life interest of G. F. Whitehouse to satisfy the amount paid on the promissory notes since the testator's death.

(6.) The executors should not prove under the deed if on inquiry in chambers it appears that their so proving and consequently giving up the right to retain out of the life estate would not be for the benefit of the estate.

Cave v. Harris. (a.)

Will — Construction — Specific devise — After-acquired property — Wills Act, s. 24.

A testator, by a codicil made in August, 1867, devised to the defendant in fee "all those three freehold cottages and premises thereunto belonging, situated in E., adjoining the C. Inn, which I have lately purchased." The testator bought the cottages in 1867. He subsequently sold two of them, but he lived in the third till his death in 1883. In 1875 he acquired a garden at the rear of the one in which he lived, and used it during his life as part of his residence.

Held, that the garden did not pass to the devisee with the cottage that remained unsold.

The question in this case was whether, under section 24 of the Wills Act, a devise of a cottage "and premises thereunto belonging . . . which I have lately purchased" included a garden attached to the cottage which was acquired by the testator after the codicil containing the devise was executed. The testator, by a codicil dated the 26th of August, 1867, devised to the defendant in fee "all those three freehold cottages and premises thereunto belonging situated in Exeter-street aforesaid, adjoining the Crown and Anchor Inn, which I have lately purchased." The testator purchased the cottages in 1867; he subsequently sold two of them, but he lived in the third (known as No. 105, Exeter-street) until his death in 1883. In 1836 the testator and his brother had purchased a garden at the rear of the cottages, which they held as tenants in common. In 1875 the brother died, having devised his share to the testator. From the year 1875 till his death the testator occupied the garden as forming part of 105, Exeter-street. The defendant claimed the garden as passing under the devise of the house; the plaintiff was the heir-at-law of the testator, and urged that there was an intestacy as to the garden. The arguments used and the cases cited appear from the judgment.

Kekewich, J.—The question which I have to decide is whether a garden which did not, until a late period, belong to or form part of any particular house, passed by the specific devise (because it is strictly a specific devise) contained in the codicil of the testator in this action, which for all purposes we may treat as his will, inasmuch as the will itself contained no devise of real estate, and may be left out of consideration altogether.

The codicil is dated the 24th of August, 1867, and at that time the testator was not the owner of this garden, nor did he occupy it, nor did it belong to any one of the houses mentioned in the codicil. He changed his residence from time to time, and, as he did himself occupy the garden in connection with one or more of those residences, for the present purpose it is enough to observe that for some time before his death, and, as I understand, up to the date of his death, he was in the occupation of No. 105, Exeter-street, which was one of three cottages which he had purchased some time before, the other two having been sold, and that in connection with No. 105, Exeter-street he occupied the garden, which was approached by a door at the back of No. 105. I have to consider whether, under those circumstances, he having died in 1883, the garden passed by this codicil. The devise is in the first instance—that is to say, the governing words of the devise are—"all those three freehold cottages," which I take for granted (there is no dispute about it) mean 105, 106, and 107. It is impossible to suppose that the garden was intended to pass, or would pass, by the description of those freehold cottages—at any rate, at that time. He adds the words, "and premises thereunto belonging, situate in Exeter-street aforesaid," of course referring to the cottages, not to the premises thereunto belonging. This garden, if it is part of the premises thereunto belonging, must be part of the premises belonging to one of the cottages—namely, to 105.

It is not suggested that it belonged to either of the others. That it did at the time of the death belong to No. 105 has, I think, been conceded; at any rate it has not formed the subject of serious argument. In strict language that it did belong to it is a question into which I did not propose to enter. I assume that at the testator's death it did. He then describes the property as adjoining the Crown and Anchor Inn. I do not intend to dwell upon that, because, although in one sense the garden did not adjoin the Crown and Anchor Inn, it was near enough to apply to the whole property. Then come these words, which apply to the whole question, "which I have lately purchased"—a statement which was perfectly true in 1867, but was only true in 1883 on the hypothesis that "lately" is a flexible word and might mean at any time in the testator's lifetime. If I am to construe the will as dated in 1867, and standing alone, I have no hesitation in construing it to exclude the garden; it does not come within any part of that description. But then I am told it does come within it, and that is the real question by force of the 24th section of the Wills Act, which enacts that every will shall be construed with reference to the personal and real estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless the contrary intention shall appear by the will. I understand that to mean that, in order to construe a will with the view of ascertaining what real and personal estate is comprised in it, you must read it to make it take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, and that you are not so to construe it for any other purpose. Attempts have often been made to construe a will as from the date of the death for the purpose of ascertaining the persons beneficially interested, but the section has always been relied upon to answer any such arguments as that; it is only to be construed in that way for the purpose of ascertaining what is the real and personal estate comprised in it.

Now Mr. Warmington says that in order to decide against him I must find words here excluding the garden, which was afterwards annexed to No. 105. That does not seem to me to be the proper way of applying the Act of Parliament. It is a convenient way, from his point of view, of stating the meaning of the Act, but it does not seem to me to be correct. I prefer the principles indicated by Hall, V.C., in Dickenson v. Dickenson, 28 W. R. 141, 9 Ch. D. 667, 12 Ch. D. 22, where he says there are no words which limit the property there to that which the testator possessed at the date of the will, showing that, in the Vice-Chancellor's opinion, what you want is words which limit the devised property to that which the testator had at the date of the will rather than excluding something purchased afterwards. And I find precisely the same principle, as I understand it, laid down by Wood, V.C., in the case of Douglas v. Douglas, Kay, 400, 2 W. R. Dig. 123, which was quoted by Mr. Barber. He refers to Cole v. Scott, 1 Mac. & G. 518, saying, "Lord Cottenham says what everyone must agree in thinking correct—that the intention of the testator is not to be altered, and if it be clear that the testator is not referring to a general class of property, but to something specific, the new statute is not to have the operation of passing property which evidently was not in the contemplation of the testator, where the subject of the gift appears to have been defined and marked out by him as existing at the period when he is speaking."

To my mind the testator here has defined and marked out a specific property as that which was in his contemplation and which he intended to devise; therefore, according to Wood, V.C.'s, principle, the statute is not to have that operation. I observe that Wood, V.C., refers to it as a new statute, though he was speaking in 1854 and the Act was passed in 1837, which, perhaps, may excuse the testator for using the word "lately" with reference to property purchased some time before. Not only does he specify three freehold cottages, but he refers to them as those which he has lately purchased.

I must look at the will as at the date for the purpose of ascertaining what he meant. The words seem to me to deal with this specific property specified by reference to a purchase then lately made. I do not think that any alteration really would be made in the sense if I construed it at the date of the will. The only difficulty would be that "lately" would have a reference to a date long before; but, construing the gift, as I say I think it is, as a specific gift, it is not enlarged by the operation of the words of the Act of Parliament which, for the reasons mentioned by Wood, V.C., have no application.

So deciding, it will be observed that I do not rely at all on the words at the end of section 24, "unless the contrary intention shall appear." I think those words are intended to apply to a case where it would otherwise be possible and right to construe the will so as to include the particular real or personal estate, but in some way or other, expressly or by implication, the testator has evidenced a contrary intention. I do not think it would be right to say here that he has expressed a contrary intention. I prefer to say that he is dealing with something specific, that the will passes that specific property and nothing else, and that, therefore, the Act does not apply.

I think, therefore, I must hold that the defendant is not entitled to this property—in other words, that her counter-claim fails—and I think I must give the plaintiff the costs of that counter-claim, which will be set off against the costs which are to be deducted out of the moneys in the defendant's hands and which are payable by her to the plaintiff in regard to the other property. I suppose there is no need of an account or anything of that kind.

REG. v. FARRANT. (a.)

Justice of the peace — Disqualification on ground of interest—Summoned as witness.

A magistrate had visited, as medical attendant, a person who alleged that he had been assaulted. He strongly advised his patient not to prosecute, and afterwards received a communication from the person alleged to have committed the assault, in which an apology was tendered, and a desire expressed for an amicable settlement. It was alleged that he would be a necessary witness for the prosecution.

Held, that he was not disqualified from sitting to hear a summons taken out for the alleged assault, either on the ground of interest or because he might be called as a witness.

This was an application for a supersedeas to set aside a rule absolute for a prohibition to restrain Dr. Farrant, the mayor of Taunton, from sitting as one of the magistrates of that borough to hear and adjudicate upon certain summonses for assault.

It appeared from the affidavits that Dr. Farrant had been called in to attend one of his patients after the alleged assault had taken place as his medical attendant, and had advised him not to bring the matter before the magistrates. He had also received a communication, alleged to amount to an admission, from the person against whom it was intended that a summons for assault should be taken out. It was therefore intended that he should be called as a witness for the prosecution.

(a.) Reported by A. H. TODD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was further alleged that he had offered to bet that the magistrates would not convict in such a case, though this was contradicted.

A rule nisi for a supersedeas having been obtained,

Wheeler, Q.C., and Bartley Denniss, in support of the prohibition.—The conduct of the mayor was equivocal, and showed he had a bias. It is not only a pecuniary interest which disqualifies, but any interest which the magistrate is shown to have which is calculated to bias his judgment.

They cited Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal Co., 3 H. L. Cas. 759, and cases there referred to; Shortt on Information, Mandamus, and Prohibition, i., 441; Reg. v. Handsley, 30 W. R. 368, 8 Q. B. D. 383; Reg. v. Recorder of Cambridge, 6 W. R. 80, 8 El. & Bl. 637.

Sir H. James, Q.C., and Blake Odgers, contrà.—Dr. Farrant was only interested as a peacemaker. The case is not analogous to that of a juror who is interested; it is here sought to deprive a magistrate of his office: Reg. v. Alcock, 37 L. T. N. S. 829, 26 W. R. Dig. 112. The mere fact that he may be called as a witness would not disqualify him: Reg. v. Tooke, 32 W. R. 753.

STEPHEN, J.—It is a most important legal principle that no one shall be judge in his own cause; that no one shall sit as a judge when he has the smallest pecuniary interest in the dispute before him is a doctrine that has been carried to very great length. There is no suggestion in the present case that Dr. Farrant has any pecuniary interest in the present matter. But the law says that though the judge or magistrate has no pecuniary interest in a cause, he may be otherwise interested in it to such an extent as to bias his judgment, and then he ought not to sit as a judge. Thus in Reg. v. Rand, L. R. 1 Q. B. 230, 14 W. R. C. L. Dig. 47, it was held that though the mere possibility of bias in favour of one of the parties does not ipso facto avoid the decision of the judge, yet wherever there was real likelihood that such a bias did exist it would be otherwise. That decision was approved of in Reg. v. Myers, 24 W. R. 392, 1 Q. B. D. 173, and Reg. v. Handsley. Therefore the question we have to decide is whether such a substantial interest has been shown in this case that it is probable that if Dr. Farrant heard the charges of assault he would be likely to show a real bias in favour of one of the parties. The result of the evidence we have heard is that Dr. Farrant was called in to attend one of his patients, whom he treated for certain injuries, and to whom he gave the advice that it would be better not to take the case into court, but to settle it quietly. That advice seems to have been given by him as a friend. Afterwards he received a message that the person alleged to have committed the assault was willing to apologize for what had happened, and to come to an arrangement. The other side, however, had by this time instructed their solicitors. Does that show any real bias? I am bound to say I cannot see anything of the kind. We suggested when this case was first mentioned that it would be better to settle it out of court, surely that does not show any bias in us. It is also said that it would be necessary to call Dr. Farrant to give evidence in the case as to the nature of the injuries and as to the admission. It may be that this is a ground for Dr. Farrant to say, as a matter of grace, he would not sit on the bench, but it appears to me that to hold as a matter of law that because a magistrate or judge is to be called as a witness that disqualifies him from doing his duty would be to create a precedent which, to say the least of it, would cause very great inconvenience. It has also been suggested that Dr. Farrant offered to make a bet as to the result of the case if it was tried out; if he had done so seriously it would have been a serious matter, even though he had not actually made the bet, it would show great levity unbecoming in a person in his position, but that is not proved here. The writ of supersedeas must be granted.

Charles, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Sale—Stoppage in transitu—Goods bought for delivery on board ship.

Goods were bought of the defendants by T. & Co., who sent the following consignment note: "Please consign the ten hogsheads hollow ware to The Darling Downs, to Melbourne, loading in the East India Docks." The goods were sent to Poplar by railway, and were shipped by midday on July 3. In the morning of that day the defendants, having heard of T. & Co.'s insolvency, telegraphed to the railway company, who telegraphed to their agent at Poplar, to stop delivery of the goods. The message arrived after the goods had been shipped. The mate's receipt for the goods was given to the railway company and by them sent on to T. & Co. No bills of lading were applied for in exchange for the receipt. The Darling Downs sailed for Melbourne with the goods on board.

Held, that there had been no constructive delivery of the goods to the buyers, and that the notice to stop was good.

Special case stated under ord. 57, r. 9.

The facts set forth in the special case, so far as material, were as follows:—

On June 2, 1885, the defendants, ironfounders at Wolverhampton, received from Messrs. Tickle & Co., of London, an order for ten hogsheads of hollow ware. The material part of the order was as follows:—"Please pack the goods for us in usual way, and mark the same as before, following numbers, invoice in duplicate. On receipt of invoice we will forward you shipping documents." An invoice of the goods was accordingly forwarded by the defendants.

On June 28, 1885, the defendants received from Tickle & Co. a consignment note in these terms:—"Please consign the 10 hhds. hollow ware to The Darling Downs, to Melbourne, loading in the East India Docks here."

On June 29, 1885, the defendants delivered the ten hogsheads to Pickford & Co., collecting agents for the London and North-Western Railway Co. at Wolverhampton.

On June 30, 1885, the railway company sent to Tickle & Co. an advice note notifying the arrival of the goods, and adding that the goods "are now held by the company, not as common carriers, but as warehousemen, at owners' sole risk. The goods advised by this note have been forwarded to our Poplar Station for shipment per Darling Downs."

By midday on July 3 the goods were shipped on board The Darling Downs, and a mate's receipt forwarded by the railway company to Tickle & Co.

On July 3 the defendants received notice of the insolvency of Tickle & Co., and sent, at 10 a.m. of July 3, a message to the agent at Wolverhampton of the London and North-Western Railway Co. asking them to stop delivery of the goods. At that time the goods were on board lighters hired on behalf of the railway company. A telegram was at once sent by the railway company to their agent at Poplar bidding him hold the goods. The agent, however, was not able to transmit the order in time to stop the shipment of the goods on board The Darling Downs.

Bills of lading were prepared after the mate's receipt had been made out, but the bills remained in the possession of the shipowners, the stakeholders in the proceedings.

After the shipment of the goods The Darling Downs sailed for Melbourne.

On July 11, 1885, Tickle & Co. presented a petition in bankruptcy, a receiving order was made, and eventually a scheme of arrangement was agreed to and duly confirmed. Mr. J. Young was appointed trustee and manager of the estate and business of Tickle & Co.

Mr. J. Young and the defendants both claimed the goods then in possession of the agents of the shipowners.

The question for the opinion of the court was who were entitled to property in or possession of the said hogsheads.

Charles, Q.C., and G. E. Lyon, for the trustee, cited Ex parte Miles, 15 Q. B. D. 39, 33 W. R. Dig. 315; Kendall v. Marshall, 31 W. R. 597, 11 Q. B. D. 356.

Charles, Q.C., replied.

Aug. 10.—Mathew, J.—This is a special case stated to ascertain whether Mr. Young, as trustee for the estate of Tickle & Co., or Messrs. Clark, are entitled to the possession of ten hogsheads of hollow ware which had been forwarded on board The Darling Downs from London to Melbourne. On the 1st of June, 1885, Clark & Co. received an order at Wolverhampton, from Tickle & Co., for the goods in question; and on the 25th of June, in pursuance of the order, an invoice for the goods, amounting to £99 6s. 8d., was forwarded by Messrs. Clark to Messrs. Tickle. In the order nothing was stated as to the destination of the goods, but on the 28th of June Clark & Co. received from Tickle & Co. directions to consign the goods to The Darling Downs, then loading in the East India Docks for Melbourne. On the 29th of June the goods were accordingly delivered by Clark & Co. to the London and North-Western Railway at Wolverhampton to be put on board The Darling Downs. On the 30th of June the railway company notified to Tickle & Co. that the goods had been forwarded to Poplar Station for shipment, and on the morning of July 3 the goods were shipped by lightermen employed by the railway company and put on board The Darling Downs. The mate's receipt was sent to Tickle & Co. While the goods were in course of transit to the ship, Clark & Co. were informed that the buyers had stopped payment, and they immediately tried to stop delivery of the goods, but before the notice to stop was received the goods had been shipped. The vessel shortly after sailed for Melbourne with the goods on board. No bills of lading were applied for in exchange for the mate's receipt, and it was arranged that the goods should remain in possession of the owners of the ship pending the settlement of the question whether or not the right to stop in transitu was gone. It was contended for the trustee of the buyers' estate that the rule of law applicable to the case was this: that, where goods have arrived at a place indicated by the buyer to the seller, and are to remain there in the hands of an agent of the buyer, there is an end of the transitus, although the place be not that of their ultimate destination. In the particular case it was said that the master and mate of the vessel was the agent of the buyers, who, as between them and the sellers, was to receive the goods for the buyers, and therefore that this transit ended with the shipment. But the principle to be gathered from the many decisions on the subject seems to me to be that, in determining whether there has been a constructive delivery of the goods to an agent of the buyer, it must be ascertained in what capacity the agent has received the goods, whether to carry or to hold for the buyer. In other words, the inquiry must be—What is the exact nature of the contract between the buyer and the agent under which the latter has received the goods? In Dixon v. Baldwen, 5 East, 175, the evidence was directed to show that Metcalf received the goods as agent for the buyers in order that he might hold them until he received further orders as to their destination, and that without such orders the goods in his hands would remain stationary. The court held, upon this evidence, that when the goods reached Metcalf the transit was at an end.

In Kendall v. Marshall the facts as presented to the Court of Appeal would seem to be different from those dealt with by the court below. At the trial it appeared that Marshall & Co. had entered into a contract with the buyers to forward the goods at through rate from Bolton to Rouen. It was not suggested that there was any contract between the buyers and Marshall & Co. other than the contract to forward. There was no evidence that the railway company were the agents of the buyers. They were treated as having acted for Marshall & Co. In the Court of Appeal it would appear from the judgment of all the Lords Justices that it was assumed or admitted that the railway company were the agents of the buyers to carry the goods to Garston and there deliver them to Marshall & Co., to be held by them for the buyers until further orders were given. With this material alteration of the evidence submitted to the Court of Appeal the case was readily brought into line with Dixon v. Baldwen, and it was held that there had been a constructive delivery to the buyers. The judgments delivered in the Court of Appeal in this and in the later case of Ex parte Miles seem to me to involve the application of the principle that, in determining whether the goods are still in transitu, a sufficient inquiry into the facts must be made to ascertain what has been the contract between the buyers and the agents who have received the goods. The cases referred to are instances of constructive delivery to the buyer, and of consequent termination of the transit. But the numerous cases from Smith v. Goss (1 Camp. 282) to Ex parte Watson, in which the receipt of the goods by the agent has been held not to be a constructive delivery to the buyer, indicate, it seems to me, with the greatest clearness, the existence and application of the rule. These authorities show that although the fact that a person has been named by the buyer to the seller to receive the goods is some evidence, it is by no means conclusive evidence that the receipt by that person is the end of the transit. The case of Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Co. presents a close analogy to this case. The buyer had purchased china clay which was to be delivered by the seller free on board at a specified port. Afterwards the buyer named the vessel to the vendor, and the clay was shipped. Before the ship sailed the buyer stopped payment, and notice to stop in transitu was given to the master. No bill of lading had been signed, and it was held by the Court of Appeal that the transit was not at an end.

In the present case it seems clear that the railway company, the lightermen, and the shipowners were all agents of the buyers, not to hold, but to forward the goods. The reason urged by the learned counsel for the trustree that the delivery on board ship to the mate was a constructive delivery to the buyers would apply as forcibly to the delivery to the railway company. But if this were a delivery to the buyers the transit would have ended in law at the point at which it commenced in fact. The contract with the shipowners was to forward the goods to Melbourne, and there deliver upon the terms of a bill of lading in the usual form, and until the bill of lading had been transferred to a bonâ fide holder for value it seems to me that the sellers in this case would retain the right to stop in transitu. It was further urged for the trustee that the transit was over when the goods were shipped, because the goods might, on the demand of the buyers, have been taken out of the possession of the master of the ship; but this possibility, so remote in a business point of view, is no proof that the transit was terminated: see London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Bartlett, 10 W. R. 109, 7 H. & N. 401. The further point was made that the notice to stop was insufficient because it had been served on the owners and not on the master of the ship. But the notice had been given to the owners under such circumstances as enabled them to communicate with the master and prevent a delivery contrary to the terms of the notice to stop: Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 M. & W. 518.

I am of opinion, for these reasons, that the sellers were entitled to stop the goods, and our judgment must be for them.

Cave, J.—In all cases of stoppage in transitu it is necessary first of all to consider what is the transitus or passage of the goods from the possession of the vendor to that of the purchaser. The moment the goods are delivered by the vendor to a carrier to be carried to the purchaser the transit begins. When the goods have arrived at their destination and have been delivered to the purchaser or his agent, or when the carrier holds them as warehouseman for the purchaser, and no longer as carrier only, the transit is at an end. The destination may be fixed by the contract of sale or by directions given by the purchaser to the vendor. But however fixed, the goods have arrived at their destination and the transit is at an end when they have got into the hands of someone who holds them for the purchaser and for some other purpose than that of merely carrying them to the destination fixed by the contract or by the directions given by the purchaser to the vendor. The difficulty in each case lies in applying these principles. In the case now before us, if the purchasers on getting the mate's receipts had sent a clerk down with them to The Darling Downs to exchange them for a bill of lading of the goods, I should have been of opinion that the goods had come into the possession of the purchasers and that transit was at an end; because I should from these facts have drawn the inference that it was the intention of the parties that as between them The Darling Downs in the docks should be the destination of the goods. For I think it is quite immaterial whether the purchasers do or do not intend after the goods have got into their possession to send them to a further destination, and that it is equally immaterial whether they do or do not communicate such intention to the vendors. On the other hand, if the London and North-Western Railway Co. had exchanged the mate's receipts for a bill of lading making the goods deliverable to the order of the vendors, and had sent that bill of lading to the vendors, and if the purchasers had acquiesced in that course of conduct, I should have drawn the inference that as between the vendors and purchasers Melbourne was the destination of the goods. In this case neither of those courses were exactly followed. The railway company sent the mate's receipts to the purchasers, who did nothing with them. No bill of lading was obtained by anyone, and the goods went to Melbourne because by the direction of the purchasers the vendors had put them on board a vessel bound for that place. Under these circumstances I am unable to distinguish the case from Ex parte Rosevear China Clay Co., which is binding upon us, although I am also unable to reconcile that case with some of the dicta in Ex parte Miles.

Bankruptcy—Disclaimer of lease—Mortgage by sub-demise—Vesting order—Application by landlord—Form of order—Practice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 55.

Leave having been given to the trustee in a bankruptcy to disclaim the bankrupt's interest in certain leases, it was ordered, on the application of the landlord, that, unless the executor of a mortgagee by sub-demise of the bankrupt's interest should, within seven days, elect to accept an order vesting in him the disclaimed property, subject to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the leases, he should be excluded from all interest in and security upon the property.

Held, that the court had power to make the order on the application of the landlord, and that, subject to a formal amendment, the order made was right.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Montagu Bere in the county court at Truro by which, on giving leave to the trustee in the bankruptcy to disclaim the bankrupt's interest in certain leases, he directed, on the application of the landlord, that unless the appellant, as executor of a mortgagee by sub-demise of the bankrupt's interest, should, within seven days, elect to accept an order vesting in him the disclaimed property subject to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the leases, he should be excluded from all interest in and security upon the property.

On August 20, 1883, the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe granted to the debtor, David Cock, three leases for several terms of ninety-nine years at rents from eight to ten guineas and heriots from four to five guineas and burdened with onerous covenants as to repairs, building walls, &c. On March 21, 1885, the debtor mortgaged to C. H. Nankivell these three properties by way of demise, reserving to himself the last three days of the term. In 1886 C. H. Nankivell died, and Shilson, the present appellant, became his executor. In 1887 Cock, the debtor, became bankrupt, and the trustee in the bankruptcy subsequently applied for leave to disclaim these three leases amongst other property, which was granted, and on the application of the solicitor for the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe it was further ordered that the appellant should take a vesting order subject to the bankrupt's liabilities or be excluded from all interest as above mentioned.

Shilson now appealed.

Herbert Reed, for the appellant.—As the order is made the appellant cannot take a vesting order of one lease, but must take a vesting order of all or none. The leases were separate and independent, and permission ought to be given to make election to take or refuse a vesting order as to all or any as the appellant may see fit. Further, the court had no power to make such an order on the application of the landlord. The order could only be made on the application of the sub-lessee. At all events, it could not be made on the application of the landlord.

He referred to Ex parte Turquand, In re Parker, 33 W. R. 752, 14 Q. B. D. 405; Smalley v. Hardinge, 29 W. R. 554, 7 Q. B. D. 524; Ex parte Walton, In re Levy, 30 W. R 395, 17 Ch. D. 746.

Sidney Woolf, for the landlord.—As to the first point, the form of order is the usual one, but there is nothing to prevent the appellant from taking a vesting order as to one or any of the leases if he thinks fit. As to the other point, the proviso in sub-section (6) of section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was to remedy the hardship pointed out in Smalley v. Hardinge and other cases of the kind. The case of Ex parte Turquand, In re Parker, does not say that a landlord cannot make application for a vesting order, and that case is a distinct authority that persons like the appellant must take a vesting order or be excluded. The landlord may apply to have a vesting order to the mortgagee, and the mortgagee has the option to take it or not.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—Cave, J., read the written judgment of the court:—

This is an appeal from an order of the county court of Cornwall giving the trustee leave to disclaim the bankrupt's interest in certain leases, and, on the application of the landlord, ordering that, unless the appellant, as executor of Charles Henry Nankivell, a mortgagee by sub-demise of the bankrupt's interest, should, within seven days, elect to accept an order vesting in him the disclaimed property subject to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the leases, he should be excluded from all interest in and security upon the property.

The first point taken for the appellant was that, as the leases from the landlord to the bankrupt were separate and independent, he ought to be permitted to make his election to take or refuse a vesting order as to all or any as he may see fit. This point, which does not appear to have been brought before the judge of the county court, was at once admitted by Mr. Woolf, who appeared for the respondent, and, if necessary, the order may be amended accordingly.

It was next contended that the court had no power to make such an order except on the application of the sub-lessee, or at all events not on the application of the landlord. On this point we took time to put our judgment into writing, not on account of any doubt we felt on the point, but because, on a subject which is so likely to recur, we thought it advisable to lay down a distinct principle in writing for the guidance of the court in future.

By section 23 of the Act of 1869 the trustee was entitled to disclaim, among other onerous property, any lease burdened with onerous covenants; and it was provided that on the execution of such disclaimer the property disclaimed should, if the same was a lease, be deemed to have been surrendered on the date of the order of adjudication. It was further enacted that any person interested in any disclaimed property might apply to the court, and the court might, upon such application, order possession of the disclaimed property to be delivered up to him.

This section soon gave rise to questions of some difficulty. In Smalley v. Hardinge it was held by the Court of Appeal that when a lessee sublets and afterwards becomes bankrupt and his trustee disclaims, the lessor is not entitled to eject the sub-tenant. In the judgment in that case some expressions are to be found treating the disclaimer as having the same effect as an actual surrender. When, however, that question subsequently came before the Court of Appeal in Ex parte Walton, In re Levy, the court held that the words of the section must be read with some qualification, and that the disclaimer operated as a surrender so far only as was necessary to relieve the bankrupt and his estate and the trustee from liability, and did not otherwise affect the rights or liabilities of third parties in relation to the property disclaimed.

The construction of this statute came before the House of Lords in Hill v. East and West India Dock Co., 32 W. R. 925, 9 App. Cas. 448, and the opinions of their lordships, and especially that of Lord Bramwell, in that case may be referred to as showing the difficulty felt in putting a construction on the language of section 23 of the Act of 1869.

That section, however, has been repealed, and the statute of 1883 has, as Lord Cairns said, substituted an enactment of a very different and much more explicit kind upon this part of the bankruptcy law. Sub-section (1) of section 55 enacts, in general terms, that the trustee may disclaim onerous property of various kinds, including land of any tenure burdened with onerous covenants. Sub-section (2) provides that the disclaimer shall operate to determine as from the date of disclaimer the rights, interests, and liabilities of the bankrupt and his property in, or in respect of, the property disclaimed, and shall also discharge the trustee from all personal liability in respect of the property disclaimed as from the date when the property vested in him, but shall not, except so far as is necessary for the purpose of releasing the bankrupt and his property and the trustee from liability, affect the rights or liabilities of any other persons. Now, there is no doubt that if the section had stopped there it would have been in substance a re-enactment of the corresponding part of the statute of 1869, as explained by the cases already cited.

By sub-section (6) the court may, on application by any person either claiming any interest in any disclaimed property or under any liability not discharged by the Act in respect of any disclaimed property, make an order for the vesting of the property in, or delivery thereof, to any person entitled thereto, or to whom it may seem just that the same should be delivered by way of compensation for such liability as aforesaid on such terms as the court thinks just. This sub-section appears intended to apply to all property that may be disclaimed of whatever kind. In Ex parte Turquand I expressed a doubt whether the words "persons claiming an interest in any disclaimed property," include a landlord. They do, of course, include persons claiming under the bankrupt; but on further consideration we think that they include the lessor also. For instance, if a lessee in possession who had neither given nor contracted to give any interest to anyone else were to become bankrupt, and his trustee were to disclaim, we think the court would have authority under this section to give possession to the landlord on his application. This view, however, would not dispose of the present case, for, there being a sub-lessee, the landlord could not under the section, so far as we have yet gone, show that he was entitled to the disclaimed property. We do not, as at present advised, think that the landlord could apply under this part of the section for an order that the property should be vested in, or delivered to, a person other than himself, except in cases were such other person is only a trustee for the landlord. The sub-section, however, provides that where the property disclaimed is of a leasehold nature, the court shall not make a vesting order in favour of any person claiming under the bankrupt, whether as under-lessee or as mortgagee by demise, except upon the terms of making such person subject to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the lease when the petition was filed, and any mortgagee or under-lessee declining to accept a vesting order upon such terms shall be excluded from all interest in and security upon the property; and, if there shall be no person claiming under the bankrupt who is willing to accept an order in such terms, the court shall have power to vest the bankrupt's estate in the property in any person liable alone or jointly with the bankrupt to perform the lessee's covenants in such lease, freed and discharged from all estates, incumbrances, and interests created therein by the bankrupt. Now we are clearly of opinion that this provision is of general application in all cases in which an application to disclaim is made, and not only to cases where the sub-lessee or mortgagee by demise applies for a vesting order. This is clearly the opinion of Lord Bramwell, who, in Hill v. East and West India Dock Co., speaking of this proviso to sub-section (6), says "It is noticeable that it gives a great benefit to landlords, doubtless from a sense of their use to the public. Why should a sub-lessee or mortgagee bear the loss occasioned by a lessee's bankruptcy? Why not the landlord?" To this it may be replied that the benefit is given equally to the lessee where the bankrupt is an assignee and to the surety, where there is one, for a bankrupt lessee.

Let us see how the case will work out in practice. A. grants a lease for ninety-nine years at £100 a year to B., who assigns to C., who, in consideration of an advance of £2,000, demises to D. for the residue of the term, except three days, at a peppercorn. C. becomes bankrupt, and his trustee, wishing to disclaim, brings A., B., and D. before the court. A. cannot apply for a vesting order or a delivery order, because he is not entitled to the property, nor can B. so long as D. is willing to take a vesting order. B. therefore applies that D. may be put to his election, and, if he declines to take a vesting order, that he may be excluded and a vesting order made in favour of him (B.). The same thing occurs where C. is the lessee and B. is only a surety for him. Where there is no person liable either jointly with the bankrupt or alone to perform the lessees' covenants we are of opinion that, notwithstanding the doubt expressed in Ex parte Turquand, the landlord may apply that the sub-lessee may be put to his election. If he elects to take a vesting order he gets one. If he declines, the landlord may ask for an order excluding the sub-lessee from all interest in and security upon the property and vesting the property in him (the landlord) discharged from the sub-lease because, by virtue of the disclaimer and the exclusion of the sub-lessee, he has become the party entitled to possession. This course appears to us to be clearly warranted by the language of the Act and to carry out its provisions. Until the sub-lessee has declined to take a vesting order the court has no power to make a vesting order either in favour of the original lessee or of the surety for the bankrupt if there is one, and consequently if the power could only be exercised upon an application by the sub-lessee it would remain a dead letter, for the sub-lessee never would have any interest in making such an application, and the person liable jointly or alone with the bankrupt could not get a vesting order until the sub-lessee had declined. Where all the parties are before the court upon an application for leave to disclaim, the vesting order may at once be offered to the sub-lessee, and on his refusal may be granted to the surety or original lessee, or, if there is no person liable alone or jointly with the bankrupt, an order for a vesting order and for delivery of possession, or for a vesting order only, as the circumstances may require, may be made in favour of the lessor.

Where no leave to disclaim is required, and consequently the parties interested in the property disclaimed or liable to perform the covenants of the lease are not brought before the court by the trustee, we are of opinion that the person liable to perform the covenants, or in the absence of such person the lessor, may bring the sub-lessee before the court and ask for an order for his exclusion and for a vesting order, or for delivery of the property, if the sub-lessee refuses himself to take a vesting order.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the order of the court below was substantially right, and, subject to a formal amendment making it clear that the appellant is entitled to take all or none or any one or two of the leases, the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Bankruptcy—Voluntary settlement—Lien of trustees of settlement for costs—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47.

In September, 1885, the debtor executed a post-nuptial settlement, but subsequently brought an action to set aside the settlement which was defended by the trustees, and dismissed, with costs against the plaintiff. The debtor thereupon filed his own petition and became bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement.

Held, that the settlement was void by section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, but that the trustees were entitled to a lien on a portion of the trust funds for their costs in the action.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Snagge, in the county court at Halifax, declaring a voluntary settlement executed by the bankrupt to be void under section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, but that the trustees of the settlement were entitled to a lien on a portion of the trust funds for their costs in a certain action.

On September 26, 1885, the debtor executed a post-nuptial settlement, vesting the sum of £323 in two trustees for the benefit of himself for life, and, after his death, for his children. In 1886 an action was commenced by the debtor to have the settlement declared void on the ground of undue influence, which action was defended by the trustees, and on March 9, 1887, the case was tried before Kekewich, J., who gave judgment in favour of the defendants (the trustees of the settlement), and ordered the plaintiff to pay their costs. On March 30, 1887, the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition, and on May 14 application was made by the official receiver to have the settlement declared void under section 47. The county court judge declared the settlement void, but directed that the trustees were entitled to a lien on the trust funds for £189—the costs above mentioned.

The official receiver now appealed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—When a settlement is void under section 47 as being made within two years before bankruptcy, it is, as against the trustees, a nullity, and there can be no lien upon the trust funds. The trustees are not trustees at all, because they are trustees of a trust which has been declared to have no existence. The effect of section 47, when it declares a settlement void, is that there is no trust, and there cannot be a lien on a void and invalid trust.

He referred to Dutton v. Thomson, 31 W. R. 596, 23 Ch. D. 278; Smith v. Dresser, 14 W. R. 469, L. R. 1 Eq. 651.

Sidney Woolf, for the trustees of the settlement.—When the debtor could not defeat the settlement in any other way he filed his own petition. The trustees have an ordinary lien for expenses incurred by them. In the cases cited, either the deed was an act of bankruptcy or the costs were incurred in defending the deed, which proved to be bad.

Cave, J.—This appeal must be dismissed. The trustees undertook to become trustees of a settlement executed by the bankrupt in 1885. It was a post-nuptial settlement, but it does not follow that there was anything wrong about it. At the time of marriage a man may not be able to make any settlement, and afterwards he may come to be in such a position that he feels he can and ought to do so. I cannot see that because it was a post-nuptial settlement it was wrong of the trustees to accept the trusts of it. In the course of the trust there was an attempt by the bankrupt to set aside the settlement, and these trustees, who had no interest in it, in the plain course of their duty defended the settlement for the children, and they were successful, but at the cost of £189. As soon as that occurred the settlor filed his petition, and got himself adjudicated bankrupt, and the official receiver asked for an order on the trustees to pay over the £323. The trustees had no objection to offer to the deed being declared void, but they say that when they thought the deed was valid they incurred the liability of £189 and preserved the trust fund, and because the deed was not invalid in its inception, and because they saved the fund, they ask to be allowed to retain their costs. That seems only to be reasonable, but is there any authority which obliges them to give up all the fund? There seems to be no authority which goes to that length. Undoubtedly if a man becomes trustee of a deed the trusts of which are invalid, or where a deed is valid at the time of settlement, if the trustees resist the application of the trustee in bankruptcy to have the deed set aside, and fail, they cannot have their costs out of the estate. But the present case is not the case of defending an invalid document. It was the duty of the trustees to defend this document at the time they did, and by doing so they saved the trust fund.

Court, and no power is given to the county court in bankruptcy which the High Court does not possess in administration actions to direct a stranger to pay over money.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Snagge, in the county court at Huddersfield, directing one Ellis to pay over the sum of £47 to the official receiver as trustee of the property of S. Crowther, a deceased insolvent debtor.

In August, 1886, S. Crowther died, being at that time indebted to Ellis in the sum of £39, and Frederick Crowther, the son, subsequently became executor de son tort. On March 31, 1887, Ellis issued a writ against Frederick Crowther, the executor, in respect of the debt, and on April 8 judgment was recovered. On April 21 garnishee orders were obtained by Ellis, attaching two debts due to F. Crowther or the estate of S. Crowther, which orders were duly served on April 22 and 27, and were made absolute on April 29. On April 28 a petition for the administration of the estate of S. Crowther, deceased, under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was presented to the county court. On May 4 two further garnishee orders were obtained by Ellis, which were served on May 5, and on that day an order for the administration of the deceased debtor's estate was made. The total amount received by Ellis under the garnishee orders was £47 which sum the county court judge, on the application, of the official receiver, directed him to repay. Ellis now appealed.

Herbert Reed, for the appellant.—The county court judge had no power to make this order against a stranger. All that section 125 does is to direct administration of the estate in the same manner as an administration in chancery. The county court in bankruptcy is a court created by statute, and it has no power other than that given by the statute. Under section 102 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the county court may decide any question which may arise "in any case of bankruptcy," but the section does not give the court jurisdiction where an order for administration is made under section 125. Section 125 provides throughout a distinction between bankruptcy and administration, and the decided cases go to prove this. Moreover, the service of the garnishee orders bound the debts.

He referred to Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Gould, 35 W. R. 569, 19 Q. B. D. 92; Ex parte Hewitt, 15 Q. B. D. 159, 33 W. R. Dig. 19; In re Witherness Bric's Works, 29 W. R. 178, 16 Ch. D. 337.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—The county court had jurisdiction to make the order in this case, because the matter was not like an action to recover a debt at all. It was a motion to declare the trustee's rights over property which Ellis claimed. The motion before the county court was really to declare whether Ellis was a secured creditor or not at the time of the accrual of the trustee's title, which was a question that could be determined in bankruptcy. Section 125 says the estate is to be administered according to the law of bankruptcy, and it is to be administered in the court which would have had jurisdiction over the debtor if he had been a bankrupt. This is not an action for money had and received, but a motion for a declaration that those debts formed part of the estate of the deceased. Section 102 must be taken to be incorporated. Further service of the garnishee orders nisi did not make Ellis a secured creditor.

CAVE, J.—The appeal must be allowed. Section 125 has given power to the court of bankruptcy to administer the estate of a deceased debtor who is insolvent, and unless some special provision can be found, the court, in administering, must follow the practice of the Chancery Division of the High Court. Now in the Chancery Division such an application would not be entertained—at any rate, without the consent of the person interested; and in order to establish the jurisdiction of the county court some express provisions of the Act must be shown giving the county court in bankruptcy a power which the High Court does not possess in administration actions. There is no such power. There might be a certain amount of convenience if such a power existed, as sometimes the objection to the jurisdiction is very frivolous, and it was frivolous in this case to the extent that if it had been allowed, as it should have been allowed, a plaint would have been issued in the same county court, and the case would have come before the same judge. The question before us, however, is whether there was jurisdiction to make the order or not, and I am of opinion that there was no jurisdiction.

STORY v. STORY. (a.)

Divorce—Guilty wife — Prior condoned adultery of husband—Discretionary bar—Exercise of discretion.

A jury found the wife guilty of adultery with the co-respondent, assessing the damages against him at £300. The husband had, six years before, committed adultery with a maid servant in the house where the wife resided, and she had condoned the offence.

Held, that, under these circumstances, the court ought, in the exercise of its discretion under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 31, to dismiss the husband's petition.

Trial before Hannen, P., and a common jury.

This was the husband's petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent, O'Connor. In her answer the wife alleged that the petitioner had been guilty of adultery in 1877 with a domestic servant in their service. The petitioner alleged condonation of this offence.

The jury found the respondent and co-respondent guilty of adultery, and assessed the damages against the co-respondent at £300. They also found that the petitioner had been guilty of the adultery alleged.

Searle, for the respondent, asked the court not to grant a decree.—It is admitted that the adultery of the petitioner is not an absolute bar; the court has a discretion under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 86, s. 31: Goode v Goode and Hamson, 9 W. R. 552, 2 Sw. & Tr. 253. But it is not necessary that the husband's conduct should have contributed to the wife's misconduct, or that she should even have known of it: Clarke v. Clarke, 13 W. R. 848; Hulse v. Hulse and Tavernor, 20 W. R. 447, L. R. 2 P. & D. 357. Here there is evidence in a letter written by the wife that although the offence was condoned it had not been forgotten by her.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Corrie Grant, for the petitioner.—The present case is within the discretion of the court, and is such a case as was intended to be met by the exercise of that discretion. McCord v. McCord, Ogle, and Coxon, 23 W. R. 684, L. R. 3 P. & D. 237, was referred to.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

HANNEN, P.—The decision of the court in each case like the present must depend on the particular circumstances. In 1875 I went carefully into the question and endeavoured to lay down the principles in accordance with which I have acted ever since. In the present case the petitioner's story is that during his wife's absence the maid servant came and thrust herself upon him. That is a highly improbable story. On the other hand the wife tells us a more probable story—viz., that, noticing the condition of the girl, she questioned her and found out that the petitioner had had intercourse with her—that is, in the very house where he resided with his wife. The court always treats this form of adultery as a serious offence. It is perfectly true that the wife, as frequently happens, forgave the husband. But it is impossible not to feel that the act of the husband must have had a very serious effect on those feelings of the wife which go far to constitute the safeguards in married life, and that she would be more likely to fall into error. In McCord v. McCord I enumerated the facts as constituting the reason which induced me, in the exercise of my discretion, to refuse a decree. So in the present case I come to the conclusion that the husband is not entitled to claim release from the bond of marriage, he having shown himself regardless of its obligations, and I conclude, as I did in McCord v. McCord, following the principle laid down by Lord Penzance in Morgan v. Morgan and Porter, 17 W. R. 688, L. R. 1 P. & D. 644, that there are no special circumstances in this case to lead me to exercise my discretion in favour of the petitioner. I therefore dismiss the petition. The respondent is entitled to the general costs. The other costs will be dealt with on taxation. The petitioner is not entitled to the damages; they go with the petition.

Practice—Assessment of damages—Damage to cargo—Damage—Interest.

If an action brought in the Admiralty Division to recover damages for breach of the shipowner's contract of carriage is retained in that division, the damages proceeded for will, even although the action is one which could not have been brought in the Court of Admiralty before the Judicature Acts, be assessed, and interest on the amount found due be given in the same manner and according to the same rules as if the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction over the suit under the Admiralty Court Act, 1861.

So, also, if an action brought in the Queen's Bench Division to recover damages for negligently mooring a vessel is, after trial in that division, transferred to the Admiralty Division, the damages will be assessed and interest given, in the same manner and according to the same rules as if the action was an action of damage within the inherent jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty.

"THE GERTRUDE."

This was an action of damage to cargo in personam instituted on behalf of Messrs. Stockebye & Hvalsoe, of Copenhagen, against Messrs. Gordon & Stamp, the owners of the British ship Gertrude, to recover for the loss of a cargo of mixed corn, which had been shipped on board The Gertrude, and had been lost through the stranding of that vessel on the 4th of June, 1886, on the coast of Newfoundland. The defendants, who were domiciled in England, admitted their liability for the damage proceeded for, subject to a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount thereof; but by agreement between the plaintiffs and defendants it was arranged that the plaintiffs should accept, in satisfaction of their cause of action, eighty-five per cent. of whatever amount should be found due by the registrar.

The following claim was then brought into the registry on behalf of the plaintiffs:—

"Claim on behalf of the plaintiffs in respect of the loss of a cargo of 111,838 22-36ths bushels of mixed corn shipped on board The Gertrude at New Orleans, and totally lost in consequence of the stranding of The Gertrude on the south coast of Newfoundland on the 4th day of June, 1886. At the time The Gertrude was on her voyage from New Orleans to Copenhagen viâ Sidney, Cape Breton.

	£	s.	d.
"Invoice value of 111,838 22-36ths bushels of mixed corn . . .	9,635	16	3
Five per cent. for merchants' profit	482	13	0
Total	10,118	9	3

with interest and costs."

In support of the claim the plaintiffs filed affidavits annexing the invoices and bills of ladings of the lost cargo, and stating (inter alia) that the invoices for the cargo in respect of the loss of which the plaintiffs claimed had been settled and paid for by means of five bills of exchange dated the 4th of June, 1886.

On the 1st of July, 1887, the registrar reported that there was due to the plaintiffs, in respect of their said claim, the sum of £9,800, together with interest thereon, as shown in the following schedule:—Value of cargo of mixed corn shipped on board The Gertrude, £9,635 16s. 3d.; merchants' profit, £164 3s. 9d. Total, £9,800, with interest at four per cent. per annum from the 4th of June, 1886, until paid. The defendants objected to the report so far as it found that interest was due to the plaintiffs, and by the consent of all parties it was ordered that the objections to the report should be heard on motion.

July 26.—Barnes, on behalf of the defendants, moved the President in court that the registrar's report might be varied by directing that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover interest against the defendants on the sum of £9,800, as stated in the report and the schedule thereto. He contended that, inasmuch as the claim of the plaintiffs was not one within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty as it existed before the Judicature Acts, the plaintiffs had no right to recover interest except between judgment and payment, and that on that point Rodocanachi v. Milburn, 35 W. R. 241, 18 Q. B. D. 67—where it was held that the measure of damage was the market value of the goods when and where they were to be delivered, deducting the expenses of carriage—was a binding authority.

Sir W. Phillimore, on behalf of the plaintiffs contrà.—The plaintiffs have brought their action in this division, and they must, therefore, be considered to have submitted themselves to the equitable method of assessing damages in use here. It is the usual rule in this division in cases of collision and damage to cargo to give to the cargo owner the invoice value of his cargo together with a sum which would reimburse him for his expenses in loading the cargo, and interest on these amounts from a certain date—i.e., in general from a time when he may be considered to have lost the use of his capital. This rule has been followed in this case, and the time from which interest has been given is the date on which the bills for the cargo fell due. The case of Rodocanachi v. Milburn is no authority for holding that the usual way of calculating the damages is no longer to be adopted in actions in this division.

Cur. adv. vult.

"THE BARON ABERDARE."

This was an action instituted on behalf of the owners of the vessel Baron Aberdare against the London and St. Katharine Docks Co. to recover for the damages occasioned by the defendant company having negligently moored The Baron Aberdare in the St. Katharine Docks, in consequence of which she broke adrift and came into collision with certain other vessels in the docks, and sustained such injuries that she sank.

The action was instituted in the Queen's Bench Division, and judgment on the question of liability was given in that division, it being then agreed that the amount of damages should be referred to an arbitrator.

Subsequently the action was by consent transferred to this division.

On the action being transferred, it was intended that all questions as to the amount of damages should be referred to the registrar and merchants, but subsequently the parties agreed that the plaintiff should be deemed entitled to recover damages to the amount of £7,500.

A question was then raised before the registrar whether the plaintiffs were not entitled, in addition to this amount, to interest. On this question the registrar reported that interest at four per cent. was due to the plaintiffs from a date to be agreed on between the parties as the date when the amounts due for raising and repairing The Baron Aberdare and for the damages claimed from the plaintiffs by the owners of the vessels damaged by The Baron Aberdare had been paid, and that such interest should run until payment of the £7,500 by the defendants. The following reasons for his report were given by the registrar:—

In this case an action was brought in the Queen's Bench Division on the 17th of March, 1884, against the London and St. Katharine Docks Co. by the owners of the barque or vessel Baron Aberdare for damages by reason of the negligence of the defendants in and about the care and custody of the plaintiffs' ship while in the defendants' dock in December, 1883. The case was tried before a special jury, and a verdict was given for the plaintiffs on the 19th of May, 1886. It had been previously agreed that the amount of damages should be referred to an arbitrator. After this verdict and judgment a motion was made to a divisional court to enter judgment for the defendants, or for a new trial, which was rejected, with costs. An appeal from this decision of the Divisional Court was then made to the Court of Appeal, which, on the 11th of May, in the present year, was likewise dismissed, with costs. Immediately afterwards, on the 28th of May, the action was transferred to the Admiralty Division by consent of parties for the purpose of the assessment of the damages in the usual way. Since that transfer, however, the parties have come to an agreement that £7,500 shall be deemed to be the amount of damages the plaintiffs are entitled to recover without prejudice to the question as to what interest is recoverable in addition; and that point is the only one which I have been called upon to consider. It is admitted that the whole amount of the £7,500 was paid to the plaintiffs in, or previous to, the month of June, 1884. The interest on that amount since that period necessarily represents a large sum, and, if not recoverable from the defendants, also represents a heavy loss which they have had no means of obviating. The ordinary principles, therefore, of equity and justice would seem to require that compensation for this loss should be made. It is said that some technical rules of common law are against the allowance of interest before judgment, but I am not satisfied that those rules apply to a case of this description, or that, if they do, I am bound to act upon them when called upon as registrar of the Admiralty Division to assess the amount of the plaintiffs' damages. I should rather assume that I am to apply the principles laid down for my guidance in assessing the damages occasioned by other acts of negligence, such as the negligent navigation of a ship by which another ship is injured. That the practice of the Admiralty Court is to allow interest on the loss so sustained from the date of such loss cannot be questioned, and I feel bound to follow the same rule in this instance. The judgment in The Northumbria, 18 W. R. 188, L. R. 3 A. & E. 6, followed by a divisional court of the Queen's Bench in the case of Smith v. Kirby, 24 W. R. 207, 1 Q. B. D. 131, which was an action by the owners of cargo against the carrying ship, seems to me to justify this conclusion. The interest, therefore, will run from a date or dates in 1884 to be agreed on between the parties.

Aug. 9.—Hollams, on behalf of the plaintiffs, now moved to confirm the registrar's report.—The practice of the registrar of this division in all actions of collision before him—and this is virtually an action of collision—to proceed on equitable principles and, as an usual rule, to give interest before judgment, is clearly according to law. The Northumbria is in accordance with the practice of the Court of Chancery: Straker v. Hartland, 34 L. J. Ch. 122, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 52; and with what the courts of common law considered to be the equitable rule: Smith v. Kirby; British Columbia Saw Mill Co. v. Nettleship, 16 W. R. 1046, L. R. 3 C. P. 499.

Barnes, on behalf of the defendants, contrà.—This case differs from the case of The Gertrude inasmuch as the case was only transferred here after judgment in consequence of an agreement between the parties. The Admiralty registrar, in fact, only acted as an arbitrator, and ought, in the circumstances, to have applied the rules as to the measure of damage in force in the Queen's Bench Division, and have given no interest before judgment. [HANNEN, P.—Having looked into the matter, I think the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 29, enabling a jury to give interest in certain cases, is an enactment declaratory of the common law.] There is no case of unliquidated damages not within that statute when interest before damage has been given in the courts of common law. [He referred to Calton v. Bragg, 15 East, 223; Higgins v. Sargent, 2 B. & C. 348.]

HANNEN, P.—I was prepared to give judgment this morning in The Gertrude, which case I had taken time to consider, but I deferred doing so until I had heard the arguments in The Baron Aberdare.

There can be no doubt that it has been a long-established practice of the Admiralty Court to allow interest on the amount awarded to plaintiffs from the time when the claims arose. This practice was very fully considered by my learned predecessor in The Northumbria in regard to matters solely within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. It is unnecessary for me to travel over that ground again, since it is clearly established that in admiralty actions there should, so far as possible, be a complete restitutio in integrum, and for this purpose the award of interest on the damages is necessary. It is a sound and equitable rule, and I can only regret that it is not also a common law rule.

The question is raised in The Gertrude whether the registrar, under the circumstances in which that case came before the court, was bound to depart from the usual admiralty rule and to apply the common law rule. I am of opinion that he was not so bound. Reference was made in the course of the argument to 3 & 4 Will 4, c. 42. That statute was partly permissive, it does not affect to alter the law in any case, but it gives power to award interest in some cases. It applies only to cases tried before a jury, and I am left entirely free to say what rule should be applied in every case which is tried in the Admiralty Division. I therefore confirm the registrar's report in The Gertrude.

The Baron Aberdare differs a little as to the facts, and it has been argued that the registrar was simply an arbitrator. I do not think he was, but, assuming him to be one, it appears to me to make no difference. It was right and proper for him to award interest in whichever character he decided the case. The Northumbria and Smith v. Kirby each have a bearing on this case, because in the latter case an arbitrator found, in accordance with the decision in The Northumbria, that he could award interest. This fact was, in my opinion, brought to the knowledge of the court, and it held that the admiralty rule was rightly applied, and that interest should be given. I, therefore, in The Baron Aberdare, confirm the report. The unsuccessful party must in each case pay the costs of the motions.

Bouch v. Sproule. (a.)

Tenant for life and remainderman—Company—Bonus—Dividend—Capital or interest.

A testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to T. B. upon trust to permit his wife to receive the interest, dividends, and annual income during her life, and subject thereto to T. B. absolutely. Part of the residuary estate consisted of shares in a company. The articles of association of the company provided that the directors might set aside out of the profits such sum as they thought proper as a reserved fund. After the death of the testator the directors distributed this reserved fund and certain other undivided profits to the shareholders as a bonus dividend, allotted at the same time new partly paid-up shares, and applied the bonus to the part payment of the new shares.

Held, that, in the circumstances, the company did not pay or intend to pay any sum as dividend, but intended to and did appropriate the undivided profits dealt with as an increase of the capital stock in the concern; and that the bonus dividend was therefore part of the capital of the testator's estate, and that the life tenant was not entitled thereto as being interest, dividend, or annual income.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (33 W. R. 621, 29 Ch. D. 635) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Baggallay, Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ.) reversing a decision of Kay, J.

The facts are very fully set out in the judgments of Lord Herschell and Lord Watson.

June 13, 1887.—Lord Herschell.—This appeal arises upon a case stated for the opinion of the court to determine whether a bonus of £2 10*s.* per share, sanctioned in the circumstances I shall afterwards mention, on 600 shares in the Consett Iron Co. (Limited), was income of the estate of William Bouch, or was capital of that estate.

William Bouch, who died on the 19th of January, 1876, by his will bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate to Sir Thomas Bouch upon trust to convert the same into money, or, with the consent of Jane Bouch (the testator's wife) to allow the same to remain unconverted; and, upon further trust, to permit his said wife to receive the interest, dividends, and annual income of the said personal estate during her life; and, subject thereto, he bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to Sir Thomas Bouch absolutely.

Part of the residuary personal estate of William Bouch consisted of 600 shares of £10 each in the Consett Iron Co., upon which £7 10*s.* per share had been paid. These shares were, with the consent of Jane Bouch, allowed to remain unconverted, and she received the dividends thereon during her life. Sir Thomas Bouch died on the 30th of October, 1880, having by his will appointed the appellants his executors and trustees. Jane Bouch, the tenant for life, died on the 22nd of February, 1883, having by her will appointed the respondent her executor.

The Consett Iron Co. was incorporated in the year 1864, with a capital of £400,000, divided into £10 shares. The articles of association provided that whenever the net profits of the company during any financial year ending the 30th of June would admit, the directors should recommend to the meeting to declare a dividend on the company's capital, and thereupon it should be competent at such meeting to make and declare a dividend of such amount, and payable at such time, as the meeting should determine. The 109th article was as follows:—"The directors may, before recommending any dividend, set aside, out of the profits of the company, such sum as they think proper as a reserved fund for meeting contingencies or for equalizing dividends, or for repairing or maintaining the works connected with the business of the company, or any part thereof; and the directors may invest the sum so set apart as a reserved fund upon such securities or in such manner as they may think proper." The capital of the company was afterwards increased to £552,000 by additions of 6,000 and 9,200 new shares of £10 each, with £7 10s. per share paid thereon. In the accounts of the company for the year beginning the 30th of June, 1874, there stood to the credit of a reserve fund £100,000, made up from undivided profits of previous years, and there stood to the credit of another fund, styled "undivided profit," a further sum of £6,203 12s. In August, 1880, the £100,000 still stood to the credit of the "reserve fund," and in addition to the profits of the previous year, £36,070 1s. 8d. was standing to the credit of the "undivided profit" fund.

The report of the directors of the 12th of August, 1880, after recommending that the profits of the previous year should be appropriated to the payment of a certain dividend, and that £7,246 4s. 5d. should be carried forward as undivided profit, proceeded as follows:—"Your directors feel that the time is now come when they may safely recommend some permanent appropriation of the £100,000 standing to credit of reserve fund, and of a considerable portion of the undivided profit fund. They therefore propose that the reserve fund, £100,000, and £38,000 out of the £43,316 6s. 1d. (to which the undivided profit would be brought up by the mode of appropriating the year's profit previously recommended), making together £138,000, shall be distributed as a bonus dividend of £2 10s. per share, equalling £7 10s. in respect of every three existing shares; but, as the company's operations render it desirable to raise an equal amount as capital account, your directors propose that there be created 18,400 new shares of £10 each, with £7 10s. per share payable concurrently with the payment of the bonus dividend. This would allow of one new share being allotted in respect of every three existing shares, and the bonus dividends would pay the £7 10s. on each such new share. Your directors propose that the bonus dividend and the call of £7 10s. per new share be made payable on the 30th of September, the members registered in the company's books on the 25th of September being treated as those entitled to such dividend and to the allotment of new shares. They also propose that the new shares shall take dividend from the 1st of July, 1880, as if the £7 10s. per share had been paid up on that date. They will, therefore, stand on an equal footing with the present shares in regard to all dividends beyond that about to be declared. Every member of the company on the 25th of September would consequently receive a new £10 share in respect of every three shares he then holds, such new share having, like the existing shares, £7 10s. paid thereon."

On the 4th of September, 1880, the directors' report and accounts were received and adopted, and a special resolution was passed adding to the articles of association a new article, empowering the directors, with the sanction of the company in general meeting, to declare a bonus to be paid to the members in proportion to their shares out of the reserve fund, or out of any other accumulated profits of the company. Special resolutions were also passed sanctioning the creation of capital and its allotment in the manner recommended by the directors.

At a meeting of the company on the 25th of September, 1880, these resolutions were confirmed, and a resolution was passed sanctioning the payment of a bonus of £2 10s. per share out of the £100,000 standing to the credit of the reserve fund, and £38,000, part of the undivided profit then in hand. On the same day the registrar of the company sent to the shareholders, including Sir Thomas Bouch (in whose name the 600 shares belonging to William Bouch's estate were registered), a letter enclosing a warrant and forms relating to the new shares.

The letter was in the following terms:—"I am instructed to inform you that, in accordance with the special resolutions confirmed at the meeting of the company held this day, the directors have, in respect of the 600 shares now registered in your name, allotted to you 200 new shares of £10 each, subject to the sum of £7 10s. per share being paid up thereon on or before the 30th instant, and I enclose you a bonus dividend warrant payable on that date for £1,500, which you will be good enough to sign and return to me by Thursday next, when the amount will be applied in payment of £7 10s. per share on your above named new shares. Regarding the registration of these new shares, I have to explain that if you desire to have all that you are entitled to registered in your own name, you must fill up and sign the enclosed form No. 1. If you desire to have all or part registered in some other name, form No. 2 must be filled up and signed both by yourself and by the person in whose name the shares, or any of them, are to be registered." The enclosed form No. 1 was as follows:—"Gentlemen,—I hereby accept the 200 new shares which have been allotted to me, subject to the conditions on which they are issued, and request that the whole be registered in my own name." This was signed and returned by Sir Thomas Bouch. He also signed and returned the enclosed warrant, which was in the following form:—"Consett Iron Co. (Limited). Bonus dividend warrant of £2 10s. per share payable on the 30th of September, 1880. To the members registered in the company's books on the 25th of September, 1880. No. 102. Name of member—Thomas Bouch, Esq. Number of shares—600. Amount of bonus dividend—One thousand five hundred pounds. (Signed) Wm. Cockburn, registrar. I hereby authorize and request you to apply the above amount in payment of the call of £7 10s. per share on the 200 new shares that have been allotted to me in accordance with the special resolutions passed at the ordinary general meeting of the company held on the 4th of September, and confirmed at the extraordinary general meeting held on the 25th of September, 1880. Signature of member. N.B.—This warrant must be signed and sent to the registrar, Mr. Wm. Cockburn, 33, Westgate-road, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on or before the 30th of September, 1880."

The 200 new shares were accordingly registered in the name of Sir Thomas Bouch, and £7 10s. was credited as paid on each share. The dividends on these new shares, as well as on the original shares, were paid to Jane Bouch, the tenant for life, down to the last dividend day prior to her death.

It is to be observed that before the allotment of the new shares in 1880 the shares of the company were at a premium of about £21 per share, but immediately after such allotment they fell to £14 per share premium.

The case came, in the first instance, before Kay, J. He considered that it might be open to doubt whether the bonus at the time it was declared belonged to the tenant for life, or was to be regarded as an accretion to capital, though, on the authority of Paris v. Paris, he inclined to the latter opinion. But he came to the conclusion that the bonus had been capitalized with the consent of the tenant for life, and that she had agreed that the shares should be treated as capital of the testator's estate so as to avoid raising this question.

The Court of Appeal reversed this judgment. They held that there was no evidence to show that the tenant for life had agreed to relinquish any of her rights, and that the bonus belonged to her, and having been invested by the trustees in shares of the Consett Co., those shares became her property.

I quite concur with the Court of Appeal in thinking that there is no evidence that the tenant for life relinquished her right to the bonus, if she was ever entitled to it. And in my judgment the sole question for determination is whether this bonus is to be regarded as income passing to the tenant for life under the trusts of the will, or an accretion to capital, to the income of which alone she was entitled, and which enured after her death for the benefit of the remainderman.

I think this is a question of very considerable difficulty. It was argued at your lordships' bar on behalf of the appellants that it was really settled in their favour by authority. It was said to be well established that where a dividend or bonus appeared to be declared out of accumulated profits, which, de facto, had formed part of the capital of the company, it must be treated as an addition to capital, and that the tenant for life was not entitled to it. If I thought that any such rule had been established and were applicable to the circumstances of the present case, I should certainly advise your lordships to decide in accordance with it, whatever I might think of its expediency. The division of the enjoyment of property between a tenant for life and a remainderman is itself artificial, and if any artificial rule has been established regulating such enjoyment, every settlor or testator may well be presumed to have intended that the objects of his bounty should share its benefits according to this rule. I may observe, however, at the outset, that there would often be considerable difficulty in the application of the suggested rule, and that it does not appear to rest on any satisfactory basis of principle.

I will proceed now to consider the authorities relied on. The earliest of these was Brander v. Brander, decided in 1799. The Bank of England having paid out of their funds for the public service £1,000,000, received £1,125,000 Three per Cent. Annuities. These they resolved to distribute pro ratâ among the then proprietors of Bank Stock. The question arose whether the proportion allotted to the testator's representatives was to be regarded, as between the tenant for life and remainderman, as income or capital. Lord Rosslyn took the latter view. He said: "If I am to go upon principle, I must hunt back to see to what part of that saving each is entitled. I have often considered this question, and it seemed to me, in all the different ways I could turn the consideration of it, that there was no way to be taken but to consider it as an accretion to capital." Fry, L.J., says that the principle of this decision was, that what the company says is income shall be income, and what it says is capital shall be capital. "The Lord Chancellor," he says, "seems to have proceeded on the ground that the original £1,000,000 was part of the capital of the bank"; and then, after quoting from his judgment the words I have just read, he adds: "If that were so, it follows that the bank was distributing amongst its proprietors that which had been returned by the Government in satisfaction for the outlay of a part of its capital." I cannot concur in this view of Brander v. Brander. It does not appear to me to have proceeded on any such principle. The company had in no way said that either the £1,000,000, which had been advanced for the public service, or the annuities which were received in return for it, should be capital. Moreover, it is to be observed (and the importance of this will be seen when we come to consider the scope of this authority and of those which have followed it) that the bank could not have declared that either of those sums should be added to or form part of its capital properly so called, for the bank had no power (as is pointedly stated in the case) to increase its capital, except by obtaining an Act of Parliament.

I think the decision in Brander v. Brander proceeded on the ground which Fry, L.J., accurately states as the foundation of the judgment in Irving v. Houstoun, viz., that the accumulated profits had become part of the floating capital of the concern. But they had become so, not by reason of any declaration of the company that they should be so, but only in the sense that, having accumulated, they were, de facto, used as part of its capital. In this sense, however, all accumulated profits which are in use for the purposes of the business of any company may equally be said to form part of its floating capital. And I think that the learned counsel for the appellants were well founded in saying that the greater part, if not the whole, of the accumulated profits of the Consett Iron Co., the division of which has given rise to this controversy, were in this sense a portion of the capital of the company.

I pass now to the case of Irving v. Houstoun, the most important of the series, for, being a decision of this House, your lordships are bound by it. In that case the Bank of Scotland had passed a resolution that an extraordinary dividend or bonus should be given to proprietors holding stock on the 1st of June. Lord Eldon, in delivering his opinion in this House, after stating that Brander v. Brander had been frequently acted upon, and pointing out the inconvenience of having a different law as to English and Scotch Bank Stock, proceeded as follows: "It is impossible to deny that great difficulties attend this matter; the proper question is, on which side the fewer difficulties lie. The Bank of England, to which the Bank of Scotland is similar in this respect, has a capital limited by Parliament to a certain amount. This limitation, if strictly adhered to, would have this inconvenience attached to it, that circumstances might occur to oblige them to reduce their ordinary dividends. Therefore it is that these companies have what is termed their floating capital, which they lay out in the shape of Exchequer and Navy Bills, in discounts, and in every species of property that can be turned into cash at pleasure. Every person who buys Bank Stock is aware of this; and if he gives a life interest of his estate to anyone it can scarcely be his meaning that the life-renter should run away with the bonus that may have been accumulating on the capital for half a century." Lord Rosslyn, the only other learned lord who expressed an opinion, said: "When I first came to consider the case of Brander v. Brander, I thought it would be necessary to learn what part of the bonus had accumulated before the testator's death, and what since, to do justice between the claimants. The bank were very much alarmed when I hinted at any intention of that kind. On considering the matter maturely in all its consequences, the judgment was pronounced in that case."

The decision in Irving v. Houstoun, was followed in 1804 in Paris v. Paris, and again in Clayton v. Gresham, though in the former case the Lord Chancellor said that he had great difficulty in stating the principle that led to the earlier decisions. It was further followed in 1807, in Witts v. Steere, and again in 1847, in the case of Ex parte Hodgens, In re Hodgens, where the directors of the Bank of Ireland having decided, "on account of the favourable result of the last four years" to recommend a bonus of 5 per cent. in addition to the ordinary dividend of 5 per cent., Brady, L.C., held that this bonus must be considered as capital. But a disposition was early shown to limit the operation of the rule laid down in Brander v. Brander, and adopted by this House; and it is manifest that from the first it was felt not to rest on any stable principle. Thus, in Barclay v. Wainewright, the directors of the Bank of England declared a dividend of 5 per cent. interest and profits for the half-year. It was contended that as this exceeded their ordinary dividend of 3½ per cent., a portion of it must be considered as arising from accumulated profits, and therefore treated as capital. Lord Eldon, in repelling this contention, said: "If it be contended that any part of the 5 per cent. is given out of, or to be paid from capital, a case must be brought before the court, either making that out by evidence, or under circumstances forming a fair ground for inquiry. But, as the case now stands, I have no means of considering it as more or less than a declaration in the due execution of the right and duty of the bank that the dividend which the proprietors ought to receive is a half-yearly dividend of 5 per cent." And again, in Preston v. Melville, the directors of the Bank of England having declared a dividend of £3 10s. per cent. out of interest and profits for the half-year, and in addition thereto a bonus out of interest and profits of 1 per cent., the Vice-Chancellor of England held the tenant for life entitled to both. It is to be noted that here, as in the case just cited, there was nothing to show that the bonus was to be paid out of accumulated profits. Fry, L.J., commenting in the court below on the several cases to which I have referred, says: "These cases, however binding they may be under similar circumstances with regard to the same stocks, certainly do not appear to us to support to any extent the proposition now under investigation" (i.e., that the authorities have established a rule that where a sum is paid, whether called bonus or dividend, out of the accumulations of profits in previous years, it must be taken as a payment out of or on account of capital). "The last case—viz., that of Preston v. Melville—seems to lean strongly in the other direction." Unwilling as I confess myself to be to apply the decision in Irving v. Houstoun in any case where I am not bound to do so, I feel some difficulty in limiting it to the extent suggested by the Lord Justice, when I consider the language used by Lord Eldon and Lord Rosslyn. Their language seems equally applicable to any company unable to increase its capital, which uses, and is known to use (as many companies are), accumulated profits for capital purposes. I may add that, for the reason I have noted above, Preston v. Melville appears to me to be in complete harmony with the earlier authorities.

It seems clear that the decision in Irving v. Houstoun was not considered as applicable only to bank dividends. It was followed, as Fry, L.J., has pointed out, in the case of other companies. Thus, in Ward v. Combe, the question arose in 1836 in respect of certain settled shares in the London Assurance Co. At a court in 1835 the ordinary dividend of £1 a share was voted, and by another resolution on the same day it was provided that a sum at the rate of £12 a share should be taken out of the profits of the company and divided amongst the shareholders. The Vice-Chancellor held that the £12 a share was capital; and he observed that there was nothing to show at what time the profits out of which the sum was taken arose, and that they might have been profits that had lain dormant for a series of years. It may be doubted whether this decision is altogether consistent with that in Preston v. Melville, already alluded to. But it is a clear recognition of the doctrine that a division of accumulated profits amongst the shareholders is to be regarded as given by way of increase of capital. It is true, indeed, as Fry, L.J., says, that in Price v. Anderson the same Vice-Chancellor held, in the case of the Royal Exchange Assurance Co., whose practice was to declare dividends on their stock half-yearly, and bonuses at intervals of two or more years, that a dividend of £12 10s. per cent. declared in 1846, in addition to the ordinary dividend, belonged entirely to the tenant for life. But it will be observed, on examining the report, that where the same company in 1840 had resolved that, in addition to the ordinary dividend of £2 10s. per cent., a distribution of 5 per cent. out of accumulated profits be made to the proprietors, the Vice-Chancellor held that, as this was not made as dividend, it must be considered capital, and ordered it to be invested. The distinction apparently was that, in this case, the dividend in terms was paid out of accumulated profits, and was not expressed to be a dividend. I think, therefore, that Irving v. Houston must still be regarded as good law, unaffected by any counter-current of authority. But it is, in my opinion, an authority governing only a case similar in its facts; that is to say, a case where the company has no power to increase its capital, but has accumulated profits and used them, in fact, for capital purposes, and afterwards distributes these profits amongst the proprietors. I think it will be seen that there is a substantial reason for the limitation I have suggested.

I quite agree with the court below that, apart from the authorities to which I have alluded, the general principle for the determination of such a question as that before us, and, in my opinion, the only sound principle, is that which is well expressed in the judgment of Fry, L.J.: "When a testator or settlor directs or permits the subject of his disposition to remain as shares or stock in a company which has the power either of distributing profits as dividends or of converting them into capital, and the company validly exercises this power, such exercise of power is binding on all persons interested under the testator or settlor in the shares, and consequently what is paid by the company as dividend goes to the tenant for life, and what is paid by the company to the shareholders as capital, or appropriated as an increase of the capital stock in the concern, enures to the benefit of all who are interested in the capital." And it appears to me that where a company has power to increase its capital and to appropriate its profits to such increase, it cannot be considered as having intended to convert, or having converted, any part of its profits into capital when it has made no such increase, even if a company having no power to increase its capital may be regarded as having thus converted profits into capital by the accumulation and use of them as such.

I come now to the question whether the company did in the present case distribute the accumulated profits as dividend or convert them into capital. And here I find myself constrained to differ from the conclusion at which the Court of Appeal arrived. I think we must look both at the substance and form of the transaction. It is to be observed, in the first place, that the amount of that portion of the new capital created which was to be paid up was exactly equal to the amount of profits to be distributed. And it was obviously contemplated, and was, I think, certain, that no money would, in fact, pass from the company to the shareholders, but that the entire sum would remain in their hands as paid-up capital. It is said in the judgment below that a shareholder who refused to take new shares and to fill up the form of authority at the foot of the dividend warrant would have been, nevertheless, entitled to receive his dividend from the company. I agree that this is so. But, to my mind, it was certain, and known to be so by the company, that no shareholder would make such a claim. Take the facts of the present case as an illustration. The holder of 600 shares was, we will assume, entitled to claim from the company £1,500 and to decline to take any new shares. But, if he had been indisposed to add any new shares to those he already held, he would not have dreamed of adopting such a course. By doing so he would have received in cash £1,500 only. If his desire was to have cash, instead of new shares, he would have sold his interest in the new shares, and signed the second form enclosed in the registrar's letter and the authority at the foot of the dividend warrant; for he would thus have obtained from a purchaser, not £1,500, but probably upwards of £4,000. It is said by Fry, L.J., that the two transactions, of the payment of the dividend and the payment of the call, could not be carried into effect as one operation, inasmuch as in the case of a person holding less than three shares, or holding a number not a multiple of three, the dividend on the odd share or shares must, in the absence of arrangement with some other member, have been paid in cash. But it must be remembered that the directors undertook to afford facilities for the sale or exchange of fractional parts of new shares, and such arrangements were so obviously to the advantage of those entitled to fractional parts of a share that it was certain they would be effected. I cannot, therefore, avoid the conclusion that the substance of the whole transaction was, and was intended to be, to convert the undivided profits into paid-up capital upon newly created shares. And the form in which the operations were effected points in the same direction. The dividend warrant is not in the ordinary form. It is assumed that it will be signed by the member only at the foot of the authority to apply the amount in payment of the calls on the new shares. And it is intimated on the face of it that it must be "signed and sent" to the registrar before the 30th of September, 1880. Moreover, the letter of the registrar enclosing it contains these terms: "which you will be good enough to sign and return to me by Thursday next, when the amount will be applied in payment of £7 10s. per share on your above mentioned new shares." It is to be observed also that, although the bonus was not sanctioned until August, and the £7 10s. per share was expressed to be made payable on the 30th of September, the new capital was to rank for dividend pari passu with the old capital from the 30th of June preceding, which is only explicable on the ground that these moneys in the hands of the company, and which were, in fact, in use as capital, were to be so treated as from that date.

Upon the whole, then, I am of opinion that the company did not pay, or intend to pay, any sum as dividend, but intended to and did appropriate the undivided profits dealt with as an increase of the capital stock in the concern.

I, therefore, move your lordships that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and the judgment of Kay, J., restored, and that the respondents do pay the costs in the Court of Appeal and the costs of this appeal.

Lord Watson.—I am of opinion, with the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, that the present case does not come within the principle to which this House, following the decision of the Lord Chancellor in Brander v. Brander, gave effect in the Scotch case of Irving v. Houstoun.

In the first of these cases the Bank of England, and in the second the Bank of Scotland, whose constitution gave them no power to increase their capital, had, nevertheless, for a long period of years, retained and employed a large amount of accumulated profits as capital in the course of their business; and they ultimately paid a considerable portion of these accumulations to their shareholders in the shape of bonus. In Irving v. Houstoun the Lord Chancellor (Lord Eldon) appears to me to have come to the conclusion that the bonus belonged to the fiar, and not to the life-rentrix of the testator's shares in the Bank of Scotland, upon two grounds. He expresses the opinion, in the first place, that these accumulated profits, which he describes as the floating capital of the bank, were regarded by the testator and the other owners of bank shares as being in the nature of capital; and, in these circumstances, his lordship says: "If he (i. e., the testator) gives the life interest of his estate to anyone, it can scarcely be his meaning that the life-renter should run away with a bonus that may have been accumulating on the floating capital for half a century." In the second place, his lordship intimates his opinion that on no ground of equity could it be contended that the life-rentrix was entitled to accumulations made during the lifetime of the testator; and that an inquiry into the precise amounts of profit which had accrued before and after the commencement of the life-rent right would lead to inconveniences which would be intolerable. The Earl of Rosslyn, who had, as Chancellor, decided Brander v. Brander, concurred in the judgment. His opinion, so far as reported, proceeds upon the second ground stated by Lord Eldon. He said:—"When I first came to consider the case of Brander v. Brander, I thought it would be necessary to learn what part of the bonus had accumulated before the testator's death and what part since that period to do justice between the claimants. The bank were very much alarmed when I hinted any intention of this kind. Upon considering the matter maturely in all its consequences, the judgment was pronounced in that case, holding the bonus to be an accretion to the capital."

The Consett Iron Co. (Limited) stands in a different position from these two banks. By the 109th of its articles of association the directors are empowered, before recommending any dividend, to set aside out of the profits of the concern such sum as they may think proper, "as a reserved fund for meeting contingencies or for equalizing dividends, or for repairing or maintaining the works connected with the business of the company, or any part thereof." The company has likewise under its articles the power, which it exercised in 1872, of increasing its capital by the creation and allotment of new shares to its members according to their respective interests, and of crediting them with a sum as paid on each share from its reserved or undivided profits. It is also worthy of observation, although in the view which I take of this case the circumstance is not material, that the books of the company were kept, and the annual balance-sheets issued to the shareholders prepared in such a form as to disclose the precise amount of profit and loss upon each year's trading; and that the parties have consequently been enabled to state in their joint case the exact proportion of the reserved profits in question which accrued during the currency of the life tenant's right. So that the obstacles to an inquiry which were regarded as insuperable in Brander v. Brander and Irving v. Houstoun do not exist in the present case.

I do not doubt that the rule applied by this House in Irving v. Houstoun must receive effect in all similar cases. But in a case like the present, where the company has power to determine whether profits reserved and temporarily devoted to capital purposes shall be distributed as dividend or permanently added to its capital, the interest of the life tenant depends, in my opinion, upon the decision of the company. I entirely concur in the observations made upon this point by Lord Hatherley (then Vice-Chancellor) in In re Barton's Trusts: "The dividend to which a tenant for life is entitled is the dividend which the company chooses to declare. And when the company meet and say that they will not declare a dividend, but will carry over some portion of the half-year's earnings to the capital account and turn it into capital, it is competent for them, I apprehend, to do so; and when this is done everybody is bound by it, and the tenant for life of those shares cannot complain." In my opinion that rule must obtain, whether the profits with which the company is dealing belong to the current year, or have been previously reserved for the purposes of its business.

Applying these principles to the present case, I am unable to concur in the view which the Court of Appeal has taken of the real character of the arrangements under which the Consett Iron Co., on the 25th of September, 1880, issued a bonus dividend warrant and a relative allotment of new shares to each and all of the shareholders of the company.

The balance-sheet of the company for the year ending the 30th of June, 1880, states as an asset a sum of £100,000, which had in the year 1874 been carried from the undivided profits of previous years to a "reserve fund," and had subsequently been entered, under that heading, in the books and balance-sheets of the company. I do not think (and so far I agree with the learned judges of the Court of Appeal) that the mere fact of moneys being taken from undivided profits and carried to a reserve fund is equivalent to capitalization of them. But the whole or part of the reserve fund may be legitimately expended on the repair and maintenance of works and plant, in such a way as to make it practically unavailable for the purpose of paying dividend, so long as there is no increase of the capital of the company, and the works continue in operation. The balance-sheet of the 30th of June, 1880, shows that, in point of fact, not only the whole reserve fund of £100,000, but a large additional sum of undivided profits had, at that date, been spent upon, and were represented by, not cash or convertible securities, but the works and plant of the company.

In these circumstances, it was undoubtedly within the power of the company, by raising new capital to the required amount, to set free the sums thus spent out of the reserve fund and undivided profits for distribution among the shareholders. It was equally within the power of the company to capitalize these sums by issuing new shares against them to its members in proportion to their several interests. I am of opinion that the latter alternative was, in substance, that which was followed by the company.

The directors issued their annual report on the 12th of August, 1880, to which a copy of the balance-sheet was annexed. In their report they recommended "to the shareholders some permanent appropriation of the £100,000 standing to credit of reserve fund, and of a considerable portion of the undivided profit fund." These words do not suggest either the realization of the works and plant in which the funds had been invested, or the creation of new shares for the purpose of raising moneys for distribution among the shareholders. What they do suggest is, the permanent appropriation of the moneys to the capital purposes to which they had already been temporarily appropriated. In order to attain that object, the directors proposed that the reserve fund, and £38,000 of undivided profits, together amounting to £138,000, "shall be distributed as a bonus dividend of £2 10s. per share, equalling £7 10s. in respect of every three existing shares, but as the company's operations render it desirable to raise an equal amount on capital account, your directors propose that there be created 18,400 new shares of £10, with £7 10s. per share payable concurrently with the payment of the bonus dividend. This would allow of one new share being allotted in respect of every three existing shares, and the bonus dividend would pay the £7 10s. on each such new share." The directors further proposed that the bonus dividend, and the call of £7 10s. per new share should be made payable on the same day; that the shareholders whose names appeared in the register on the 25th of September, 1880, should be entitled to the dividend and to the allotment of new shares; and that the new shares should stand on an equal footing with the old as from the 1st of July, 1880.

The report of the directors was received and adopted without reservation at the ordinary annual meeting of the company held upon the 4th of September, 1880. Various resolutions were passed by the company at that and also subsequent meetings; but I do not consider the terms of these resolutions as of material importance, because they merely provide the requisite machinery for enabling the directors to carry into effect the scheme suggested in their report. For the same reason I do not think any importance can be attached to the form of the dividend warrant and allotment of new shares which was subsequently issued to the shareholders by the officers of the company. None of these documents can, in my opinion, affect the substance of the scheme which was recommended in the report of the directors, and adopted by the company.

At the time when that scheme was submitted the capital of the company consisted of 55,200 shares of £10 each, with £7 10s. paid up per share. Before the proposal to issue new shares was made the old shares were selling at a premium of £21 per share, but after the allotment of new shares the premium fell to £14. The executor of William Bouch held 600 old shares which belonged to the remainderman. The selling value of these shares was, in consequence of the adoption of the new scheme, diminished by £4,200. The bonus on the shares was only £1,500; but the value of the 200 new shares, with that sum imputed as paid upon them, was £4,300. If the company had offered to its members a choice between the bonus dividend and new shares, with £7 10s. paid on each, no sane shareholder would have elected to take the dividend. If William Bouch's executor had done so, the life tenant would have been benefited to the extent of £1,500, but the estate of the remainderman would have deen depreciated in value to the extent of £4,200. I doubt whether, in the case supposed, it would be the duty of an executor to choose the bonus and reject the shares; but I am satisfied that in the present case no such option was given by the company.

I am unable to resist the conclusion that, in adopting the scheme recommended by the directors, the company must have intended that each shareholder should get an allotment of new shares, and that the money declared to be payable as dividend, which was not in the coffers of the company and did not exist in a form available for distribution, should not be paid to the shareholder, but should simply, by means of an entry in the company's books, be imputed in payment of the call of £7 10s. upon each new share. That is plainly indicated in the report as the necessary result of the shareholders agreeing to the proposals therein made. It states expressly that, if the shareholders sanctioned these proposals, "every member of the company, on the 25th of September, would consequently receive one new share in respect of every three shares he then holds, such new share having, like the existing shares, £7 10s. paid thereon, and leaving £2 10s. uncalled." If I am right in my conclusion, the substantial bonus which was meant to be given to each shareholder was not a money payment, but a proportional share of the increased capital of the company. In that view of the facts, it does not, in my opinion, admit of doubt that the benefit must accrue to the remainderman, and not to the tenant for life.

I am accordingly of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and the judgment of Kay, J., restored.

Lord Bramwell.—The authorities bearing on the question in this case are, to my mind, very unsatisfactory. I can deduce no principle from them. Cases have been decided differently where the facts were the same because different words had been used. This, in my opinion, can never, or very rarely, be right. There seems to have been a confused notion that undivided profits at some time and somehow became capital.

The truth is, as said by the Court of Appeal, that a trader, whether sole or corporate, trades with all the money which he has got, let him have got it how he may. A sole trader with a capital of £10,000 who makes in a year a profit of £2,000 and spends £1,000 only, leaving the other £1,000 in his business, may well in the next year be said to have a capital of £11,000; not so where there is a partnership, whether an ordinary partnership or an incorporated partnership. There the undivided profits of any period, a year or shorter or longer time, continue to be undivided profits unless something in the articles of partnership or some agreement by all the partners makes them capital. They do not become capital by effluxion of time or by their being used in the trading.

For example, a company makes a profit of £10,500 in a year. Suppose its capital to be £200,000, it divides the £10,000, giving 5 per cent. to its shareholders, trading with the £500 as with its other funds. It does this for four years, with the same result of profit and dividend. At the end of the fourth year its undivided profits, including those brought forward, are £12,000, and it can and does pay 6 per cent. to its shareholders, can there be a doubt of its right to do so? Is it not the fair and just thing, as between a tenant for life and remainderman? I say yes. And if true for four years it is true for forty.

I think the right rule would be that contended for by Mr. Rigby. Make the date of the division the date for considering the rights. All profits made up to that date, unless by the articles of partnership or subsequent agreement by the shareholders, are profits to which the tenant for life is entitled, though they have been used in the business. I think that is the opinion of the Court of Appeal.

Now, to apply such a principle to this case, had the company simply divided their profits and reserve fund to the extent they disposed of them and created no new shares, Mrs. Bouch would have been entitled to £2 10s. on each of the 600 shares—that is, £1,500. The 600 shares would have been less in value £2 10s. each, and would have been worth each £26, or in all £15,600 instead of £17,100, as they were at the time of the arrangement. By doing what they did, that is, creating the new shares and paying the £7 10s. on each new share, every share, new and old, became worth three-fourths only of what a share was worth before, and the total value of the 800 shares was the same as of the 600 before—viz., £17,100.

But, applying the above reasoning to the facts that took place, it seems to me impossible to say that in reason or on any legal consideration Mrs. Bouch could be entitled to the 200 new shares. For, if so, the remainderman's right would be only to the 600 shares remaining, which, at three-fourths of the £28 10s., would make them worth only £12,825, the new 200 being worth £4,275. The tenant for life cannot have a right to the new shares.

But it may be said that this reasoning shows she had a right to the £1,500. To this I think there are two answers, not that it would not have been a reasonable thing to have given the £1,500 to her and to have made some different arrangement for the new shares; but there are, I say, two answers. First, the authorities are against her. But, secondly, I think it must be taken that there was an agreement by all parties, the company and its shareholders, and, if necessary, I should say by the tenant for life and the remainderman, certainly by those whose case we are considering, that new shares should be created, and that undivided profits should be applied to the payment of £7 10s. on each new share. If I am asked what Mrs. Bouch gained by consenting to this I cannot say. Perhaps her consent was no more than non-dissent. Perhaps if she thought about it all, she did not think she could help it. Perhaps she could not; for it was the offer made by the company to the shareholders which was to be accepted or refused as a whole.

I agree with the first answer of the Court of Appeal, "that the bonus of £2 10s. was income of the estate of William Bouch" to this extent, that in reason and in right it should have been so treated. But I differ from the second answer, which is a sort of conclusion from the first. It is an erroneous conclusion in my opinion. It assumes that £7 10s. bought a new share. It did not. For the price of the new share was that sum and the diminished value of the other shares.

On these considerations, and agreeing with the noble and learned lords who have already spoken in their reasoning and their view of the authorities, I am of opinion that this judgment should be reversed.

Lord Fitzgerald.—I concur with my noble and learned friends, and am of opinion that, for the reasons given, the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed. At the close of the argument at your lordships' bar I had arrived at the conclusion that the directors of the Consett Iron Co., acting within their powers, had so dealt with the extra allowance or bonus made to the shareholders out of accumulated profits and reserve fund as to make that "bonus" capital and not income. I differ from the Court of Appeal, not in its able exposition of the law, but as to the proper inferences to be deduced from the admitted facts. Fry, L.J., puts the question thus: "There remains another question—namely, whether the way in which the declaration of this bonus or dividend was coupled with the creation of new capital did or did not amount to a capitalization of the bonus?" Upon this question I have felt myself unable to follow the Court of Appeal, and I adopt the view of Kay, J. The reasoning and the decision of Lord Hatherley in In re Barton's Trusts, then, directly apply.

The proceedings at the ordinary general meeting of the 4th of September, 1880, and the documents which emanated from it, together with the resolutions of confirmation, have been so carefully and critically examined by Kay, J., and by my noble and learned friends that I can add nothing. I adopt their view of the facts and the proper inferences to be drawn from them.

The opinion which I had formed at the close of the case, and to which I adhere, renders it unnecessary for me to criticize any of the endless chain of decisions by which the argument was supposed to be illustrated.

Copyright—Lectures by professor in a university—Right of students to publish.

A professor in Glasgow University delivered lectures to a class of students, who paid fees for the right to attend.

Held (Lord Fitzgerald dissenting), that he did not thereby publish the lectures to the whole world, so as to entitle anyone who heard them to republish them without the permission of the author.

Decision of the Court of Session (reported 13 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, p. 23) reversed.

This was an appeal from the Second Division of the Court of Session.

The facts and previous proceedings are fully set out in the judgment delivered by Lord Watson.

Before arguing the point of law there was some discussion as to whether the interlocutor was in proper form, but the argument was at once heard on the merits of the appeal, as if the interlocutor had contained an express finding to the effect that the publication complained of was in substance a reproduction of the appellant's lectures.

A university professor is a public person, all members of the public are entitled to become students, and the lecture is delivered in the execution of a public office. Lectures delivered at a university are not for the benefit of the students only, but also the public, consequently the mode of distributing the information cannot be limited. Further, in the case of a professor there is an implied consent to publication. There can be no property in oral lectures.

June 13.—LORD HALSBURY, C.—In this case I have had much greater difficulty in dealing with the question of form than with the substantial question between the parties which it was intended to raise by this appeal. It is, I think, manifest that the interlocutor does not comply with the provisions of the Judicature Act of 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 120), and I cannot but regret that the suggestion of Lord Rutherfurd Clark was not adopted, by which that which was fact would have been found as fact, and the question of law, which alone under that statute is open to your lordships to review, would have been left to be determined. Nevertheless, although with some doubt, I have come to the conclusion that your lordships may treat the question of fact as having been determined, and the question of law as sufficiently severed from those questions of fact to enable your lordships to pronounce a final judgment between the parties.

The question which it was intended to raise was the legal right of the respondent to publish, in the form of a pamphlet, certain literary compositions of the appellant, which were orally delivered to the students of the University of Glasgow attending his class. A majority of the court has determined that the pamphlet in question is a reproduction of the appellant's literary composition; and I do not stop to discuss what some of their lordships appear to have considered important, that in respect of certain particulars it was a blundering and unsuccessful reproduction of the appellant's work. I confess I am unable to understand what place such topics find in the argument. Assume an unlawful reproduction of an author's literary work; it does not become less an injury to the legal right because the reproducer has disfigured his reproduction with ignorant or foolish additions of his own. It is not denied, and it cannot in the present state of the law be denied, that an author has a proprietary right in his unpublished literary productions. It is further incapable of denial that that proprietary right may still continue, notwithstanding some kind of communication to others. The case of private letters which, though conveniently described by the word "private," involve publication of a certain kind to others than the author of them, is an illustration of a communication which does not permit the infringement of the proprietary right which would be involved in their unauthorized general production. The doubt which I have entertained in the course of the argument has been whether the extent and degree of publication in the case now under debate was not a question of fact which should have been determined on the evidence before the court, and which, if it had been determined, would not have been open to your lordships to review. But, as I have said, I have come to the conclusion that in the form in which it has arisen it may be treated as a question of law, that is to say, whether, on the agreed state of facts, such a publication as is proved here, must, as a matter of law, deprive the author of the literary composition in question of his proprietary right; and whether the fact that he is professor of moral philosophy, teaching in his class-room by the literary composition which is now the subject of debate, makes his delivery of that composition necessarily public to the whole world, so as to entitle anyone who heard it to republish it without the permission of its author.

Now I have designedly used the phrase "literary composition" to avoid the ambiguity of the word "lecture," because I think the word "lecture" involves an assumption which may give rise to error. If by it is signified a lecture delivered on behalf of the university, and, so to speak, as the lecture of the university itself, as the authorized exposition of university teaching, I can well understand that, by the nature of the thing, from the circumstances of its delivery, and the object with which it was delivered, it would be impossible to say that it was the object of those on whose behalf the professor was lecturing, or by himself, to limit the right of communication to others. Whether that limit of the right arises from implied contract or from the existing relation between the hearers and the author, it is intelligible that where a person speaks a speech to which all the world is invited, either expressly or impliedly, to listen, or preaches a sermon in a church, the doors of which are thrown open to all mankind, the mode and manner of publication negative, as it appears to me, any limitation. But without using any phrase which by force of its ordinary meaning implies either a kind of publication or involves a limitation of the right of publication, what are the facts here as found by a majority of the court? A teacher is in his class-room with his students. For the purpose of teaching them he uses a composition of his own, in this case called "The Law of Moral Philosophy." Suppose it had been exercises in grammar, arithmetic, or foreign language. The object and purpose is to teach the students, to enable them to become proficients in the various subjects of which the teacher is the professor. The student is entitled to avail himself of the teaching. The object is to make him a good grammarian, a good arithmetician, or a proficient in the particular language that is taught. But could it be contended that, by reason of such communication to such students, each of them was entitled to publish the professor's exercises, dialogues, dictionary, or the like? It seems to me that it might be, and indeed there is some suggestion here that it is, contrary both to the spirit and meaning of what is called a lecture, that students should be supplied with some mode of answering questions on the subject of their lectures, without that process of mental digestion which is intended to form the substance of the teaching. Illustrations might be infinitely multiplied in which the sole purpose of a professor's teaching might be rendered nugatory by the unauthorized reproduction of his modes of teaching.

The ground on which I have been able to come to the conclusion that the particular form of literary composition, and the degree of communication which is established to a limited class, may be treated as a question of law is, that it appears to have been decided that, notwithstanding the professor's desire to prevent such reproduction, and contrary to his intention, the delivery of his lecture—of his composition—to a limited class of students, operates, as matter of law, to make his composition public, and to prevent his enforcing any proprietary right.

I am not aware of any university regulation, or any bargain with its professors, which, either expressly or impliedly, enforces on the professors the making public of their literary compositions, of whatever class these compositions may be, and whether merely educational and intended for the use of their students, or intended for more general diffusion. I am disposed to think, although it does not become necessary to discuss it in the present case, that if a professor had entered into a specific bargain to make public the lectures which he was delivering to his students, but, contrary to that bargain, had enforced on his students the condition of secrecy, though the university which employed him on that express bargain might be at liberty to seek their remedy against him for a breach of that undertaking, it would not necessarily make public that which the lecturer himself had neither expressly nor impliedly communicated for general reproduction.

I doubt whether any of the cases which have been brought to your lordships' attention do more than establish the two propositions which, as I have said, cannot now be in debate. The application of the principle laid down in these cases is what gives rise to the matter now in discussion. I do not consider it very important to consider what was the ultimate result of Mr Abernethy's appeal to Lord Eldon, because the ground of Lord Eldon's decision, as originally given, seems not to have been affected, if an arrangement between the parties, as seems probable, put an end to the litigation.

With respect to the Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 65, I am not prepared to say that I can obtain any light from its provisions. I had at one time an impression that there was something in the nature of a declaration by the Legislature that lectures delivered in a university, public school, or any public foundation, were to be assumed to be so published as for the future to become public property; and, if that were to be assumed to be the construction of the statute, a serious question would arise as to what were lectures within the meaning of that statute. But I am now satisfied that the language of the statute has been adopted by the Legislature for the purpose of not interfering in any way with the law existing on the subject. Possibly it may be that the difficulty of defining what should be a lecture may have occurred to the author of the statute, or the impolicy of affecting to lay down a rule where many circumstances of convenience as to modes of instruction, and so forth, might be appropriately left to the university authorities, may have produced the legislation which, in fact, exists. At all events, I can derive no assistance from a statute which professes to leave the law as it is, without professing to give any hint of what it assumes the law to be.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the appellant ought to succeed, and I concur in the suggested form of judgment which has been prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord Watson.—This appeal is taken in two conjoined processes instituted in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire by the appellant, who is Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, for the purpose of having the respondent, a bookseller in that city, interdicted from publishing or advertising for sale certain books or pamphlets, entitled "Aids to the Study of Moral Philosophy," on the ground that these works are mere reproductions of the lectures delivered by the appellant to the students who attend his class in the university. In defence the respondent pleads, in the first place, that the publications sought to be interdicted are not substantially the same with the appellant's lectures, but represent the views of the person who compiled them, and are the result of his independent study and research; and, in the second place, that the delivery of the appellant's lectures in the class-room of the university is equivalent to publication, and that he has consequently lost his right to prevent their publication in a printed form. These defences raise two issues, the first being a question of fact, which, if the actions had originated in the Court of Session, would have been appropriately tried before a jury, the second being a question of law. Proof was led by both parties; and on the 15th of February, 1884, the Sheriff-Substitute granted perpetual interdict as craved, and ordained the respondent to deliver up to the appellant all copies of the publications complained of remaining in his hands or within his control. The learned Sheriff-Substitute, by his interlocutor, found that "the said books or pamphlets are in substance reproductions, more or less correct, of the lectures in use to be delivered by the pursuer to his class of moral philosophy in the University of Glasgow"; and he further found that "the said lectures are the property of the pursuer, and that the defender has not shown that the pursuer has in any way lost his right of property therein, or that he has acquired from the pursuer, or in any other lawful way, a right to publish or reproduce said lectures."

The respondent appealed to the Second Division, who ordered the cause, with minutes of debate, to be laid before the whole judges of the court for their opinion. The result was that of the thirteen consulted judges a majority of nine were of opinion that the respondent's publications are substantially a reproduction of the appellant's lectures. Six judges, Lords Shand, Rutherfurd Clark, Adam, Fraser, Kinnear, and Trayner, held that the appellant has a right of property in his delivered lectures; whilst five judges, the Lord President, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lords Mure, Lee, and McLaren, came to the opposite conclusion. Lord Young, though he did express some views unfavourable to the appellant, distinctly intimated that he did not consider it necessary to decide and did not decide the question, being of opinion that the appellant's right, assuming it to exist, must be limited to a right to protection "against any publication which may be reasonably held to anticipate or otherwise substantially or prejudicially interfere with a subsequent publication by himself," and that the publications complained of are not of that character. Lord Craighill expressed no opinion whatever upon the matter of right, holding that the view taken by the minority (of which his lordship was one) upon the question of fact was a sufficient ground for judgment.

On the 23rd of October, 1885, the Second Division pronounced the interlocutor which is now brought under review. It contains the following findings:—"Find that the pursuer is Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, and that the lectures referred to in this record were delivered by him to his students as part of his ordinary course. Find that the defender, who is a bookseller in Glasgow, published the works now complained of. Find that these works were compiled by a student who had attended the class taught by the pursuer, and also had taken notes in shorthand of the pursuer's lectures." These are in all respects proper findings, although they set forth facts which were not seriously disputed. The important part of the interlocutor follows—"But find, in conformity with the opinions of the majority of the whole court, that such publication did not constitute an infringement of any legal right of property, or otherwise, belonging to or vested in the pursuer; therefore dismiss the appeal," &c.

The last finding of the interlocutor does not comply with the requirements of 6 Geo. 4, c. 120, s. 40, and is beset with ambiguity. It suggests either that a majority of the court held that there was no infringement, or that a majority of the court were of opinion that there was no right capable of being infringed; but in point of fact there was not a majority in favour of either of these propositions. Lord Rutherfurd Clark protested against the terms of the interlocutor, as not being in accordance with the provisions of the Judicature Act of 1825; but he was overruled by the other judges of the division, whose reasons for the course they followed I am at a loss to understand. Apparently they meant to find that, on some grounds or other, a majority of the whole judges were of opinion that interdict should not be granted, such majority being obtained by combining two minorities. It may be doubtful whether Lord Craighill's opinion on the question of fact should have been taken into account in deciding the case, seeing that it had been negatived by a large majority; but in the present state of the case it is unnecessary for your lordships to consider that matter. Whether judgment was given for or against the appellant, it was the statutory duty of the court to insert a finding of fact in their interlocutor, expressing the opinion of the majority of the consulted judges upon the question of infringement, for the guidance of this House. Your lordships are, by the terms of the statute, precluded from reviewing the interlocutor of the 23rd of October, 1885, except so far as it "depends on, or is affected by, matter of law," and the only question which can be competently raised and decided in this appeal is that which relates to the existence of the appellant's alleged right of property in his lectures. It would have been idle to entertain that question if the court below had come to the conclusion that, assuming such a right to exist, the respondent's publications did not constitute an invasion of it. Fortunately, in the present case, the conclusion of the majority of the whole court upon the question of fact is beyond dispute; and the ministerial duty of the Second Division to give effect to that conclusion by a finding in their judgment is equally plain. In these circumstances, your lordships did not think it expedient or necessary to subject the parties to the delay and expense which would have been occasioned by remitting the cause in order to have the interlocutor put into proper shape, and permitted them to be heard on the merits of the appeal, as if the interlocutor had contained an express finding to the effect that the publications complained of are, in substance, a reproduction of the appellant's lectures.

The author of a lecture on moral philosophy, or of any other original composition, retains a right of property in his work, which entitles him to prevent its publication by others until it has, with his consent, been communicated to the public. Since the case of Jefferys v. Boosey was decided by this House in the year 1854, it must be taken as settled law that upon such communication being made to the public, whether orally or by the circulation of written or printed copies of the work, the author's right of property ceases to exist. Copyright, which is the exclusive privilege of multiplying copies after publication, is the creature of statute, and with that right we have nothing to do in the present case. The only question which we have to decide is, whether the oral delivery of the appellant's lectures to the students attending his class is in law equivalent to communication to the public.

The author's right of property in his unpublished work being undoubted, it has also been settled that he may communicate it to others under such limitations as will not interfere with the continuance of the right. "He has," as was said by Lord Brougham in Jefferys v. Boosey, "the undisputed right to his manuscript; he may withhold or he may communicate it, and, communicating, he may limit the number of persons to whom it is imparted, and impose such restrictions as he pleases upon their use of it. The fulfilment of the annexed conditions he may proceed to enforce, and for their breach he may claim compensation." He cannot print and sell without publishing his work, but he may legitimately impose restrictions which will prevent its publication, whether the communication be made by giving copies for private perusal or by recitation before a select audience. In the latter case the retention of the author's right depends upon its being either matter of contract or an implied condition that the audience are admitted for the purpose of receiving instruction or amusement, and not in order that they may make a full note of what they hear, and publish it for their own profit and for the information of the public at large. Upon that principle it was decided, in Macklin v. Richardson, that the fact of a play having been acted for several years in a public theatre with permission of the author did not imply an abandonment of his right, and that he was, therefore, entitled to restrain its publication from notes taken by a shorthand writer who had paid for admission to the theatre. On the other hand, I do not doubt that a lecturer who addresses himself to the public generally, without distinction of persons or selection or restriction of his hearers, has, as the Lord President observes in this case, "abandoned his ideas and words for the use of the public at large; or, in other words, has himself published them."

The main argument addressed to your lordships for the respondent was to the effect that a professorship in a Scotch university being munus publicum, and the occupant of the office being under an obligation to receive into his class all comers having the requisite qualification, his lectures are really addressed to the public; and, at all events, that there is no room for inferring that the students are taught under an implied condition that they shall not print and publish his lectures either for their own profit or otherwise. I do not think it can be disputed that, as stated by Lord Shand, this is the first occasion in the history of the Scottish universities on which any such right as that now claimed has been asserted. If the claim be well founded, there can be no copyright in a lecture which has been once delivered in the class-room. Yet it is the fact that professors and their representatives have been in frequent use to publish lectures which had been annually delivered for years before such publication, and have enjoyed, without objection or challenge, the privilege of copyright. That has been notably the case with our great academical teachers of moral and mental philosophy, from Dr. Thomas Reid, who was appointed to the chair now held by the appellant in 1763, to the late Sir William Hamilton. I concede that, although such may have been the prevalent understanding in Scotland as to the professor's right, this is not a case in which it can be said that communis error facit jus; but I agree with Lord Shand's observation that in these circumstances effect ought not to be given to the respondent's argument unless he can make it clear "in principle or authority that the law gives him the right he claims."

In the court below there was a good deal of discussion as to the practical result of deciding this case one way or another. I am afraid that I do not estimate so highly as some of the learned judges the advantage of having the professor's lectures printed and subjected to the criticism of public opinion. The capable critics are a small and by no means unanimous section of the community, and I doubt whether the governing body of the university, or the professor, would derive any assistance from their strictures; whilst experience has shown that the public who are interested in it are not ignorant of the character of university teaching. An original thinker and able teacher very soon attracts a large class, and vice versâ. I certainly do not appreciate the advantage to the public of furnishing (which is the professed object of the respondent) the appellant's students with a "crib," an aid to knowledge forbidden in well-regulated educational institutions, which, as the Lord Chancellor has already pointed out, supersedes the necessity of intellectual effort, and neutralizes the benefit of the professor's tuition. There appeared to me to be some force in the suggestion of the appellant's counsel, that if it be now held for the first time that delivery of his lectures is publication, the professor may in future (contrary to his present practice) hesitate to communicate his best and most original thoughts to his class before they have been matured and given to the world by himself. But I do not think these considerations, however important they may be in themselves, are decisive of the present question.

As to the position of students attending the appellant's class, it is sufficient to say here that they must be members by matriculation of the university, and they must also be enrolled as members of his class for the session, upon payment of the prescribed fee. A member of the public, as such, has no right to be present at his lectures, and the public has no right to control or interfere with his teaching. By section 85 of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1858, the duty of superintending and regulating the teaching and discipline of the university is committed to the senatus academicus (which is a body consisting of the principal and whole professors of the university), subject to the control and review of the University Court.

The leading, if not the only case having a close analogy to the present, is Abernethy v. Hutchinson, decided by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Eldon) in 1825. It is true that in that case there were features which do not occur here. It appeared upon the affidavits made by Mr. Abernethy in support of his application for an injunction against the publication of his lectures at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, that it was no part of his duty as one of the surgeons of the hospital to deliver these lectures, which were not in any way open or accessible to the public, and were not attended by any person save by his permission. At the first hearing Lord Eldon entertained some doubt whether there could be satisfactory evidence of the substantial identity of the publication sought to be restrained with the plaintiff's lectures, seeing that these had not been written out at full length, but were delivered orally from notes; and his lordship also desiderated evidence of the way in which the defendants obtained possession of the matter which they printed. The motion for an injunction was accordingly delayed, the learned judge observing: "In the meantime Mr. Abernethy may, if he thinks proper, produce his MSS.; and, on the other hand, the defendants will judge for themselves whether they will or not—and I do not require it of them, because I have no right—inform me of the way in which they became possessed of the means of publishing this work." Upon the first of these points his lordship was satisfied by the production of the notes from which the lectures had been delivered, with an explanatory affidavit. The defendants did not respond to the invitation addressed to them, and his lordship, in the absence of direct evidence, came to the conclusion that they must have obtained the lectures from some person who had attended them, or in some other way of which the court could not approve. Accordingly a perpetual injunction was granted, on the ground that all persons who attended these lectures were under an implied contract not to publish what they heard, although they might take it down for their own instruction and use.

I may here observe that, in the course of the argument for the respondent, Mr. McClymont brought under your lordships' notice the fact that the record in Abernethy v. Hutchinson shows that the injunction was dissolved by the Lord Chancellor within a few months after its issue, upon a motion by the defendants, and without hearing parties. We were told that no trace had been found of the affidavit on which the motion was made, so that the recall of the injunction may have been the result of an arrangement between the parties, and, at all events, it cannot detract from the weight of Lord Eldon's deliberate judgment causâ cognitâ.

In my opinion, the reasoning upon which Lord Eldon's judgment is based applies strictly to the case of a professor in a Scotch university. The principle which pervades the whole of that reasoning is that, where the persons present at a lecture are not the general public, but a limited class of the public, selected and admitted for the sole and special purpose of receiving individual instruction, they may make any use they can of the lecture, to the extent of taking it down in shorthand, for their own information and improvement, but cannot publish it. If that be the real character of the relation between the lecturer and those whom he addresses, it is immaterial whether they are selected by himself or by others, so long as it is matter of express stipulation or of reasonable implication that the duty which he undertakes is limited to giving personal instruction to the individuals composing his audience. Some of the learned judges in the court below seem to have been of opinion that the present case cannot be brought within the principle of Abernethy v. Hutchinson, because there is nothing in the nature of a contract between the professor and his students, and, therefore, there can be no implied contract that they shall not publish. That may be so; but what Lord Eldon held was that the restriction of the hearers' right to use the lectures arose from the relation established by contract between them and Mr. Abernethy. In that case the restriction necessarily became an implied term of the contract; but the condition itself is the legal consequence of the relation in which the parties stand to each other, and must receive effect wherever a similar relation exists, whether it be established by contract or in any other way.

I do not think that students of moral philosophy in the University of Glasgow, or in any other Scotch university, either are, or can with propriety be said to represent, the general public; of course they are, each and all of them, members of the public, but they do not attend the professor's lectures in that capacity. They must be members of the university, and they must further comply with its regulations, and make payment to the professor of the usual fee, in return for which they receive from him a ticket or certificate of their enrolment as students for the session; and, without observing all these preliminaries, they would have no right to enter his class-room during the lecture hour. The relation of the professor to his students is simply that of teacher and pupil; his duty is, not to address the public at large, but to instruct his students; and their right is to profit by his instruction, but not to report or publish his lectures. It appears to me that the learned judges whose opinions are adverse to the appellant have attributed undue weight to the circumstance that the appellant's office is munus publicum. That it is so is an undoubted fact; but, according to my apprehension, the question which your lordships have to decide depends, not upon that fact, but upon the duty which the appellant's office requires him to fulfil. The nature of the duty incumbent upon a professor in an English university is thus described by Lord Eldon in Abernethy v. Hutchinson:—"Now if a professor be appointed, he is appointed for the purpose of giving information to all his students who attend him, and it is his duty to do that; but I have never yet heard that anybody could publish his lectures." So far as I know, there is no difference whatever between the position of a Scotch and that of an English university professor, so far as regards their relations to the students whom they teach; and no point of difference has been suggested, either in the court below or by the respondent's counsel. The fact of his being a public official lays the appellant under an obligation to the State as well as to those who pay for their instruction, to teach efficiently, and to the best of his abilities; it does not affect the nature of his obligation, and cannot alter the relation between him and his students.

That Lord Eldon held the lectures of a university professor to be within the rule laid down and given effect to by him in Abernethy v. Hutchinson is beyond question, because he expressly refers to the case of such a professor as an illustration of the legal principles upon which he gave judgment for Mr. Abernethy. None of the learned judges who are of opinion that the doctrine of Abernethy v. Hutchinson is inapplicable to this case advert to that part of his lordship's judgment, with the single exception of Lord McLaren, who states, in my opinion correctly, that Lord Eldon "very distinctly and emphatically identifies the case of Mr. Abernethy with that of the lectures of Blackstone, originally delivered by that great lawyer in the University of Oxford, in which he held the appointment of Vinerian Professor of Law." Lord McLaren suggests, however, that there are no means of knowing whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor "had been drawn to the distinction which might be taken between public and private lectures, a distinction on which the main argument of the defender is founded." I cannot, for many reasons, concur in Lord McLaren's suggestion. Lord Eldon, in the passage referred to, was distinguishing between lectures public in this sense, that they are communicated urbi et orbi by the mere act of delivery, and lectures which are private, inasmuch as the author does not by their delivery communicate his ideas and language to the public at large, or part with his common law right of property. It was not the habit of Lord Eldon to overlook such obvious differences as did exist between the position of Mr. Abernethy and that of Sir William Blackstone; it is manifest that his lordship was clearly of opinion that these differences could not disturb the application of the same principles of law to both cases alike. In that opinion I entirely concur.

The observations of Lord Eldon assume that Sir William Blackstone would not have had copyright in the text of his Commentaries, if the lectures delivered by him as Vinerian Professor were held to have been thereby published. The accuracy of that assumption is controverted by my noble and learned friend (Lord Fitzgerald). Never having seen the lectures, I can only say for myself, that in the preface to the first edition of the Commentaries, published in 1765, the learned author states that "the following sheets contain the substance of a course of lectures on the Laws of England which were read by the author in the University of Oxford." Lord Eldon heard and took notes of the lectures, and was, no doubt, familiar with the Commentaries; and he was, therefore, in a position to judge (which I am not), and was perfectly capable of judging, whether the two works were substantially the same. If they were, the statute of Anne could give the author no copyright in the original text, although he might acquire the copyright of new matter added to subsequent editions of the Commentaries.

In regard to the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 65, I adopt the opinion of the great majority of the learned judges, which is in accordance with the view taken by Kay, J., in the recent case of Nicols v. Pitman. The effect of the statute is to secure their right of property to authors of lectures and to persons to whom the right has been sold or conveyed, notwithstanding delivery, upon their compliance with certain preliminaries; and their right is protected from invasion by forfeitures and penalties. Its provisions are not confined to cases in which the right would have been protected at common law, but extend to many cases in which, according to that law, delivery would have been equivalent to publication. But, by section 5, lectures delivered in a university or a public school, or on any public foundation, are excepted from the operation of the Act, and it is declared "that the law relating thereto shall remain the same as if this Act had not been passed." I cannot gather from the terms of that exception and declaration any indication of an intention on the part of the Legislature to express their understanding of the existing law with respect to lectures in these institutions. There may be lectures delivered within the walls of such institutions which do by their delivery become public property, just as there may be others which do not. Whether they belong to one or other of these classes is a question which must be decided irrespective of the provisions of the statute.

I am accordingly of opinion that the appellant is entitled to have the judgment of the Second Division, in so far as adverse to him, reversed, and to have the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute restored. Should your lordships come to the same conclusion as myself in this case, I have to suggest that the proper course to follow in disposing of the appeal will be to reverse the interlocutor appealed from, with the exception of the first three findings of fact; and in respect of these findings, and also in respect that it was admitted by the parties at the bar, and that the appeal was heard on the footing that, according to the opinion of a majority of the consulted judges, the works complained of are in substance a reproduction of the appellant's lectures, to declare that the delivery of the said lectures by the appellant to his students as part of his ordinary course, was not equivalent to publication thereof; and that the appellant is entitled, notwithstanding such delivery, to restrain all other persons from publishing the said lectures without his consent; and, subject to that declaration, to remit the case to the Second Division of the Court of Session, with directions to affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute dated February 15, 1884, and to find the appellant entitled to the expenses of process incurred by him in the Court of Session; and further to ordain the respondent to pay to the appellant his costs of this appeal.

Lord Fitzgerald.—The question we have to determine on this appeal seems to me to be one of pure law. I agree with my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson) that we must read the interlocutor of the Second Division as if it contained an express finding that the publications complained of are in substance a reproduction of the appellant's lectures.

It was not contested that by the common law of Scotland, as well as by the common law of England, every author has a right of property in his compositions so long as they remain "unpublished," and that a private lecturer may lawfully impose an express condition on persons allowed to hear his lecture, that they shall not publish what they hear, and that such a condition may also be lawfully implied from the circumstances. In such cases the common law protects the author's right of property and forbids infringement. On the other hand, a private lecturer may deliver his lecture under such circumstances as indicate his intention to give his words to the public at large. In the latter case, the lecturer has technically published his lecture, and has abandoned the protection which the common law would otherwise afford. We have now, however, to deal with a case very different from that of any private lecturer.

The facts, as to which there is no dispute, are that the pursuer fills the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow. It is not necessary to investigate the history of that university, as its status is now, in substance, similar to that of the other universities of Scotland. They are all ancient public endowed corporations, established by public authority for the special purpose of public instruction in theology, law, medicine, and all the arts. In that instruction the public has a direct and deep interest. For an outline of the university and the offices of its professors and their functions and duties, I refer to the eloquent judgment of the Lord President. In point of modern regulation and government they all come under the provision of the imperial statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 83, which is a statute "for the advancement of religion and learning, and to make provision for the better government and discipline of the universities of Scotland." The University of Glasgow has under that Act a chancellor, a senatus academicus "to superintend and regulate (inter alia) the teaching and discipline of the university," a University Court to control the decisions of the senatus academicus and to enforce due attention on the part of the professors to regulations as to the mode of teaching and other duties imposed on them, and to fix and regulate the fees from time to time in the several classes, it has also a University Council, and in order to produce uniformity in the several universities the statute constitutes a general body of commissioners with legislative powers, for a limited period, to make statutes and ordinances, such as in their opinion would be conducive to the well-being of the universities, the advancement of learning, the course of study, and the manner of examinations, &c. The statute also gives to those commissioners an important power—namely, to recommend grants of public money for certain purposes, and, amongst others, "for increasing the salaries presently attached to existing professorships."

The pursuer was a professor in the University of Glasgow, remunerated partly by salary paid out of the university revenues, or out of money voted by Parliament, and partly by class fees, which, however, equally formed part of the university revenue, though allocated for the time being to him. His obligation and his duty were to teach the nation through its youth, according to the regulations laid down by the governing body of the university. It does not appear what those regulations were, nor is it alleged that there were any restrictions or conditions imposed on the students of the class, or other auditors by that governing body, as to the use to be made of the professor's lectures when delivered. I assume, too, as the contrary does not appear, that the pursuer was left free to teach by lectures if he thought fit. He did teach by the instrumentality of reading lectures. The broad question for our consideration is whether that reading of his lectures to those assembled in the lecture-room is a publication to the nation.

After much anxious consideration I have come to the conclusion that the delivery of the lectures was a publication to the public at large, and that, being such, the pursuer has abandoned to the public the exclusive rights which he otherwise had, and the protection which the common law would otherwise have afforded him. I have struggled against this conclusion, as I am conscious how superior my noble and learned friends are to me in knowledge and judgment, but I have been unable to agree with them, and am compelled, on the other hand, to accept the broad and vigorous reasoning of the Lord President and Lords Young and McLaren.

It was urged in your lordships' House in argument that a decision in favour of the respondent would operate unjustly on the professor, as depriving him of emoluments which he might otherwise derive from the publication and sale of his lectures, by himself or his representatives, for all time; but this seems an exaggeration, and to some extent an imaginary apprehension. There is no power, save that of the university, to interfere with the professor in publishing his lectures for sale, and the public would probably prefer the publication issued with the stamp of his authority, and containing his emendations and additions. This is, however, a consideration which we cannot enter upon. Again, it was urged that the professional practice of repeating the same lecture session after session, in like manner as a minister repeats his sermon, would be interfered with. If this was so, it would seem to be a desirable result. The sheriff, in his note to the interlocutor of the 23rd of November, 1883, says, inter alia, on this point: "The professor's thoughts, as expressed that year, must be the same as those to be similarly expressed the next year." This would seem to assimilate the professor's duty to the cuckoo cry of repetition. I rather think that this eminent professor would repudiate such a suggestion, and tell us that the lecturer should remember that—

"Beneath this starry arch, Naught resteth or is still,"

and that his duty is to watch over and criticize new modes of thought, new works, the march of intellect, and those discoveries which—

"Make old knowledge
Pale before new."

Even in pure mathematics there may be alterations and additions, and ethical science is not free from the inexorable law of mutability.

Lord Young, in the reasons for his judgment, says: "Now I have to observe that neither the common law of property nor the statute law of copyright applies to teaching in a public university. It is obviously expedient in the public interest that such teaching should be public, and open to public comment and criticism. This accordingly, I apprehend, is the reason why lectures in public universities are excepted from the provisions of the Act of 1835." I concur with the learned lord (Lord Young) in opinion that it is essential to the public safety that university teaching should be exposed to comment, to searching criticism, and the full blaze of public opinion. How can this be attained if the contention of the pursuer is well founded? If the lecturer can prevent all other publication of his lectures than that which takes place in his class-room, the nation may be left in Cimmerian darkness as to the teachings of its youth in its great universities. Unless there be full and complete publicity, criticism would be impracticable and a mere empty sound.

Lord Young, in the passage just quoted, touches on another subject—namely, the Act of 1835—to which, perhaps, sufficient attention has not been given. The Bill, which became the Act of 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 65), was introduced into this House about ten years after Lord Eldon had given his decision on the injunction motion in Abernethy v. Hutchinson, and it is not improbable that the difficulties supposed to exist in consequence of Lord Eldon's reasons led to the Bill. It is a Bill entitled "for preventing the publication of lectures without consent." The preamble is obviously taken from the Copyright Act, 8 Anne, c. 19, and the first section is large enough to apply to and embrace all lectures wheresoever delivered; section 2 prohibits, under certain penalties, the publication of any lecture in any newspaper without the licence of the author; section 3 provides that no person allowed for fee or reward or otherwise to be present at a lecture delivered in any place shall be deemed to have leave to print or copy or publish such lecture. The Bill, as introduced in this House, seems to have passed without debate, but in the Commons it met with considerable opposition, on the broad ground that if it was intended to shield public lectures from public inspection it ought not to receive the sanction of Parliament. In the course of the discussion attention was specially directed to Abernethy v. Hutchinson, which was probably misunderstood. It ended in a compromise, by which words were added at the end of clause 5 providing that the Act should not extend "to any lecture delivered in any university or public school or college, or on any public foundation, or by any individual in virtue of, or according to any gift, endowment, or foundation, and that the law relating thereto shall remain the same as if this Act had not been passed."

In Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burr. p. 2332, it is reported that Mr. Murphy, counsel for the defendant, strongly contended, from the amendments made in the Commons on the statute of 8 Anne and from the change of title, that Parliament intended to take away or to declare that there was no property at the common law; but to this Willes, J., answered, that "The sense and meaning of an Act must be collected from what it says when passed into law, and not from the history of the changes it underwent in the House where it took its rise. The history is not known to the other House or the Sovereign." The rule so aptly expressed has always been enforced in this House. But, strangely enough, Willes, J., does shortly afterwards, in the same judgment, seem to offend against his own rule. He uses language which I quote as not inapplicable to the statute before us. His language is this:—"The preamble is infinitely stronger in the original Bill as it was brought into the House and referred to the Committee; but, to go into the history of the changes the Bill underwent in the House of Commons, it certainly went to the Committee as a Bill to secure the undoubted property of copies for ever. It is plain that objections arose in the Committee to the generality of the proposition which ended in securing the property of copies for a term, without prejudice to either side of the question upon the general proposition or to the right."

Now, looking at the 5 & 6 Will. 4, we may at least say that objection was taken in the Commons to the generality of the proposed measure, and the proviso was there added at the end of the fifth clause. The statute seems at once, in its first clause, to recognise the property of the lecturer in his lecture, and to confer on him the sole right and liberty of printing and publishing such lecture, even though he may have delivered the same under such a state of circumstances as would have otherwise amounted to an abandonment of his words and thoughts to the public. "Leave of the author," and "consent of the author," would probably be interpreted as meaning express leave or consent, such as would confer a title on the licensee; and section 4 seems to support that view. There is difficulty of construction in every part of this short statute, but especially in section 5. I am unable to read the concluding proviso of section 5 save as indicating a statutable declaration that lectures delivered in a university, which is necessarily a public institution, become thereby public property for the purposes of publication and public criticism. As to the concluding sentence, "that the law relating thereto shall remain the same as if this Act had not passed," the words seem to me to have no real force. The reservation is of such common law right, if any, as existed before the Act. The statute does not interfere with or abridge any common law right, but leaves it as it was. In my judgment, the only common law right the university lecturer has is a right of property in his lecture when composed, and before its public delivery in the university. There seems to have been no decision whatever on the subject of lectures delivered in a public university prior to the passing of that Act. I am unable to accept Abernethy v. Hutchinson as final or satisfactory, or the propositions, if any, which it is supposed to decide. It arose on motion only, supported by the affidavit of the plaintiff; there was never a plenary hearing of the cause. Lord Eldon treats as a pure question of law, which he would not decide, "property in sentiments or language not deposited on paper." He then goes into implied contract, or breach of trust, which is wholly inapplicable to the case before us; and it is observable that his strictures are principally, if not wholly, directed against printing for profit. He adopts, in substance, the proposition of Aston, J., in Millar v. Taylor, that "he has no right to publish for profit the identical work." On the first hearing of the motion Lord Eldon refused the injunction, but gave leave to renew it "on the ground of breach of contract or breach of trust." The Bill having been amended, and the amendment having been supported by affidavit, the motion was renewed on the ground of "contract" only, and Lord Eldon's decision of the motion is expressed in these words: "He was clearly of opinion that, whatever else might be done with it, the lecture could not be published for profit." That is the whole decision of Lord Eldon.

Lord Eldon makes a passing observation (which has already been alluded to by my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson)), which requires attention. He says: "Nor can I conceive on what ground Sir William Blackstone had the copyright in his lectures for twenty years, if there had been such a right as that. We used to take notes at his lectures; at Sir Robert Chambers' lectures also the students used to take notes; but it was never understood that those lectures could be published." These observations of Lord Eldon are rather of a negative character, and are somewhat loose, but are undoubtedly valuable as showing that Lord Eldon had in his mind the case of the university professor. But what do they amount to? I am at this moment unaware whether Sir William Blackstone's lectures were ever published as lectures, or that anyone asserted a right to do so, or was prevented from doing so. When Lord Eldon speaks of Blackstone's copyright for twenty years he is obviously referring, not to his lectures as such, but to Blackstone's Commentaries. The commentaries, which were founded on lectures, revised, corrected, and enlarged with notes, were first published in 1765. Nine editions were published in the lifetime of Sir William Blackstone, all revised and added to by the learned author. He prepared also a tenth edition which was not published till after his death in 1780. He had an undoubted copyright in "The Commentaries" under the statute of Anne.

Finding a statement in the House of Commons on the Bill of 1835, that the Abernethy suit had been abandoned, your lordships made more inquiry, with the result that it was discovered that the injunction had been dissolved, but under what circumstances we have been unable to ascertain. I cannot think that Abernethy v. Hutchinson is entitled to the great weight that has been attributed to it, and it seems to me to state no principle which ought to guide us in the present case. The public lecturer at a university has no authority of his own to impose conditions on his pupils or those entitled to attend his lectures; nor can it be truly said that he can create a trust in his own favour. It is not necessary to consider what the university might do in the exercise of its plenary powers "for the advancement of religion and learning, and improving and regulating the course of study therein."

In the legal view which I have adopted, it is not necessary for me to consider the weighty authorities to which we have been referred, some of them rather obscured by the extreme length of the judicial reasons. My opinion is that a public lecture, delivered publicly at a university by one of its professors in the performance of the public duty he has undertaken, becomes by the act of delivery published to the nation, and may be likened to a gift from the university or the professor to the nation.

In the course which the case is now about to take my opinion becomes worthless. I am bound to assume that I am wrong in point of law. Your lordships' judgment settles the law finally, and in yielding a willing obedience I have at least the palliation for mistake in law, that I have erred in company with the Lord President, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and four other able and eminent Scotch judges.

I have only to add that, on looking at the debate in the House of Commons, I find it stated there by a person who had, or at least ought to have had, the most full and accurate knowledge on the subject—namely, the late Mr. Wakley, who was a member for Finsbury, and was one of the editors of the Lancet, against which paper the Abernethy case had been instituted, that the suit had been abandoned by the professor in consequence of its being been found that he held the position of a public professor.

SOPER v. ARNOLD. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Acceptance of title—Failure of purchaser to complete—Rescission by vendor—Resale—Objection to title by second purchaser decided to be valid—Action by first purchaser for return of deposit.

In November, 1882, the plaintiff agreed to purchase land from the defendants, subject to a condition that, if he failed to complete the purchase, the defendants might forfeit the deposit and put the land up for resale. The plaintiff accepted the title, but failed to complete, owing to want of means. In June, 1885, the defendants agreed to sell the land to F. S., who took an objection to the title, which was brought before the court upon a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874. In January, 1886, an order was made on the summons declaring that the vendors had not shown a good title to the land. In July, 1886, the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover the deposit paid in November, 1882.

Held, that he could not succeed.

Hart v. Swaine, 26 W. R. 30, 7 Ch. D. 42, commented upon.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 35 W. R. 451, 35 Ch. D. 384), affirmed.

Appeal, in formâ pauperis, from a decision of Kekewich, J., reported 35 W. R. 451, 35 Ch. D. 384.

By an agreement dated the 4th of November, 1882, and made between the defendants, Arnold and Patten, of the one part, and the plaintiff, Soper, of the other part, the defendants agreed to sell to the plaintiff certain freehold property at Teignmouth for the sum of £6,100, of which sum £610 was to be paid on signing the agreement and the remainder on the completion of the sale.

The agreement contained the usual condition providing that if the purchaser should fail to comply with the conditions of sale his deposit should be forfeited to the vendors, who should be at liberty to resell the property.

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pursuant to the agreement, the plaintiff deposited £610 with the defendants, and the defendants delivered an abstract of the title to the plaintiff, which was approved by the plaintiff's then solicitor.

The plaintiff, however, was unable to find the balance of the purchase-money when the time arrived for completion, and the defendants thereupon rescinded the agreement and retained the deposit as forfeited.

In June, 1885, the defendants agreed to sell the property to F. Slocombe, who took an objection to the title on the ground that a power of sale, under which the land had been purported to be sold to the defendants, did not really exist. This objection was brought before the court upon a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, and by an order of Chitty, J., on the 28th of January, 1886, it was declared that Slocombe's requisitions and objections in respect of the title had not been sufficiently answered, and that a good title to the hereditaments had not been shown.

As soon as the plaintiff heard of this order he demanded repayment from the defendants of his deposit, with interest at the rate of £4 per cent., on the ground that the agreement of the 4th of November, 1882, had been entered into under a mutual mistake of fact; and that inasmuch as the defendants had no title to the hereditaments there had been a total failure of consideration.

On the 7th of July, 1886, the plaintiff commenced the present action, which was dismissed with costs by Kekewich, J., on the 15th of March.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. M. Rigg, for the appellant—At the time of entering into the contract the defendants had no title, and there was nothing therefore to bind the plaintiff to pay the balance of the purchase-money. Want v. Stallibrass, 21 W. R. 685, L. R. 8 Ex. 175, is not distinguishable from the present case. There was a mutual mistake as to the defendants' title, and under those circumstances the purchaser could not have been called upon to complete: Cooper v. Phibbs, 15 W. R. 1049, L. R. 2 H. L. 149; Jones v. Clifford, 24 W. R. 979, 3 Ch. D. 779. The result of the cases from Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. sen. 126, is that if a purchaser who has paid his purchase-money subsequently discovers that the vendor has no title to the property sold by him, he can recover his purchase-money. That rule applies to the present case. [LINDLEY, L.J.—How do you distinguish this case from Howe v. Smith, 32 W. R. 802, 27 Ch. D. 89?] There was no suggestion in that case that the title was bad. As a matter of substantial justice, the defendants are in possession of money to which they have no title, and which they have no equitable right to retain.

He also referred to Hart v. Swaine, 26 W. R. 30, 7 Ch. D. 42; Torrance v. Bolton, 21 W. R. 134, L. R. 8 Ch. 118; Ex parte Barrell, In re Parnell, 23 W. R. 846, L. R. 10 Ch. 512.

Barber, Q.C., Vernon R. Smith, and R. Kemp, for the respondents, were not called upon.

COTTON, L.J.—This appeal before us has been very well and ably argued, but in my opinion the judgment of Kekewich, J., was right. We must consider what the facts of the case are. [His lordship stated them, and continued:—] The question is not one which would arise if the contract were still in fieri—that is to say, if the vendors and the purchaser were still dealing with one another, and either the vendors or the purchaser were insisting on specific performance. But the defendants, the vendors, have rescinded the contract, and have claimed to retain the deposit in consequence of the default of the plaintiff, the purchaser.

Under those circumstances the purchaser is in the position of a man who has repudiated his contract. It is true if he had known the facts he would have taken a different ground, and not have said, "I will accept the purchase, and am ready to complete and take a conveyance"; but he would have said, "No, you cannot enforce specific performance, and on the ground of the absence of title I will not complete," and if on that ground the contract could not have been enforced against him he would have stood in a different position. But to enable him to recover the deposit now would be to enable him to take advantage of his own default in not providing the balance of the purchase-money when he had accepted the title and had expressed himself satisfied with the title as shown. That acceptance of title undoubtedly was the mistake of those who advised him. We must assume that the decision of Chitty, J., was correct, and that the vendors had not a good title. How can the purchaser get his deposit back again?

It is said that the decision in Want v. Stallibrass is in his favour, but there the question was entirely different from the question in the present case. There the alleged default of the purchaser was in not delivering his objections, and the vendor said, "You have not delivered your objections, and therefore you cannot take an objection to the title at all." The vendor said, "Not only can you not take the objection, but it is a bad one." That was the matter on which they came to an issue, and there never had been repudiation by the vendor of the contract. Both parties were unwilling to move, the vendor because he was not quite certain of the title and the purchaser because he was not certain of his position. Under those circumstances the case came before the court as on a contract in fieri, and the decision was that there was no default on the part of the purchaser within the meaning of the conditions of sale, as properly construed, and therefore the case must be treated independently of those conditions and independently of the stipulation that, in the event of the contract not being a breach of the conditions, the vendor should be at liberty to retain the deposit. Then it comes to this: There is a man who has no stipulations on which he can rely giving him by contract a right to retain the deposit. The contract goes off, not from any default of the purchaser, but from the default of the vendor, who has not a good title. Therefore, in my opinion, the purchaser is entitled to claim the deposit. Then it is said that, even independently of that, if there had been a completion by conveyance of the estate to the plaintiff and he had afterwards discovered this, he ought to get the money back again. Cases were quoted to show that the ignorance of law would not excuse him, and that the maxim, Ignorantia juris quod quisque tenetur scire neminem excusat, did not apply to a case like the present. Assume that. Where is there any authority that after the conveyance and the money paid the purchaser who has taken the conveyance and accepted the title, because he afterwards finds out in consequence of his being ejected that the title is a bad one, can recover the purchase-money? In my opinion that is not the law. What is the use of covenants for title if, wherever any defect is found out and the purchaser who has taken the conveyance is ejected, he could come to the vendor and say, "Take back the estate for what it is worth, and give me back my money." Some cases were referred to, and, among others, one, before Fry, L.J., of Hart v. Swaine. I do not think that case of Jones v. Clifford has any bearing upon the question. The question there was simply how far, when the contract was in fieri, the vendor was at liberty to correct a mistake he made in stating that he was selling leasehold when he was selling freehold—that is, how far the purchaser was entitled to correct the mistake he made in accepting the title under a misapprehension. Hart v. Swaine, it is said, supports the view that, even if there had been a conveyance and the title was a bad one, the money could be got back again. In my opinion that is not the decision. The judge there decided that there had been a misapprehension amounting to legal fraud and to deceit, and considered that the proper remedy was to give back the purchaser his money and let the vendor get back his estate. Whether that was right or wrong may have to be considered hereafter, and whether or not the authorities justified the learned judge in coming to that conclusion I have not had time to consider. It did not amount to a general proposition of law that, where, in the absence of any deceit, the title turns out to be bad after conveyance, the purchaser is entitled to say to the vendor, "Give me back my money and take back your estate." I think that is not the general law, and I am fortified in that view by what was said by Lord Selborne in Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas., at p. 937, where there occurs this passage: "When the conveyance takes place, it is not, as far as I know, in either country the principle of equity that relief should afterwards be given against that conveyance, unless there be a case of fraud, or a case of misrepresentation amounting to fraud, by which the purchaser may have been deceived." In my opinion, therefore, the judgment of Kekewich, J., was right, and we must dismiss the appeal, but not with costs, because it is in formâ pauperis.

SIR JAMES HANNEN.—I am of the same opinion. The learned counsel by whom this case has been very well argued put it on a ground which, if he could have substantiated it, would have supported his contention—namely, that the circumstances were such as to make it inequitable on the part of the defendants to retain this money, but it appears to me to be absolutely clear it is not so. There was no misrepresentation, no concealment of any fact, but the facts which were disclosed satisfied the advisers of the plaintiff at that time, and the title was approved of.

There was no common mistake of facts going to the very root of the contract, as in some of the cases which have been referred to. It was a mistake of opinion as to the validity of the title—a mistake which I suppose occurs in innumerable cases. Under the influence of that mistake of opinion the advisers of the plaintiff accepted the title, notwithstanding his inability to pay the money in fulfilment of the contract. That inability to pay was the cause of the repudiation of the contract which the defendants were justified in acting upon, and they accordingly rescinded the contract. That being the state of things, it appears to me it would be highly inequitable that because somebody else discovers years afterwards that the opinion relied upon at the time was erroneous the defendants should be bound to return this money. Therefore I think the judgment of Kekewich, J., was right.

LOPES, L.J.—The facts, to my mind, conclude this case. They are plainly set out in the statement of claim, and it there appears that an abstract was duly delivered, such abstract disclosing the title truly. The plaintiff's solicitor approved of the title, and then, when the time arrived for the payment of the purchase-money, the purchaser was either unable or unwilling to find the money. In point of fact he did not find it. About these facts there can be no doubt. It therefore appears that this purchase went off on the ground of the inability or the unwillingness of the purchaser to pay the purchase-money.

Notice was then given by the vendors to rescind. There is a rescission, and the whole matter is then and there at an end. Years go by, and when the vendors sell the property, or endeavour to sell it, to somebody else, it is discovered that there is this defect in the title. That comes to the knowledge of the present plaintiff, and he then brings this action in order to recover his deposit. Can he do so? I am clearly of opinion he cannot. It would be enabling him to take advantage of that which, in point of fact, was his own default. It would be inequitable to allow such a state of things to prevail. I do not propose to deal with the cases which have been so fully dealt with by Cotton, L.J., every one of which is distinguishable from the present case.

BOSWELL v. COAKS. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Severance of defendants—Discretion of the taxing master—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 29.

The House of Lords, on dismissing an appeal, directed that the plaintiffs should pay the defendants' costs in all three courts, and that in taxing the costs in the High Court and in the Court of Appeal the taxing master should consider whether any of the defendants who had appeared separately had any sufficient reason for severing in their defences, and if, and in so far as, it should appear that they had not, the taxing master was to allow only one set of costs, as he should think right.

The taxing master allowed each of the defendants separate costs.

Held, that the House of Lords had delegated to the taxing master the duty of deciding whether the defendants were entitled to separate costs, and that, as it had not been shown either that he had not exercised his discretion at all, or that he had done so on a wrong principle, an appeal from his decision could not be entertained.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of North, J.

The action was brought to set aside the sale of a life interest on the ground that it had been made under an order of the court to two persons, one of whom was in a fiduciary position to the trust estate, and that a proper disclosure of the facts had not been made. Fry, L.J., dismissed the action with costs, 31 W. R. 540, 23 Ch. D. 267, where the facts are fully stated. This decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, 33 W. R. 376, 27 Ch. D. 424, but was subsequently restored by the House of Lords, 11 App. Cas. 232, 34 W. R. Dig. 211. The House of Lords directed that the plaintiffs should pay the defendants' costs in all three courts, and that in taxing the costs in the High Court of Justice and in the Court of Appeal (in which the defendants had appeared separately, though they all appeared together in the House of Lords) the taxing master should consider "whether any of the defendants who appeared separately had any sufficient reason for severing in their defences, and if, and in so far as, it shall appear that they had not, then the said taxing master shall allow only one set of costs, or only as many sets of costs as he shall think right."

The taxing master allowed each of the defendants separate costs.

The plaintiffs objected to the allowance of more than one set of costs to certain of the defendants who were not personally charged with fraud, and they took out a summons to review the taxation.

North, J., held that under the order of the House of Lords, as well as under the Rules of Court, the taxing master had a discretion in the matter, which he had exercised, and that his decision was final.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Cookson, Q.C., and Langley, for the appellants.—The taxing master was wrong in allowing separate costs to those of the defendants who were not personally charged with fraud. They ought to have appeared together. The taxing master has given a wrong reason for his decision, which is therefore appealable.

They referred to In re Martin, 30 W. R. 527, 20 Ch. D. 365; Van Sandau v. Moore, 1 Russ. 441.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and E. Beaumont; Phipson Beale; Haldane; Chadwyck Healey, for the respective defendants, were not called upon.

COTTON, L.J.—In my opinion the decision of North, J., was right. This is not an ordinary case. After the appeal had been disposed of by the House of Lords a special application as to costs was made to the Appeal Committee. The Appeal Committee declined to decide it, and said in substance, "The question depends on details which are not before us, we will not decide it, we will delegate the decision of it to the taxing master." An order was accordingly made that in taxing the costs below the taxing master should consider whether any of the defendants who appeared separately had sufficient reason for severing in their defences, and if, and in so far as, it should appear that they had not, then the taxing master should allow only one set of costs, or only as many sets of costs as he should think right. There is, therefore, no appeal, unless the taxing master has failed to exercise his discretion at all. This case differs from a case where, though an order is appealable, the Court of Appeal will not generally interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the judge in the court below unless he has gone on a wrong principle. In the case cited the order was appealable, and, as the judge had exercised his discretion on a wrong principle, the appeal was entertained. In the present case there is no appeal, unless the taxing master has not exercised his discretion at all. The taxing master was not bound to say as much as he has done, but what he says does not give any ground for saying that he has not exercised his discretion. The appeal, therefore, fails.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 2.—The judgment of the court was read by

A. L. SMITH, J.—In this case a rule nisi for a habeas corpus was obtained to show cause why the Rev. James Bell Cox should not be discharged from custody. The rule came on for argument before the Lord Chief Justice and myself on May 20 last, when we made the rule absolute for the release of Mr. Cox, but took time to put our reasons for so doing into writing.

The facts of the case, so far as they are material, are as follows:—In the year 1885 proceedings were taken against the Rev. James Bell Cox for offences against ritual under the provisions of the Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86) by Mr. Hakes, of which offences Mr. Cox was found guilty. On September 5, 1885, a monition was served on Mr. Cox admonishing him to desist from the practices of which he had been found guilty, which monition Mr. Cox disobeyed. For this disobedience on June 13, 1886, Mr. Cox was suspended by Lord Penzance ab officio for the period of six months. The term would consequently expire on December 13, 1886. Whilst so suspended—viz., on June 20, 1886, Mr. Cox, in breach of such suspension, officiated in his church of St. Margaret's, Liverpool, and on July 30, 1886, he was adjudged by Lord Penzance to have so acted. On August 5, 1886, the disobedience of Mr. Cox to the order of suspension was duly signified to her Majesty in Chancery. Up to this date Mr. Cox had abstained from appearing in the suit, and had taken no part therein. Upon the same day upon which the significavit issued—viz., August 5, 1886, Mr. Cox obtained from the Queen's Bench Division a rule nisi for a prohibition calling upon Lord Penzance and Mr. Hakes to show cause why further proceedings in the suit should not be restrained. It is not here necessary to state the grounds upon which this rule nisi was obtained; suffice it to say the rule came on for argument on March 11, 1887, when it was discharged by the Queen's Bench Division with costs, which judgment was affirmed on appeal April 28, 1887.

On May 2, 1887, a writ de contumace capiendo was obtained by Mr. Hakes, and Mr. Cox was arrested and imprisoned in her Majesty's prison at Walton-on-the-Hill.

The question is whether, after the order of suspension ab officio for six months had expired, as it did on December 13, 1886, the writ de contumace capiendo could be lawfully issued, the order for the disobedience to which Mr. Cox had been signified being no longer in existence.

This depends upon the true construction of 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, for it was under this statute that the proceedings to imprison Mr. Cox were necessarily taken. The statute, by section 1, enacts as follows—viz.:—"That excommunication, together with all proceedings following thereupon, shall in all cases, save those in the Act specified"—the present is not one of them—"be discontinued, and that in all cases cognizable in the ecclesiastical courts (a.) when any person duly cited to appear in any ecclesiastical court shall neglect or refuse to appear; (b.) when any person required to comply with the lawful order of any such court shall neglect or refuse to pay obedience to such lawful order; (c.) when any person shall commit a contempt in the face of such court, no sentence of excommunication shall be given or pronounced (save in the particular cases therein specified), but instead thereof it shall be lawful to pronounce such person contumacious and in contempt, and within ten days to signify the same to his Majesty in Chancery, and thereupon a writ de contumace capiendo in the form to the Act annexed shall issue from the Court of Chancery, and that all rules and regulations not by the Act altered then by law applying to the writ de excommunicato capiendo shall extend and be applied to the writ de contumace capiendo, and that (a.) upon the due appearance of the party so cited and not having appeared; (b.) upon the obedience of the party so cited and not having obeyed; (c.) upon the due submission of the party so having committed a contempt in the face of the court, the judge of the court shall pronounce such party absolved from the contumacy and contempt aforesaid, and shall forthwith make an order upon the sheriff for his discharge in the form to the Act annexed."

This is the statute, what does it mean? The words of the first section appear to us unambiguous. They are as follows:—(a.) When the party who has neglected to appear appears; (b.) when the party who has disobeyed an order obeys; (c.) when the party who has committed a contempt in the face of the court submits, then he shall be entitled to his discharge.

But it was said by Mr. Jeune, on behalf of Mr. Hakes, that, in addition to appearing, obeying, or submitting, as the case may be, the party imprisoned is not to be discharged until he has made amends for the contempt of which he has been adjudged guilty, or, in other words, until he has done something in addition to the appearing, obeying, or submitting, as prescribed by the statute. He argued that the statute enacted punishment for past offences committed, and that until such offence had been purged by contrition for the past, as well as by promise to obey in the future, the party was not entitled to his discharge.

In our judgment this is not the meaning of the statute. Take the first case—viz., appearing when he had previously neglected or refused to appear. What the statute enacts is, that upon appearance he shall be entitled to be discharged. Why is he to do more? The statute does not say so; it says nothing about purging past offences. Take the second case—obedience to a lawful order after having neglected or refused to obey. Again we ask, Why is he to do more than what the statute says he is to do to entitle him to his discharge? As to the third case—viz., contempt in the face of the court—in this instance the statute does re-enact that the party is to submit; but it should be noticed that in neither of the other cases is submission, in any shape or form, required. It is solely appearance in the one case, and obedience in the other. The words used in 5 Eliz. c. 23, s. 10—viz., "submission and satisfaction"—are nowhere used in the Act of Geo. 3 excepting the word "submit" as applying to the contempt in the face of the court.

In our judgment Mr. Charles, on behalf of Mr. Cox, put the right construction upon the statute when he insisted that the object and provisions of section 1 of the statute were to enforce and compel obedience in the future to the proceedings and orders of the court, and not to punish for past acts, which when once done could never be undone. Punishments are attained by sections 2 and 3 of the Act, but these sections have no application to the present case. Assume a suit and all proceedings thereunder, in which a party had neglected or refused to appear, to have terminated, and the party imprisoned for not having appeared. How is he to get out of prison? Ex hypothesi, he cannot appear. There is nothing left to appear to. Then how is he to get his discharge? He could not, unless it were held, as we hold, that when the suit had terminated any imprisonment thereunder also terminated. The same observations apply with equal force when no order any longer exists which a party in prison can by any possibility obey. In our judgment the true construction of the statute is that, as soon as no suit exists to which a party can appear, or no order exists which he can obey, the party is entitled to his discharge, for from that moment the object of the statute in imprisoning—viz., to compel obedience in the future—has come to an end, and from that time the party imprisoned is entitled to his discharge. It follows from this that, inasmuch as no imprisonment can continue after the order for disobedience to which a party has been signified has come to an end, so also can no order by way of imprisonment take place after such an order has come to an end.

Apart from the cases, that is, in our judgment, the true reading of the statute. But what do the cases say? The first to which we will refer is Reg. v. Thorogood, 12 Ad. & E. 183, where it was held by the full Court of Queen's Bench, that under the statute (53 Geo. 3, c. 127) imprisonment was not inflicted by way of penalty, but merely for enforcing execution of the sentence pronounced by the court. The court also stated that the decisions on the Act of Elizabeth threw little light upon the Act of Geo. 3, but that its own language was clear. In this we entirely agree. In Hudson v. Tooth, 2 P. D. 125, 25 W. R. Dig. 107, Lord Penzance lays down the purposes for which an inhibition is granted. That learned judge there states that it is granted not to punish the clerk for the past, but to enforce obedience for the future. "It was," said Lord Penzance, "in the clerk's power at any moment after his arrest to regain his liberty, and not only that, but to get rid of the inhibition and be restored to the exercise of his duties, if he were willing to undertake to discontinue the practices complained of." We now come to the case of Dean v. Green, 8 P. D. 79, which Mr. Jeune for Mr. Hakes, had to admit was strongly in point and adverse to his contention, but he urged that the judgment of Lord Penzance therein was inconsistent with the judgment of Dr. Lushington in Baker v. Thorogood, 2 Curt. Eccl. 632, and he insisted that the latter case was to be preferred. In Dean v. Green Lord Penzance undoubtedly held, as it seems to us, that when the order suspending or inhibiting a clerk for disobedience to which he was imprisoned came to an end, then, inasmuch as there was no order extant which he could either obey or disobey, the clerk was entitled, under 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, to his discharge. In Baker v. Thorogood Dr. Lushington held that to entitle a person committed for contempt to be discharged, it was incumbent upon him to purge his contempt, and that this could only be done on payment of the costs incurred in consequence of his contempt, and on his taking the usual oath to submit to the lawfully commands of his ordinary. It must be noticed that the point now under discussion—viz., whether an imprisoned clerk is entitled to his discharge when the order which he has disobeyed, and for disobedience to which he is in custody, no longer exists, was not before Dr. Lushington, whereas it was directly before Lord Penzance, and in our opinion the judgment of Lord Penzance is in point, and gives the true construction of the statute, whereas the judgment of Dr. Lushington does not apply to the case in hand. As to the argument addressed to us upon the form of the schedules to the Act of Geo. 3, we have nothing to add to and adopt what was said by Lord Cottenham in the case of In re Baines, 1 Cr. & P. 31, and Lord Penzance in Dean v. Green.

In our judgment the order of suspension ab officio which Mr. Cox disobeyed, and for which he was signified, having expired on December 13, 1886, there was, on May 2, 1887, no order which he could possibly obey then existing, and consequently the writ de contumace capiendo was improperly issued upon that day.

For the reasons above given we are of opinion that the rule nisi for a habeas corpus must be made absolute.

Two other subsidiary points were taken for Mr. Cox. One was that the judgment of Lord Penzance on July 30, 1886, adjudicating Mr. Cox to have disobeyed the order of suspension on June 13, 1886, was invalid, by reason of such judgment being delivered by the mouth of his surrogate and not by Lord Penzance, present himself in person in the province of York. This point was dealt with and determined adversely to Mr. Cox in the proceedings by way of prohibition above mentioned, and was concluded thereby. The other point was that the writ de contumace was bad, because, although, upon its face, it was in order, it had upon its back a reference to the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, and it was said that this made the arrest of Mr. Cox illegal. This indorsement had been inadvertently placed upon the writ by the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine when he tested it. In the first place it must be pointed out that the warrant upon which Mr. Cox was taken into custody was in order. Mr. Cox was not entitled as of right to see the writ upon which the warrant issued at all, and, what is more, no statute required that any indorsement whatever should be upon the writ. In our judgment there is nothing technical or otherwise in the point, and it absolutely fails.

The rule for a habeas corpus, as we have before decided, must be made absolute. There will be no costs on any side.

Rule absolute.

The promoter appealed.

Nov. 17.—Sir Walter Phillimore (Beaufort with him), for Mr. Bell Cox, took the preliminary objection that no appeal would lie against a prisoner in the case of a habeas corpus.—Under the old procedure there was no appeal, but a prisoner was entitled to go from one judge to another, and if he found any judge who thought he was wrongly imprisoned he obtained his release. The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 19, gives an appeal in all cases not specially excepted, and it is admitted that a habeas corpus is not among the special exceptions, but the Judicature Act was never intended to affect a constitutional right. It is true that appeals by prisoners in such cases have been heard, but that is because, the courts being amalgamated, a prisoner can no longer go from one judge to another.

He cited Reg. v. Weil, 31 W. R. 60, 9 Q. B. D. 701; The Amstell, 26 W. R. 69, 2 P. D. 186.

The COURT decided to hear the appeal.

Jeune and Danckwerts, for the promoter.—The writ de contumace capiendo can be issued at any time, and is not limited to the time during which obedience could be paid. By 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, special methods are provided by which the prisoner may obtain his release. None of those are, however, applicable in this case, which is a case of disobedience, and in which obedience is now impossible. The Act, however, incorporates 5 Eliz. c. 23, by section 10 of which special reservation is made of the powers of release formerly possessed by the judges of ecclesiastical courts upon "submission and satisfaction": Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium, vol. ii., p. 62. The old practice is laid down in Baker v. Thorogood, 2 Curt. Eccl. 632.

They also cited Reg. v. Thorogood, 12 Ad. & E. 183; Hudson v. Tooth, 2 P. D. 125, 25 W. R. Dig. 107; Dean v. Green, 8 P. D. 79; In re Baines, 1 Cr. & P. 31; Ex parte Kaye, 1 B. & Ad. 562; R. v. Rodman, 3 Cro. Car. 198; Hole v. Scales, 2 Hagg. Eccl. 566.

Sir Walter Phillimore (Beaufort with him), for Mr. Bell Cox.—The object of the writ de contumace capiendo is to enforce obedience. Obedience is impossible to a non-existent order. Therefore, if Mr. Bell Cox is to be imprisoned under this writ, he can never obtain his release as he can never be obedient. The provisions of the statute of Elizabeth entirely related to excommunication, and cannot be incorporated in an Act which expressly abolishes that penalty. The power of release given in section 10 of the statute of Elizabeth was limited to the release of prisoners before the return of the writ de excommunicato capiendo. In Baker v. Thorogood the statement as to the old practice was not material to the decision.

Jeune replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the first point taken is that no appeal lies, and it was said that if an appeal does lie a person is deprived of constitutional privileges which he formerly had. It was said that prior to the Judicature Acts a man might move before every judge in turn for a writ of habeas corpus, and that if one of those judges was in his favour he must be released and there was no appeal. I think that the practice was to move before each of the common law courts in succession, and if they all refused recourse might be had to the Vice-Chancellors, who appear each to have been treated for this purpose as a separate court. The result was that there was an appeal in fact, though not in form, from one court to another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. Therefore I should have thought that in this case beyond all others there would be a right of appeal to the Court of Appeal so as to preserve a man from being kept under arrest on the decision of a single court, since the Judicature Acts, by amalgamating the courts, had made it impossible to go from one to the other. The words of section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, are precise: "The Court of Appeal shall have jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order, save as hereinafter mentioned, of her Majesty's High Court of Justice." The exceptions, it is admitted, do not include the case of a habeas corpus. It was also admitted that the prisoner has a right of appeal to this court, but it is urged that the party objecting to his release has none. The prisoner clearly has the right under this section, and equally clearly there is a similar right for the party objecting.

Then what is the appeal which we have to decide? It is suggested that this writ de contumace capiendo was issued without jurisdiction because it was issued after the time when the order of suspension became exhausted. That is on the ground that on the true construction of the Act of Geo. 3 there was no power to issue the writ. We have therefore to consider whether we agree with the construction put upon that Act by the Divisional Court. There is no doubt that the Act ought to be construed according to the natural and ordinary meaning of the words used in it. Now the recital of the Act runs thus: "Whereas it is expedient that excommunication, together with all proceedings following thereupon, should, saving in certain cases, be discontinued, and that other proceedings should be substituted in lieu thereof." The object, therefore, of the Act was to get rid of excommunication as a punishment. The first section, enacts that excommunication should in all cases be discontinued. "And that in all causes which, according to the laws of this realm, are cognizable in the ecclesiastical courts, when any person or persons having been duly cited to appear in any ecclesiastical court, or required to comply with the lawful orders or decrees, as well final as interlocutory, of any such court, shall neglect or refuse to appear, or neglect or refuse to pay obedience to such lawful orders or decrees, or when any person or persons shall commit a contempt in the face of such court, no sentence of excommunication shall be given or pronounced, but instead thereof it shall be lawful for the judges or judge who issued out the citation, or whose lawful orders or decrees have not been obeyed, or before whom such contempt in the face of the court shall have been committed, to pronounce such person contumacious and in contempt." That is to say, that in place of the sentence of excommunication there is the pronunciation of contumacy, and thereupon a writ de contumace capiendo is to issue, which is to have the same force and effect as a writ de excommunicato capiendo, "and all rules and regulations not hereby altered now by law applying to the said writ (i.e., the writ de excommunicato capiendo) and the proceedings following thereupon, and particularly the several provisions contained in the Act passed in the fifth year of Queen Elizabeth, entitled an Act for the due execution of the writ de excommunicato capiendo, shall extend and be applied to the said writ de contumace capiendo and the proceedings following thereupon." Nothing, therefore, can be more plain than that the one writ is substituted for the other, and all that could be done on the old writ is to be done on the new writ. It is the most complete writing into this Act of all the provisions of the Act of Elizabeth applicable to the writ de excommunicato capiendo. It is therefore a necessary implication that all the provisions of the earlier statute which are applicable do apply to the writ de contumace capiendo. The section then imposes on sheriffs and the executive generally the duty of arresting and detaining a person under the writ, and it goes on: "And upon the due appearance of the party so cited, and not having appeared as aforesaid, or the obedience of the party so cited, and not having obeyed as aforesaid, or the due submission of the party so having committed a contempt in the face of the court, the judges or judge of such ecclesiastical court shall pronounce such party absolved from the contumacy and contempt aforesaid," and shall forthwith make an order for his discharge. He is not, however, entitled to be let out without an order of the ecclesiastical court, and until he has discharged the costs of his custody

The result is, therefore, that when anything is done which under the old law would subject the doer to a sentence of excommunication, he is now to be pronounced contumacious, and if arrested under a writ de contumace capiendo he can obtain his discharge in any of the three ways mentioned. But in this case no one of those three ways was open to Mr. Bell Cox, and therefore he is left under the liability that that was to happen to him which would have happened to him if under the former procedure he had been excommunicated. To find what that liability was we must go to the statute of Elizabeth. That statute only deals with the executive. I incline to think there was nothing in it to affect the procedure of ecclesiastical courts; but ex majore cautelâ section 10 was introduced into it,

"Saving and reserving to all archbishops and bishops and all others having authority to certify any person excommunicated like authority to accept and receive the submission and satisfaction of the said person so excommunicated in manner and form heretofore used, and him to absolve and release." That is to be applied no longer to an excommunicated person, but to a person who has been pronounced contumacious. We are, therefore, driven to consider what was the old practice in the ecclesiastical courts. One of the chief uses of the case of Baker v. Thorogood is that it contains a statement by Dr. Lushington of the practice of the ecclesiastical courts. It is a statement made by him after a most careful and laborious examination of the subject. It has been said that that statement was not material, and was not necessary to the decision of the case. I do not think the authority of a great judge must be so treated. He thought it necessary for the decision of the case to state the practice of the courts, and as against that opinion I do not think it can be said that it was not really necessary. No doubt the case is not binding on us, but I think it is one of great value and authority. He states, then, the practice declared applicable by the statute of Elizabeth, and therefore applicable under the statute of Geo. 3. The writ de contumacs capiendo is to have precisely the same effect as excommunication, unless the party does one of the three things specified by the statute of Geo. 3. It has been urged that under certain circumstances it would be impossible for him to do such things, as, for instance, he could not obey in the present case when the time for obedience had passed. But the consequence of that is, in my opinion, that he cannot bring himself within any of those three methods of obtaining release, and, therefore, he must resort to the old method of doing so. Several statements of Lord Penzance on the subject of obedience have been cited to us. It is unnecessary to express any opinion on them, for if they are wrong an appeal lies to the Privy Council, and not here.

The Divisional Court decided this question on the construction of the statute of Geo. 3, and they said that the object of that Act was to compel obedience in the future and not to punish past acts. Do they mean that there is a rule of law that punishment is always for the purpose of compelling future obedience? That is true enough as a general principle. In the English law there is no punishment by way of revenge. Every sentence which the law compels judges to pass is passed to compel future obedience, but in the sense that it shows the person punished and the world at large that, if they commit similar offences, they will meet with similar punishment. I think, therefore, as a general proposition it is applicable only to this statute in the sense that it is applicable to all other statutes. I do not think it can alter the construction to be put upon the statute. There are no words in this statute declaring that its object is peculiar. Therefore I cannot agree in the construction given to the statute in the court below. That being so, I think the practice set out by Dr. Lushington in Baker v. Thorogood applies in this case. I think the statement of the practice there given was right, although, of course, that case is not binding on us. For these reasons, then, I think that the Divisional Court came to a wrong decision, and that the rule for a habeas corpus must be discharged. What the effect of our decision may be I am not concerned to say; but I will venture to express a hope that Mr. Bell Cox may be let alone unless he commits some fresh ecclesiastical offence.

BOWEN, L.J.—This case is one of great importance. In the first place, it is an appeal against a habeas corpus granted by the court below discharging the prisoner, and it has been suggested that no such appeal will lie. I do not think we desire here either to assume or reject jurisdiction, but I am clearly of opinion that there are no words in the Judicature Acts to take this case out of the ordinary rule, and, therefore, I think that an appeal will lie. The decision of the court below was on a pure matter of law, which we are bound to discuss. It was said that if we allowed the appeal to be argued the Judicature Act would be unfavourable to the liberty of the subject. I think that, as appeals against the discharge of a prisoner are far more rare than appeals by a prisoner, the view we take really gives the prisoner an additional advantage. What, then, is the main question in this case? Had Mr. Bell Cox a right to be discharged from prison if he had been arrested at the conclusion of the period of suspension? I wish emphatically to draw attention to the fact that two views may be taken of the statutes which enable offending clerks to be imprisoned. There is the view of the Ecclesiastical Court. It may be that the judges of that court may use their powers principally for the purpose of compelling future obedience. It may be that they have discretion to regard their powers in that light. But when a person comes to the common law courts and demands his discharge from the imprisonment as of right, the view taken by the courts of common law has to be considered, and we have to consider what are the rights of the prisoner to claim his discharge. It is no longer a question whether, if he had gone to Lord Penzance and asked for discharge, he might or might not have obtained it. What, then, is the effect of the statute of Geo. 3, under which this writ was issued? It was intended to alter the old law as to the use in a summary manner of excommunication as a punishment for contumacy.

Section 1, which is the real section we have to construe, divides into two parts, the first enabling the ecclesiastical courts to deal with an offender, and the second providing methods by which, in certain specified cases, an offender may be released. The fallacy of the argument for the respondent has been in assuming that these two branches cover the same ground. Now, taking first the first part of the section, is there anything to show that the object of the statute is merely to compel future obedience, and not to punish for past acts? There is nothing, in my opinion, which so narrows its application and renders it inapplicable in the cases where a subsequent performance of the thing ordered cannot amount to obedience to the order of the court.

Then, as to the second part of the section, there are three cases specified in which a prisoner may obtain his release. He may appear where he has neglected or refused to appear, he may obey where he has neglected or refused to obey, and he may make due submission where he has been guilty of a contempt in the face of the court.

Now it is said that where a man has been guilty of either of the first two of these offences, either he must at any time be able to appear or to obey, or he must be shut up for the rest of his life because there is no other way of escape. I do not hesitate to say that a man cannot obey a complex order who has once disobeyed a part of it. He cannot cure his disobedience of part by his obedience of the rest. Such a man as that, then, could not obtain his discharge under the section. Are we, then, driven to the dreadful conclusion that such a man must remain in prison for ever? I think not. There is an alternative view of the statute, which is that the statute of Elizabeth and its provisions are read into the statute of George, and are to apply to imprisonment under the new writ. If that is so there is a way to obtain release, since by section 10 of the earlier statute the old method of release by submission and satisfaction is expressly provided. I think that view makes the whole section luminous. An ecclesiastical court may punish summarily for contumacy by means of the writ de contumacs capiendo. If the delinquent can still obey, let him do so, and he will obtain his discharge under the provisions of the Ac o Geo. 3. If, however, he cannot obey because he has already disobeyed part of the order, then he must come and submit, and he will obtain his discharge under the old practice.

It has been argued, however, that the old practice preserved by section 10 of the statute of Elizabeth only applied to cases where there might be submission between the return of the writ and excommunication. I think there is no justification for so confining the operation of the section. It was further said that the word "absolve" in that section was only applicable to excommunication, and that, therefore, to read that section into an Act expressly abolishing excommunication would be inconsistent. I do not think that is so. In incorporating a statute so much only is incorporated as is consistent, and if part of the incorporated statute has become useless it is dropped. It was also urged that sections 2 and 3 of the Act of Geo. 3 were strong reasons for supposing that the view of section 1 which was contended for was correct. I content myself with saying that I can conceive many cases in which sections 2 and 3 would receive ample application without putting such a construction on section 1. I think that the form of the writ de contumace capiendo is conclusive neither one way nor the other.

I have formed a strong view that the statute only becomes intelligible by reading in section 10 of the statute of Elizabeth, and, so far from the only object of the statute being to enforce future obedience, I think that it was not intended to fetter the Ecclesiastical Court by any limitations. The court below has taken a different view of the statute. They say that its object was to compel future obedience only. I should hesitate to believe that it was intended by section 1 that a man might have the prison doors fly open directly his period of suspension was over.

But we are bound to respect the authorities on which the court below have decided this case. I confess that I do see running through the judgments of Lord Penzance and other ecclesiastical judges a train of thought to the effect that they are using their power to enforce obedience, and that they would be glad to put an end to the interference with the liberty of the subject as soon as that object has been attained or when it can be no longer attained. That is the way in which ecclesiastical judges treat in their own forum their powers of correction and discipline. But it is a very different thing to say that outside the ecclesiastical court the disobedient person must be treated as of right in the same way in which he is treated in that court by the consideration of the judge. The court below say that it was decided in Reg. v. Thorogood that imprisonment was not by way of penalty. I do not find such to be the effect of that case. All that was decided in that case was that imprisonment was not a pain and forfeiture within the statute of Elizabeth, but was merely the result of the writ itself, and was for the purpose of carrying out its object. It is wresting language, I think, to say that that case decides that imprisonment under the statute of Geo. 3 was only for the purpose of enforcing future obedience. The next case cited was Hudson v. Tooth. With very great respect, I think that my learned brothers in the court below have missed the effect of that case. Lord Penzance was there speaking of the case in which a delinquent clerk might come to the court and ask to be released with a promise of future obedience. A promise to obey is not obedience. Can it be so held as a matter of law? That a judge may treat it as such I have agreed. It cannot mean that a man may get out as a matter of right upon a promise to obey. Dean v. Green was not, I think, precisely in point. The time there had gone by, and the judge might think that enough had been done to justify him in treating that as ecclesiastical obedience; but it falls far short of showing a common law right outside the ecclesiastical courts to have it so treated.

Then there was the case of Baker v. Thorogood. The defendant had refused to appear, and was committed to prison under a writ de contumace capiendo. His friends then got a special Act to deal with such cases, enabling the judge to let him out on payment of the costs and of a sum into court and of the costs of his custody and contempt. The case came on and the judge had to make up his mind what he would do, and to make use of the new Act if he could. The costs had all been paid into court by some outside friend, and it must be taken that the judge knew that the suit was practically at an end, and that there was no question of the defendant's appearing. He treated it, therefore, as though it were necessary to consider in what way the new Act altered the old practice. The case did not fall within the statute of Geo. 3, and therefore he had not to consider its provisions for release. He had to consider what was the old practice to which those provisions did not apply. He says that the old practice was that the party should purge his contempt by an oath of submission and by payment of the costs. He must be there referring to the old system preserved by section 10 of the statute of Elizabeth. It is impossible to contend that Dr. Lushington did not know the practice of his own court. The case therefore gives the true construction of the statute, and is in point as an authority to which we ought to give weight. I regret that we should come to a decision which is adverse to the liberty of the subject and also that we should construe the statute in an opposite view to that taken by the accomplished lawyers in the court below, but we have simply to construe the words of the statute, and on my view I think that the decision of the court below was wrong, and must be reversed.

FRY, L.J.—I agree, and I wish that I need only express my concurrence, but the importance of the case requires that I should give my reasons. Two points have been urged before us—first, that we have no jurisdiction to hear this appeal. Section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, has given this court jurisdiction in all cases of orders and judgments of the court below, except as therein mentioned. The only inquiry, therefore, is whether a habeas corpus is within the exceptions. It is admitted that it is not. I do not think we can listen to any arguments ab inconvenienti, and therefore, I am of opinion that we are bound to entertain the appeal. That being so, we come to the main question. The writ in this case followed the form given in the statute of Geo. 3:—"We command you that you attach the said James Bell Cox by his body until he shall have made satisfaction for the said contempt." The argument that has been addressed to us is that if Mr. Bell Cox were taken during the six months for which he was suspended he would, at the expiration of that time, have been entitled to leave the prison without any further procedure whatever. Now has Mr. Bell Cox made satisfaction for his contempt? It is difficult to see how a gentleman who was in manifest contempt and who has not shown any subsequent obedience can say that he has been obedient to the suspension and has made satisfaction. If he has not made satisfaction then we have to see whether there is any ground, either at common law or by statute, on which he can be entitled to release at some other period than that specified in the writ. Before passing on I desire to say that the expression "making satisfaction" is of well-ascertained significance in ecclesiastical law, and that this writ was manifestly moulded on the old writ de excommunicato capiendo, which required the sheriff to hold the person excommunicated donec sanctæ ecclesiæ tam de contemptu quam de injuriâ eo illatâ ab eo fuerit satisfactum. Both writs, then, require the sheriff to hold the prisoner till satisfaction shall have been made. Mr. Bell Cox has made no satisfaction. What, then, is the operation of the statute of Geo. 3. The contention for the respondents is that that statute points out all the modes in which satisfaction can be made. I think that it applies to the new writ all the powers of the statute of Elizabeth with regard to the old writ mutatis mutandis. The three cases for absolution appear at first sight to correspond with the three cases in which the old writ was abolished. But are they really commensurate? I think not. Suppose a party cited to appear, after the suit has ended and the final decree has been pronounced it is plain that no "due appearance" can be made. Therefore, if the contumacious person refused to appear until after appearance was impossible, it would be impossible, on such a construction of the statute, for him ever to obtain his release. So, also, as to obedience; it is impossible not to see that there are three kinds of obedience:—

(1) Doing a particular act without any particular time being specified.

(2) Doing a particular act within a specified time.

(3) Refraining from doing a particular act within a specified time.

Disobedience in the first of these cases might be cured by the statute of Geo. 3, but in the second there can be no obedience after the specified time has elapsed. The third is the present case. Now, supposing that there has been disobedience during a portion of the specified time, there can never be full obedience to the order. Sir Walter Phillimore says that, on the true meaning of the section, when the specified period has elapsed there can be no imprisonment. That is to say, the longer the contumacy the less the imprisonment, which is a reductio ad absurdum. I think, therefore, that the statute only applies to certain cases of disobedience, otherwise a contumacious person must be imprisoned under circumstances under which he can never escape. Now the statute of Elizabeth saves certain provisions for release. I conclude, therefore, that other cases are left under the statute of Geo. 3, in which satisfaction must be made under the old practice, nor can I help observing that this construction is borne out by the form of the writ, which applies to general satisfaction, and is not framed so as to apply to satisfaction under the statute only. I think that Baker v. Thorogood is of the greatest weight in support of this view. Dr. Lushington thought in that case that the only mode of release when the statute of George did not apply was under the earlier practice. It has been said that Dr. Lushington had forgotten the existence of the statute of Geo. 3. I do not think we can come to so violent a conclusion. Dr. Lushington had prepared an elaborate judgment, which he introduces by a statement of the law prior to the passing of Thorogood's Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 93). It appears to me that Thorogood had passed the stage for appearance, and therefore Dr. Lushington could not use the statute of Geo. 3. He treated the suit as having come to an end. The costs of the whole suit had been taxed, and therefore the suit was over. The registrar, a few days afterwards, paid the sum out of court "according to the event of the suit." Therefore Thorogood was outside the provisions for release given by the statute of Geo. 3, and the old law requiring submission and satisfaction applied. Except for 3 & 4 Vict. c. 93 Thorogood could not have obtained his release without making submission and satisfaction. The case is, I think, a strong authority for saying that Dr. Lushington thought the old practice was still in existence, and that it applied to every case which did not fall within the statute of Geo. 3. It is urged, however, that there are decisions conclusively establishing that the object of the writ is the enforcement of future obedience. I need only say as to those authorities that I agree with the view expressed by the Master of the Rolls and my brother Bowen.

For these reasons, therefore, I am unable to agree with the court below, and I think that this order must be discharged.

Appeal allowed.

Dec. 20.—The COURT having considered the question of costs, gave the appellant the costs of the appeal; but they stated, that although they had come to the conclusion that they had jurisdiction to deal with the costs in the court below, they declined, in the exercise of their discretion, to give these costs to the appellant.

Practice—Mortgage—Foreclosure—Mortgagee in possession—Claim for personal payment—Action or summons—Costs—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 55, r. 5a.

A mortgagee in possession brought an action for foreclosure, and asked on motion for judgment for (inter alia) an order for personal payment by the mortgagor of the amount due, but this part of the order was refused.

Held, that he was entitled to the costs of the action, and not simply to such costs as he would have received if he had proceeded by summons.

Short cause.

This case came on in the form of motion for judgment according to minutes which had been prepared, and a question arose as to whether the plaintiff was entitled to the costs of the action or only such costs as would have been incurred on an originating summons.

The plaintiff was a mortgagee for £1,500 and interest at five per cent., and he had been in possession of the mortgaged property since February, 1886. The statement of claim in the action, which was delivered on the 1st of November, 1887, asked for payment, accounts, sale, or foreclosure.

The minutes provided for judgment, for principal, interest, and costs, an account, a personal order for payment by the defendant, or, in default, foreclosure.

Micklem, for the plaintiff.

KAY, J.—You cannot have an order for payment of the money; you can only have the account. You are a mortgagee in possession, and you do not show what you might have received but for wilful default. I can give you an order for an account and the usual foreclosure judgment when the mortgagee is in possession, but no order for payment. For anything I know you might have received enough to pay off your whole debt and interest.

Chester, for the defendant.—Then the plaintiff must be taken to have abandoned his claim for an order for personal payment, and he should only be allowed the costs to which he would have been entitled if he had proceeded by summons: R. S. C., ord. 55, r. 5a; O'Kelly v. Culverhouse, W. N., 1887, p. 36, 31 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 269, Ann. Pr., p. 666.

KAY, J.—He has not abandoned his claim, he presses it on me and I refuse it. Can it be said that there is never again to be an action for foreclosure? Why do not you pay the money? I decline to make any such order as to costs, and the one I have indicated is the one I think right.

BARR v. HARDING. (a.)

Practice—Mortgage—Foreclosure—Receiver—Action or summons—Costs—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 55, r. 5a.

A mortgagee brought a foreclosure action, the facts being complicated, and the speedy appointment of a receiver being of importance. The receiver was duly appointed, and the defendant did not appear in the action.

Held, on motion for judgment, that the plaintiff was only entitled to such costs as he would have been entitled to if he had proceeded by summons.

Semble, that a receiver can be appointed on a summons under ord. 55, r. 5a.

Short cause.

On motion for judgment in this case the only question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to the costs of the action, or only to such costs as he would have obtained on a summons.

The plaintiff, a mortgagee, brought the action against the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor. The adjudication was on the 19th of October, 1887, and on the 18th of November the plaintiff, who had obtained leave to serve notice of motion with the writ, applied for and obtained the appointment of a receiver of the mortgaged property.

The defendant did not appear, and the plaintiff now asked for judgment for foreclosure.

Geare, for the plaintiff.—We were obliged to proceed by action in order to get a receiver: Gee v. Bell, 35 W. R. 805, 35 Ch. D. 160, Ann. Pr., p. 666. The facts were so complicated that a statement of claim was necessary, and, further, it was of great importance to avoid delay.

KAY, J.—I do not see why I should give any more costs than you would have got on a summons. I often appoint a receiver on a summons. The rule enables me to order delivery of possession, and surely that must include power to appoint a receiver. A statement of claim was not necessary, and I cannot accept these as reasons for adopting a more expensive mode of procedure. I make the usual foreclosure order, and I direct that the taxing master shall allow such costs only as the plaintiff would have been entitled to if he had proceeded by originating summons and no more.

In re ORMSTON.
GOLDRING v. LANCASTER. (a.)

Practice—Administration action—Idle and vexatious proceedings—Costs—Delay—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, rr. 1, 11.

An administration action was brought by a person whose only interest in the estate consisted of a share of the residue, which he had bought for £55. The writ was issued in 1882, judgment given for administration and accounts and inquiries ordered in 1883, and the certificate made in 1887, when it appeared that the action had been unnecessary and of no benefit to the estate.

Held, that the plaintiff must pay all the costs of the action incurred since ord. 65, r. 1, came into operation, and that the costs up to that time must be taxed, having regard to the delay which had occurred, with liberty for all parties to apply in respect of such costs.

Further consideration.

The action was begun on the 19th of April, 1882, by a person who had bought a share in the estate for a sum of £55, and the writ claimed that the trusts of the will of William Ormston, made on the 11th of February, 1879, might be carried into execution, and his real and personal estate administered by the court, and that all proper accounts and inquiries might be taken and made, and directions given.

A statement of claim was delivered on the 17th of June, 1882, and no allegation was made in it of any kind of misconduct on the part of the trustees, or in any matter relating to the estate. The widow of the testator, who by the will was tenant for life of all the real and personal estate, was still living, and the trusts of the will were, subject to her life interest, to divide the property equally between the testator's nephews and nieces, the sons and daughters of his brother Job Ormston and his sisters Mary Ormston and Margaret Clarke, equally, share and share alike.

There was no suggestion in the statement of claim that there was any doubt as to who were the persons entitled, subject to the life interest of the testator's widow.

On the 17th of March, 1883, the usual judgment for administration of the personal estate of the testator was pronounced, and it was ordered that the usual accounts and inquiries should be taken and made, including an account of the rents and profits, in which the plaintiff had no interest whatever.

No certificate was obtained until the 23rd of August, 1887, and the result showed a sum of £33 2s. 7d. due from the defendants, the executors; that the testator's debts and funeral expenses had been paid; the particulars of the estate; and the persons interested.

Renshaw, Q.C., and J. Stuart Colquhoun, for the plaintiff, now asked to have their costs allowed out of the estate.

They referred to In re McClellan, 33 W. R. 883, 29 Ch. D. 495; Farrow v. Austin, 30 W. R. 50, 18 Ch. D. 58; Croggan v. Allen, 31 W. R. 319, 22 Ch. D. 101; Bartlett v. Wood, 9 W. R. 817; Williams v. Jones, 34 Ch. D. 120, 35 W. R. Dig. 53, Ann. Pr., p. 757.

S. B. L. Druce, for the defendants.

KAY, J., stated the facts and continued:—I ask, What use is there in any of these inquiries? The estate cannot be divided now; the inquiries will go but a little way to enable the court to divide it when the time comes. Before the division takes place on the death of the tenant for life another inquiry must be made; there is no doubt, and never was any doubt, as to who were the persons interested.

Now, in this state of circumstances, what am I to do? The rule is stated by Lord Westbury in Bartlett v. Wood, 9 W. R., at p. 817, "that no costs ought to be given out of an estate except for those proceedings only that are in their origin directed, with some show of reason and a proper foundation, for the benefit of the estate, or which have in their result conduced to that benefit."

I ask, What benefit has resulted to the estate in this case? There are not the smallest grounds for supposing that any benefit could result, nor has it resulted, to the estate. I am asked to allow the costs out of the estate, and am told that one benefit has resulted to the estate—namely, the answers to the inquiries; but the answer to that is that at the present time there is no benefit to the estate nor to any human being. Then it is said that some of the investments mentioned in the first schedule are unauthorized by the investment clause in the will. But that was not the object of the action; there is not a hint that that was the object of the action in the pleadings; and since the action was begun there has been no application in chambers, nor has it been shown here that the investments were unauthorized and should be changed. The suit is an idle and vexatious proceeding, resulting in no benefit to any persons except the solicitors, and I refuse to allow the plaintiff the costs of the action out of the estate. The costs incurred since the present rule came into operation are in my discretion, and I order the plaintiff to pay all the costs of this action since ord. 65, r. 1, of the Rules of Court came into operation on the 24th of October, 1883; and I suppose that the costs of the other parties before that date, and the costs, charges, and expenses of the trustees, must come out of the estate. These must be taxed; and I direct the taxing master to have regard to ord. 65, r. 11, to see what costs (if any) have been made fruitless or have been occasioned by the delay; and when the allocatur of the taxing master is obtained the parties are to have liberty to apply to me in chambers with respect to the whole of these costs.

Republic of Peru v. Peruvian Guano Co. (a.)

Practice — Pleading — Embarrassing pleading — No reasonable cause of action—Foreign Government—Government de facto and de jure—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 25, rr. 1, 4.

A statement of claim in an action brought to set aside an agreement of compromise between the defendants and a foreign Government, which alleged that the defendants were in a fiduciary position, and had rendered false accounts and improperly withheld information, and that the agreement of compromise had not been confirmed or ratified by a de jure Government, was ordered to be struck out under ord. 25, r. 4, and the action was dismissed.

Applications under ord. 25, r. 4, must be tried on the allegations contained in the pleading, and other evidence is inadmissible.

Ord. 25, r. 4, is more favourable to the pleading objected to than the old procedure by demurrer.

Motion.

An action was instituted in October, 1886, by the Republic of Peru against the Peruvian Guano Co. to set aside an agreement of compromise made on the 29th of May, 1885, at a time when there was no de jure Government of Peru between the then de facto Government and the company, releasing the company in consideration of £260,000 paid to the Republic, an account and payment of the sum found due, less the £260,000, and consequent relief. The statement of claim, which was very lengthy, contained allegations in substance to the following effect:—

That there was a distinction between a de jure and a de facto Government, and that the acts of the latter required to be ratified and confirmed by the former before acquiring a binding effect, and that in the present case the agreement for compromise had not been confirmed by the de jure Government. That the defendants were fiduciary agents, and had made grave errors and overcharges in their accounts. That the agent employed by the Republic had exceeded his authority. On this point the defendants, at the hearing of the motion, tendered an affidavit, but the court decided that on an application under ord. 25, r. 4, evidence outside the pleadings was inadmissible. That in June, 1886, the de jure Government was constituted, and then, for the first time, ascertained the true state of the facts, that shortly afterwards a resolution was passed to the effect that the Government only accepted the £260,000 as part payment and on account, and that the Government only accepted the compromise in that sense, and that in event of an attempt to give it the character of a final settlement the Government declared it void and without effect according to the laws of Peru.

There was no offer to bring the £260,000 into account or to pay the money into court.

It was admitted that the de facto Government was recognized by the British Government.

This was a motion by the defendants, under ord. 25, r. 4, that the plaintiffs' statement of claim might be struck out on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action, and was embarrassing; or in the alternative that paragraph 9 (i.e., the paragraph which stated that between 1879 and 1886 there was no de jure Government in Peru, and that, so far as regarded internal acts, the de facto Government was bound by the existing laws and usage of the Republic), and all allegations consequent thereon, might be struck out as unnecessary, and tending to prejudice, embarrass, and delay the fair trial of the action, or that the court might make such other order as it should think fit.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Rigby, Q.C., and Haldane, for the defendants, in support of the motion, cited on the general question Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley, 33 W. R. 709, 10 App. Cas. 210; Emperor of Austria v. Day, 9 W. R. 712, 3 De G. F. & J. 217; United States of America v. Prioleau, 13 W. R. 1066, 2 H. & M. 559; and Johnston v. Johnston, 33 W. R. 239, on the question of admission of evidence referred to above.

R. 379; Burstall v. Beyfus, 32 W. R. 418, 26 Ch. D. 35; Dadswell v. Jacobs, 35 W. R. 261, 34 Ch. D. 278; Shafto v. Bolckow, Vaughan, & Co., 35 W. R. 686, 34 Ch. D. 725.

Davey replied.

Aug. 10.—Chitty, J.—This motion is made under the first branch of ord. 25, r. 4. There is some difficulty in affixing a precise meaning to the term "reasonable cause of action" used in ord. 25, r. 4. In point of law, and consequently in the view of a court of justice, every cause of action is a reasonable cause. But obviously some meaning must be assigned to the term "reasonable." Demurrers are abolished, and it could not have been intended to abolish demurrers by the right hand and restore them by the left. So far as method of procedure was concerned, demurrers, certainly in the Court of Chancery, and in the Chancery Division at the time when these orders came into operation, were a cheap and expeditious mode of obtaining a decision; the mere substitution of a motion or summons for the demurrer would not be an adequate explanation of order 25. Having regard to the terms of rule 4, and to the decisions on it, I think that this rule is more favourable to the pleading objected to than the old procedure by demurrer.

Under the new rule the proceeding will not be struck out unless it is demurrable and something worse than demurrable. If, notwithstanding defects in the pleading which would have been fatal on a demurrer, the court sees that a substantial case is presented, the court should, I think, decline to strike out that pleading; but when the pleading discloses a case which the court is satisfied will not succeed, then it should strike it out and put a summary end to the litigation.

What I have just stated is intended to be not an exhaustive explanation of the rule, but merely an indication in a general way of the limits of its meaning.

It was contended for the plaintiffs that the rule applies only to plain and simple cases, and that it does not embrace cases which are susceptible of serious argument on points of law or otherwise; and reliance was placed on the length of time which was taken up by the statement and discussion of this case at the bar. But I decline to accede to this conclusion so far as it was founded on the length of time occupied; by far the greater portion of it was consumed in reading the plaintiffs' statement of claim, which is a lengthy document occupying some sixteen pages of closely-printed matter. The application of the rule cannot depend on the length of the pleading; to hold that it does would be to hold out an encouragement to lengthy pleadings and prolixity of statement.

With these preliminary observations I proceed to consider the plaintiffs' case as disclosed by their pleading. The object of the action is to set aside the agreement of the 29th of May, 1885, which purports to be made on behalf of the Republic of Peru of the one part, and by the defendants of the other part. It is an agreement of compromise of disputes which had arisen between the Republic and the defendants in reference to matters of account under the contract of 1876, generally known as the Raphael contract. The first and one of the principal grounds relied on by the plaintiffs is that the agreement of compromise was made on behalf of the de facto Government of the Republic, which was not the de jure Government. But the court is bound to take cognizance of the recognition of a de facto Government by the Government of this country, and it was admitted by the plaintiffs' counsel at the bar that the de facto Government was duly recognized by the Queen. So soon as it is shown that a de facto Government of a foreign State has been recognized by the Government of this country, no further inquiry is permitted in a court of justice here. The court declines to investigate, and, indeed, has no proper means of investigating, the title of the actual Government of a foreign State which has been thus recognized. This attempted distinction between the de facto and de jure Governments which runs through the statement of claim is untenable.

The next point relied on by the plaintiffs arises out of the circumstances under which the agreement was entered into. The substance of the allegations is that the defendants were fiduciary agents, and were bound to give information with regard to the accounts. There were several points on the accounts known to the agent which were in dispute, and with reference to such points information was asked and refused on the part of the defendants. It was said that this was contrary to their duty as agents in a fiduciary capacity, and that may be accepted. But the parties here were at arm's length, and this was one of the matters in dispute, and, therefore, was one of the matters covered by the compromise. No imputation of fraud is made against the defendants in inducing the agent to enter into the agreement. No collusion is alleged between the defendants and the agent. There are some other circumstances alleged which, to my mind, are wholly immaterial; for instance, that the agreement was inequitable and was improvident; that the agent was ignorant of the English language, did not consult professional advisers, and that he acted negligently. It may be these would be grounds for the Republic taking some proceedings against their agent, but it would be no ground for setting aside the agreement if it was honestly and properly entered into. All these allegations, and, indeed, others to the like effect, have no bearing on such a case as that which is presented by the statement of claim.

The next point is that De Izene, who entered into the compromise on behalf of the Republic, exceeded his authority. On this point the defendants tendered affidavits to show what his authority was and that it had not been exceeded. But under rule 4 no affidavit is admissible. That is plain from the terms of the rule, itself. In regard to the second branch of the rule relating to the stay of frivolous and vexatious actions, the inherent jurisdiction of the court over these actions remains unaffected, and on an application to stay a frivolous or vexatious action affidavits are admissible, not by virtue of the rule, but of the general jurisdiction of the court.

With regard to the allegation that the agreement of compromise required confirmation by the Republic, that may mean either that confirmation was required by the terms of the instrument conferring the authority, or by the general law on the subject, which, the plaintiffs' counsel urged, required a ratification by the Government itself. I must, I think, give the pleader the benefit of the first of these propositions, and consequently it is unnecessary for me to express any opinion on the second.

But the want of authority on the part of the agent and the necessity for ratification are immaterial if the contract was in fact ratified by the Republic. The defendants say that on the facts stated there was such a ratification. The material facts stated on this head are to be found in paragraphs 27, 29, 30, 31, and 34 of the statement of claim. It appears that the sum of £260,000, the consideration paid by the defendants for the compromise, was paid to the agent of the Government on or about the date of the agreement—viz., the 29th of May, 1885—and that this sum, or the greater part of it, was received by the Government on or before the 5th of August of that year. On that day a resolution was passed in ignorance of the facts. Being bound to accept this allegation as true, I cannot hold that this resolution was a ratification.

The statement of claim proceeds to allege that the de facto Government came to an end in June, 1886, and that it was succeeded by a de jure Government, and that the de jure Government ascertained the true facts, and that in consequence of the discovery of the facts the Government of the Republic, on the 31st of July, 1886, passed the resolution which is stated in paragraph 30 of the statement of claim. The resolution is thus stated: "(1) That the Government did not accept, or admit as received, the said sum of £260,000 paid as aforesaid, except as part payment and on account of the moneys owing by the defendants to the Government; (2) that the Government accepted the said agreement of compromise only in that sense, and that in the event of an attempt to give to it the meaning of a final settlement in full payment or final liquidation, the Government declared such agreement of compromise void and without any effect whatsoever according to the laws of Peru."

The effect of this resolution is plain. It is an attempt to affirm in part and to disaffirm in part. A principal must act consistently; he cannot, as was stated by Lord Kenyon, blow hot and cold; or, to use Lord Cairns' expression, derived from the Scotch phraseology, he cannot approbate and reprobate at the same time; he must adopt entirely or repudiate entirely. It is scarcely necessary to cite any authority for these propositions. I may refer to Wilson v. Poulter, 2 Str. 859, where the court was clearly of opinion that the severing of parts of certain bonds was an affirmance of the defendants' act in laying out the money, and that the plaintiff could not avow the act as to part and disavow it as to the rest. I refer also to Smith v. Hodson, 4 T. R. 211, where Lord Kenyon gave the judgment to which I have referred, and says:—"Although the assignees may either affirm or disaffirm the contract of the bankrupt, yet, if they do affirm it, they must act consistently throughout; they cannot, as has often been observed in cases of this kind, blow hot and cold; and as the assignees in this case treated this transaction as a contract of sale, it must be pursued through all its consequences." I refer also to Prince v. Clark, 1 B. & C. 186, where Abbott, C.J., said it was the duty of the principal to notify his objection to the goods within a reasonable time after he received intelligence of the purchase which had been made not in accordance with the authority he had from the agent. Now the resolution here is ambiguous, but the act of the Republic in retaining the £260,000 is plain and unambiguous. The resolution admits the receipt of the money by the Government which passed it, although this is not of importance, because the previous Government, which I am bound to accept as de jure Government, had already received it.

The Republic, then, with full knowledge of the facts, deliberately insist on retaining the money paid as the consideration for the release. A merchant who instructs an agent to buy goods, when the goods are bought not in accordance with the authority cannot retain the goods; he must return, or at all events offer to return, within a reasonable time; if he does not, he adopts the transaction. Here the £260,000 would not have been paid had it not been for the agreement. In the expressive and emphatic language of the agreement itself it was paid "as the price of perpetual peace" between the Republic and the defendants. The Republic retained the price with the knowledge of the facts—at least, from the 31st of July, 1886, to the 7th of October following, when the writ was issued. By their statement of claim, delivered on the 7th of February, 1887, they, having the money still in their Treasury, or having spent it, do not even then offer to return it or even to bring it into court. All they do is to offer to bring it into account. Quite apart from the question of ratification, by reason of their having retained, for what appears to me to be an unreasonable time, the price paid for the release contained in the compromise, they could not, it is plain, obtain any judgment except on the terms of refunding or paying into court. Even on the argument of the case at the bar the Republic did not offer, by their counsel, to bring the £260,000 or any part into court. The result, in my opinion, is that they are within the meaning of rule 4. They do not show any reasonable cause of action, and the statement of claim ought to be struck out.

Then comes the question whether the action should be dismissed. The notice of motion does not ask in terms for the dismissal of the action, but it does ask for such other order as may be proper; and there seem to me to be two reasons why I should dismiss the action. First, the pleader has made the best of his case. I am satisfied that he could not state it better than he has stated it. Then the plaintiffs are still deliberately retaining the money. It is a very different thing to offer to bring the money into account and keeping this large sum, as I have said, in their Treasury, or, having spent it for the purpose of the Republic, and refunding it or bringing it into court. There is no offer even now made as I understand it. [Romer, Q.C.—No, my lord.] It was not, then, by inadvertence that the offer was omitted. Not only is there no such offer, but the plaintiffs now deliberately refuse to make it. The result, therefore, I think is that no good can come of this lengthy litigation, and that, in accordance with the jurisdiction conferred upon me by the rule, I ought now summarily to put an end to the thing. I therefore strike out the claim and dismiss the action with costs; but of course I allow no costs of the affidavit, which I have said was not properly usable.

MILLS v. FOX. (a.)

Infants' Settlement Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 43)—Infant—Estoppel—Ward of court.

Proposals for a settlement on the marriage of an infant ward of court were brought into chambers, which purported to set out the property to which the infant was entitled as tenant in tail under a settlement of 1857; but by inadvertence a sale of some of the real estate to the London School Board and the payment into court of the purchase-money was overlooked, and the property described as though no such sale had taken place. The trustees of the settlement made an affidavit, which was read in support of the proposals, and which contained the same mistake. On the basis of the proposals, the court sanctioned a settlement, which was carried out by the infant disentailing under the Infants' Settlement Act, 1855. The infant married, reached twenty-one, disentailed the fund in court, and settled it upon herself.

Held, that the trustee of this last settlement and the lady were estopped from setting up a title to the fund adverse to the trustees of her marriage settlement, in consequence of the misrepresentation (although innocent) of the trustees of the settlement of 1857, which misrepresentation had been made on her behalf.

Action by the trustees of the marriage settlement of the defendant George Fox and Marion Jane, his wife, for the purpose of establishing the title of the trustees to one moiety of a sum of between £8,000 and £9,000 Consols, paid into court by the School Board for London in respect of lands subject to the trusts of the settlement which had been taken by them.

The defendant Marion Fox and her sister were entitled, under a settlement dated the 23rd of April, 1857, to real estate as tenants in common in tail in equal shares. In 1883 the School Board for London took part of the land compulsorily and paid the purchase-money into court, represented by the sum of Consols.

On the 23rd of May, 1884, Marion Fox, then Marion Mills, an infant, applied in due form for leave to marry the defendant George Fox, and to make a settlement under the Infants' Settlement Act, 1855.

Proposals for a settlement were carried into chambers which purported to contain a statement of the property of Marion Fox, but by inadvertence the sale to the School Board was lost sight of, and the descriptions contained were the same as though this sale had not could only settle, or contract to settle, under the provisions of the Infants' Settlement Act, 1855, and with the sanction of the court, and that the only settlement, or contract for a settlement, which the court had sanctioned was that contained in the deeds of the 22nd of July, 1884, and that the court had no power to alter them. I think that these objections are of great weight, and I am unable to see how it is possible for me to rectify the deeds in the absence of any independent contract binding on Mrs. Fox. It was, however, further contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that both the marriage and the settlement were sanctioned by the court on the faith of a representation of fact made by her, or on her behalf, that at the date of the order of the 21st of July, 1884, the defendant Mrs. Fox was entitled to an estate tail in the property the purchase-money of which is represented by the fund in court, and that in equity she is bound to make good such representation or, at all events, to abstain from setting up in herself any title to the fund inconsistent therewith. The law on this subject is thus stated by Lord Cranworth in the well-known case of Jorden v. Money, 5 H. L. Cas. 185, 210, 212: "It is said that upon a principle well known in the law, founded upon good faith and equity, a principle equally of law and of equity, if a person makes any false representation to another, and that other acts upon that false representation, the person who has made it shall not afterwards be allowed to set up what he said was false, and to assert the real truth in place of the falsehood which has so misled the other. That is a principle of universal application, and has been particularly applied to cases where representations have been made as to the state of the property of persons about to contract marriage, and where, upon the faith of such representations, marriage has been contracted. There the person who has made the false representations has in a great many cases been held bound to make his representations good." His lordship then refers to Neville v. Wilkinson, 1 B. C. C. 543; Montefiore v. Montefiore, 1 W. Bl. 363; and Gale v. Lindo, 1 Vern. 475, and continues: "These principles are plainly and perfectly intelligible, and quite consistent with good sense, and I should be in the last degree sorry that any opinion or decision to which I am a party should lead to a notion that I, in the slightest degree, question their propriety. Nay, more, I think that the principle has been carried, and may be carried, much further; because I think it is not necessary that the party making the representation should know that it was false; no fraud need have been intended at the time. But if the party has unwittingly misled another, you must add that he has misled another under such circumstances that he had reasonable ground for supposing that the person whom he was misleading was to act upon what he was saying. It will not do if he merely said something, supposing it to be quite right, and then that some stranger, having heard and acted upon it, should afterwards come to him to make it good."

In Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. First National Bank of New Orleans (L. R. 6 H. L. 352, 360), Lord Hatherley says:—"I apprehend that nothing can be more certain than this—that the doctrine of equitable estoppel by representation is a wholly different thing from contract, or promise, or equitable assignment, or anything of that sort. The foundation of that doctrine, which is a very important one, and certainly not one likely to be departed from, is this—that, if a man dealing with another for value makes statements to him as to existing facts which, being stated, would affect the contract, and without reliance upon which, or without the statement of which, the party would not have made the contract, and which, being otherwise than as they are stated, would leave the situation after the contract from what it would have been if the statement had not been made, then the person making those representations shall, so far as the powers of a court of equity extend, be treated as if the representations were true, and shall be compelled to make them good. But those must be representations concerning existing facts." He then proceeds:—"The limits of that doctrine, and the distinction between it and contract, were carefully examined, and, I think, well pointed out in the judgment given by Lord Cranworth in this House in the case of Jorden v. Money."

Now in the present case the proposals for the settlement carried in on behalf of Mrs. Fox, and the affidavit in support of it, constituted a representation of fact made on behalf of Mrs. Fox—that she was, at the date of them, tenant in tail of the property in question, and had power to convey it by means of a disentailing assurance; and the court, being applied to by her to sanction her then contemplated marriage, gave such sanction on the faith of that representation, and on the terms that the property to which it related should (along with other property) be disentailed and conveyed to trustees, and thus secured for the benefit of Mrs. Fox and the issue of the contemplated marriage, which, in fact, was not allowed to take place until the court had ascertained that the proper assurances had been executed by Mrs. Fox and her husband. Under these circumstances, the case appears to me to be brought within the principle laid down by Lord Cranworth and Lord Selborne.

Various points were, however, made on behalf of the defendants, and it may be right that I should deal with them in detail. It was said that the representation was entirely innocent, and was a mere mistake, and that there was no fraud. As regards the innocent nature of the representation and the absence of fraud, the objection appears to me to be met by what is laid down by Lord Cranworth in Jorden v. Money, and the present plaintiffs, the trustees of the settlement sanctioned by the court, cannot, in my opinion, be regarded as strangers who are not entitled to call on Mrs. Fox to make the representation good.

Mistake, again, may well be a ground of relief in cases where it is of such a nature that it would be inequitable to enforce the obligation arising out of the representation made. In the present case it was the meaning and intention of all parties, and of the court, that the whole of the lady's property, except the sum of £13,000, should be settled, and the mistake which actually occurred amounts to little more than a misdescription of part of that property. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that, so far from the mistake giving rise to any equity to relief from obligation, there would be a failure of equity if the obligation were not enforced to the extent of Mrs. Fox's interest in the fund which represents the purchase-money of the property taken by the London School Board.

It was further said that at the date of the order and of the marriage Mrs. Fox was simply tenant in tail of the fund; that the court could not have ordered her, after her marriage, to execute a disentailing deed of the fund (for which proposition the case of Hilbers v. Parkinson was cited); and that the circumstance that she has in fact executed one ought not to prejudice her. If she had not executed the disentailing deed it may be that I should have found it necessary to inquire to what extent a court of equity will actively enforce the making good of representations, and whether it will order the execution of a disentailing deed; and in dealing with the latter point the principles laid down by the Court of Appeal in Bankes v. Small would have to be regarded. But I think that I am relieved by Mrs. Fox's own act from any such inquiry. By reason of the execution of the disentailing assurance she has become the only person (other than the plaintiffs) who can claim any interest in the fund in court. Now the doctrine laid down by Lord Cranworth and Lord Selborne, and the cases cited by the former, appear to me to show that a person who has made such a representation as is referred to will not be allowed by a court of equity to set up on his own behalf as against the person entitled to the benefit of the representation a claim founded on the untruth of the representation he has made. In the words of Lord Cranworth the person who has made the representation cannot afterwards be allowed to set up that which he has said was false, and to assert the real truth in the place of the falsehood. When Mrs. Fox applied to the court to sanction her marriage the representation was made on her behalf that she was the tenant in tail of one moiety of the property taken by the School Board, and she obtained the sanction for which she asked upon that representation. She was thereby precluded (as between herself and the plaintiffs) from denying the truth of it, and is, consequently, precluded from denying that one moiety of the property taken by the School Board was effectually disentailed and assured to the plaintiffs upon the trusts of the settlement, and that the plaintiffs, as such trustees, became absolute owners of the property, and therefore entitled to the purchase-money payable in respect of it. She can only make out her title to that purchase-money by alleging that in truth she had not, at the date of the disentailing deed, any interest in the property at all, but that the property had long before been conveyed to the School Board. That, in my judgment, she is not at liberty to do, and I think that her position in this respect is not affected by the circumstance that she was an infant when the representation was made. The defendants are consequently precluded from setting up any title to the fund adversely to the plaintiffs as trustees of the marriage settlement, and one moiety of the fund ought to be transferred to them.

Declare that the defendants are precluded from setting up any title to the funds in court adverse to that of the plaintiffs as trustees of the indentures of the 22nd of July, 1884, in the pleadings mentioned, and that one moiety of such fund ought to be transferred to the plaintiffs upon the trusts of the second of such indentures.

REG. v. RECORDER OF HANLEY. (a.)

Gasworks—Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. c. 15) s. 35—Jurisdiction of quarter sessions to inquire into concerns of company—Re-opening accounts—Costs.

A petition was presented in 1885 under section 35 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847, to the Recorder of Hanley praying him to appoint a person to inquire into the actual condition of the British Gas Light Co., and an accountant was appointed. He examined into the accounts of the previous year and of all other years since 1871, and drew up a report. It was admitted that the whole of the reserve fund was not then and never had been invested, and that the prescribed maximum dividend had not been paid. The recorder held that the company's earnings had been sufficient to pay the maximum dividend and to have kept invested the whole of the reserve fund, reduced the price of gas 6*d. per* 1,000 cubic feet, and ordered the company to pay the expenses of the inquiry and the costs of the petitioners.

Held, on application for a certiorari to quash the order, that the order was bad, except as to the direction that the company should pay the costs of the accountant.

Rule calling on the Recorder of Hanley to show cause why a certiorari should not issue to quash an order made by him against the British Gas Light Co. in that borough directing a reduction in the price of gas furnished by them and also payment of the costs of an inquiry under section 35 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847. The facts and arguments fully appear from the judgment.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Bosanquet, Q.C., and A. Young showed cause.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Balfour Browne, Q.C., and Boddam, in support of the rule.

The judgment of the court (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and DENMAN, J.) was delivered by DENMAN, J.—This was a rule nisi for a certiorari to the Recorder of Hanley to remove, in order to be quashed, an order made by him on the 11th of February, 1887, whereby he ordered that the British Gas Light Co. should make a reduction of 6d. per 1,000 cubic feet in the price of gas supplied by them so as to reduce the same to 3s. per 1,000 cubic feet, and to pay the costs of an inquiry into the concerns of the company, and the costs of the petitioners.

The company was established in 1824 for the purpose of supplying gas to certain places, and subsequently incorporated, with limited liability, under its present name. In 1858 the company obtained an Act (21 Vict. c. xxxiii.) giving it additional powers within certain limits in Staffordshire, including the borough of Hanley, and by section 3 of that Act the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847, was incorporated save in so far as that Act was modified by the new Act. The Act contains no provision modifying section 35 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847.

The Act of 1858, by section 15, after reciting that £42,610 had been expended by the company on land, &c., and apparatus for the supply of gas, provides that a separate account shall be kept of that sum and of all sums to be expended on similar objects, and goes on to enact as follows:—"The provisions of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847, with respect to the amount of profit to be received by the company, shall, as regards the profits which may accrue to the company from the supply of gas within the limits of this Act, be applicable to the said sum of £42,610 and other such sums, &c., which several sums shall, for the purpose of estimating such last-mentioned profits, be deemed to be the paid-up capital applicable to the objects and purposes of this Act according to the intent, &c., of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847: Provided, nevertheless, that the capital to be expended by the company for the purposes of this Act shall not exceed £30,000 in addition to the £42,610, and the profits to be divided by the company upon the capital expended for the purposes of this Act shall not exceed £10 per cent. per annum in respect of the £42,610, nor £7 10s. per cent. in respect of so much of the £30,000 as shall from time to time be actually expended." Then follow several clauses relating to the price of gas, its quality, and the testing of it, which were repealed by a subsequent Act of 1866, to be presently referred to, and other provisions not material to this case.

By the Act of 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. cxix.) the clauses of the Act of 1858 relating to the price of gas are repealed, and by section 5 it is provided that the maximum charge for gas supplied within the limits of the Act should be 3s. 6d. per 1,000 feet.

By a subsequent Act (43 & 44 Vict. c. cxx.) the company were empowered to enlarge their works and expend £50,000 in addition to the sums already expended, of which £10,000 might be borrowed on mortgage. The profits to be divided in respect of the £40,000 to be expended out of the capital stock of the company, and of the £10,000 borrowed on mortgage, were not to exceed five per cent.

By section 6 of the Act the Gasworks Clauses Act was to apply to the undertaking, and by section 28 the accounts to be made up by the company were to be made up in accordance with the provisions of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871.

By section 35 of that Act the company are to forward to the local authority every year an annual statement of accounts made up to the end of the preceding year in a certain form. The company had in the present case forwarded accounts in the form sanctioned by the Board of Trade under the provisions of that section.

At the quarter sessions at Hanley, held on July 2 and 3, 1885, a petition was presented by gas ratepayers, under section 35 of the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847, complaining of the accounts of the company for the year ending 1884, and praying that an accountant might be appointed to inquire into the concerns of the company. The recorder appointed Mr. Carter, who, after a long inquiry, made a report for the year ending June, 1884, and for several previous years, as far back in fact as 1871. This was done in order to discover whether sums had in former years been improperly charged against revenue. The accountant proceeded to point out the errors in the year ending June, 1884. It was contended that the recorder exceeded his jurisdiction in the judgment he has pronounced, that he had no power to re-open accounts for the past years, but that he was confined to the accounts for the year ending June, 1884, and that as the reserved fund had not been invested, nor the full dividend paid, the recorder had no authority to order a reduction of the price of gas. It was also contended that the recorder had not the power to inquire into the method of management of the concern, that he exceeded his jurisdiction in disallowing and carrying to the revenue account for the year 1884 the annual amount deducted for depreciation and the amount laid by as an insurance fund, that the order for the reduction of the price of gas was bad, because unlimited in point of time, and that the recorder had no jurisdiction to order the company to pay the costs of the petition. With regard to the first contention, it is clear that the report of Mr. Carter and the judgment of the recorder were based on a complete re-opening of the accounts for preceding years, that corrections were made as to charges claimed by way of reduction of profits, and the conclusion arrived at that the profits should have been larger. The annual charges for depreciation and insurance which were so corrected are to be found in the schedule to the Act of 1866 and the forms sanctioned by the Board of Trade. We have come to the conclusion that the recorder did exceed his jurisdiction, as, by section 30 of the Act of 1847, it is provided that profits to be divided in any year shall not exceed the prescribed rate, unless a larger dividend be at any time necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of the said yearly rate.

Then, by section 31, it is provided that if the profits in any year amount to a larger sum than is sufficient, after making up any deficiency in any previous year, to pay a dividend at the prescribed rate, the excess is to be invested, and also its interest, and the two are to accumulate at compound interest until they reach a prescribed sum, or ten per cent. of the nominal capital, which sum is to form a reserved fund.

By section 33, when the required sum is reached, the interest is to be no longer invested, but applied to the general purposes of the company.

By section 34, if in any year the profits divisible do not amount to the prescribed rate the dividend is to be made up by drawing upon the reserved fund from time to time.

Then follows section 35, the clause upon which the present question turns. After providing that the court of quarter sessions may, on the petition of two gas ratepayers, nominate and appoint some accountant or other person to examine, at the expense of the undertakers (the amount of such expense to be determined by the said court), the actual state of the concerns of the undertakers and to report the proceeds. "And the said court may examine any witnesses touching the truth of the said accounts and the matters therein referred to; and if it appears that the profit of the undertakers for the preceding year have exceeded the prescribed rate, the undertakers shall, in case the whole of the reserved fund has been and then remains invested as aforesaid, and in case dividends to the amount hereinbefore limited have been paid, make such a rateable reduction in the rate for gas to be furnished by them as in the judgment of the said court shall be proper, but so as such rates, when reduced, shall insure to the undertakers, regard being had to the account of profit before received, a profit as near as may be to the prescribed rate.

By section 37 a heavy penalty is imposed upon the undertakers if they do not produce to the court or to the accountant any books of account, bills, receipts, &c.

Section 38 then provides for the keeping of an account to be sent annually to the clerk of the peace.

Taking into account the whole of these provisions, we do not come to the conclusion that the accountant and the recorder went beyond their province merely because they examined into the accounts of years previous to that ending June 30, 1884. It might be absolutely necessary so to do in order to ascertain and report upon the actual state and condition of the concerns of the company within the meaning of section 35. Moreover, we think that the words "said accounts," into the truth of which the recorder is to inquire (though an inaccurate expression, because no accounts had been previously mentioned) are not intended to refer only, if at all, to the account prepared by the accountant, but to the accounts of the company required by the subsequent section 38 and by any provision of the company's special Acts. But we feel bound to hold that the recorder here has made the order for the reduction of the price of gas in this particular case without jurisdiction by disregarding the limitation of his power to make such order contained in section 35. For it appears on the face of the judgment of the recorder that, in fact, neither had the whole of the reserve fund been invested, nor the whole of the prescribed amount of dividends paid. He expressly states the fact to be so. He then proceeds to put an interpretation on the statute which we think it is incapable of bearing—viz., that a rateable reduction in the price of gas may be ordered by the court when "the undertakers have drawn from the profits of the undertaking during its career enough to have paid all dividends and all liabilities, and also to have invested and kept invested the whole of the reserve fund." This seems to us to amount to an alteration of the law by the recorder, made in order to give himself jurisdiction in the present case. The order is silent upon the point; it is probably, therefore, bad for the want of any statement on the subject, but that point has not been much argued, and we do not give an opinion upon it. Possibly the objections of the company on other points ought to prevail, for though the accountant and recorder might be bound to inquire into previous accounts for the purpose of ascertaining the actual state of the undertaking, it does not follow that when accounts have been properly delivered and remained unquestioned for years section 35 would allow a re-opening and disallowance of those accounts for the purpose of arriving at the proper result as regards the questions before the recorder in an inquiry such as that contemplated by section 35.

Again, the recorder's views as to the illegality of the charges for depreciation and insurance seem open to question; but we rest our judgment on what appears to be matter going to the jurisdiction to make the order.

There is one point upon which it is necessary to give an opinion. By section 35 the expenses of the proceeding are to be borne by the company, and the amount is to be determined by the court. The recorder has ascertained that amount at £650, and there is no objection to his order in that respect; but he has also ordered the company to pay the costs of the petitioners.

There is nothing in the statute to warrant such an order. The only provision as to costs appears to be in section 36, where the court is empowered to award costs against the petitioners; and as costs are entirely the creation of statute, we cannot hold that the power to inflict them can be given by implication.

ROBEY & Co. v. SNAEFELL MINING Co. (a.)

Service out of the jurisdiction—Action for price of goods sold and delivered—Defendants residing in Isle of Man—Place where contract ought to be performed—Ord. 11, r. (1 e).

By a contract made by the plaintiffs, a firm carrying on business at Lincoln, and the defendants, a mining company carrying on business in the Isle of Man, it was agreed that the plaintiffs should make an engine and deliver it to the defendants, and erect it on the defendants' premises in the Isle of Man, and that the defendants should pay for the same on their engineer giving his certificate that it had been erected to his satisfaction. Nothing was specified in the contract as to the place where payment was to be made. The plaintiffs, who alleged that they had performed their part of the contract, desired to sue the defendants for the purchase-money in the High Court.

Held, that the contract to pay was a contract which ought to be performed at Lincoln, and therefore there was power to allow a writ to be served out of the jurisdiction.

Summons referred from chambers.

The summons was taken out by the defendants to set aside an order made by Charles, J., giving the plaintiffs leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction. The plaintiffs were a firm carrying on business in the city of Lincoln. The defendants were a mining company carrying on business at Douglas, in the Isle of Man. By a contract made between the plaintiffs and the defendants it was agreed that the plaintiffs should manufacture an engine and certain machinery, and deliver the same to the defendants, and erect the same on the defendants' premises in the Isle of Man, and that the defendants should pay an agreed price, on their engineer giving his certificate that the engine and machinery had been erected to his satisfaction. The action was brought for the price of the engine and machinery.

Blake Odgers, for the defendants.—This case does not come within ord. 11, r. 1 (e). The contract was broken, if at all, in the Isle of Man. The customary rule is that where goods are to be delivered, payment ought to be made on delivery, unless the place or time of payment be specified in the contract. This is a case of goods to be delivered, and the rule applies here, with the addition that the engineer's certificate is to be a condition precedent to any liability to pay. Payment and delivery being concurrent, it follows that payment was to be made in the Isle of Man, and not in this country. This case of the sale of goods to be delivered is an exception to the general rule of law that the debtor must seek his creditor. Another exception to this general rule occurs where the sea comes between the parties, as is the case here. Sheppard's Touchstone (Preston's Edition), p. 378, says "the obligor must, at his peril, seek out the obligee, if he be intra quatuor mœnia [read maria], otherwise the obligation is forfeit; but if the obligee be not within the kingdom at the time when the thing is to be done, he is not bound to seek him." This follows what is said in Co. Litt., s. 340. For these reasons the order is bad.

Duke, for the plaintiffs.—The old authorities which have been cited are really in favour of the plaintiffs, as they only lay down that a debtor in England is not bound to seek his creditor out of England. But here the creditor is in England, and being in England is entitled to sue here. This is clearly a contract for payment in this country. The proper test to apply is the question where tender ought to have been made. The defendants, in order to successfully answer the plaintiffs' claim for payment by a plea of tender, would have to show a tender at Lincoln. Therefore the contract to pay is a contract which ought to have been performed within the jurisdiction, and the order was rightly made.

December 9.—The judgment of the court (STEPHEN and A. L. SMITH, JJ.) was delivered by STEPHEN, J.—The question is whether we have power to allow a writ in this action to be served out of the jurisdiction. The contract was one for the delivery of certain machinery to be used for the purposes of the defendant company; and the company were to pay on delivery and on the certificate of their engineer, but nothing was specified as to the place of payment. The question depends on the place where the contract ought to be executed. We think that here the contract to pay is a contract which ought to have been executed at Lincoln, it being a general rule of law that it is the duty of the debtor to send the money to the creditor. The ordinary course of business would be that the defendants would send a cheque to the plaintiffs at Lincoln; and if the cheque were taken in payment, that would be payment at Lincoln. Therefore, this is a case of a contract which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, within the meaning of ord. 11, r. 1 (e). We may add that some light is thrown on the question by the words of the proviso to this part of the rule, "unless the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland." It does not go on to add "the Isle of Man or the Channel Islands." Therefore, we have power to allow a writ to be served out of the jurisdiction. As to the question whether, in the exercise of our discretion, we should allow the writ to go, it is a simple rule, existing almost in the nature of things, that the plaintiff should be allowed to choose his own forum, provided that that forum have jurisdiction. Here the plaintiffs have chosen the High Court. There is no reason why they should not have leave to issue the writ. As to the question of convenience, the balance of convenience seems to be in the plaintiffs' favour.

Motion dismissed.

Appeal from Kay, J.

Questions were raised by this appeal with reference to ord. 65, r. 11, of the R. S. C., 1883. That rule, so far as it is material to the present case, provides as follows:—"If in any case it shall appear to the court or a judge that costs have been improperly or without any reasonable cause incurred, or that, by reason of any undue delay in proceeding under any judgment or order, or of any misconduct or default of the solicitor, any costs properly incurred have nevertheless proved fruitless to the person incurring the same, the court or a judge . . . may . . . if they or he think fit, refer the matter to a taxing officer for inquiry and report."

The action was an action for administration of the real and personal estate of a testatrix, and it had been instituted in 1876. The plaintiff was one of the trustees named in the will, and also a specific legatee. The defendants were the other trustees of the will, who were also executors; a decree for administration was made on November 21, 1876, and the chief clerk's certificate was issued on June 16, 1882.

On August 2, 1882, an order was made by Bacon, V.C., in the action, on further consideration, declaring (inter alia) that the costs of all parties in the cause should be taxed as between solicitor and client; but the order contained no express direction as to payment of the costs when taxed. On May 31, 1883, another order was made by Bacon, V.C., on adjourned further consideration, declaring that the costs of all parties were payable out of the real estate of the testatrix in exoneration of the personalty, and directing (inter alia) taxation of the costs of all parties in the action since August 2, 1882, and giving liberty to any of the parties to apply for payment of the said costs (see the report, 31 W. R. 854).

In 1885 the then solicitor of the plaintiff raised money by way of mortgage on the security of the costs due to him; one of the mortgagees was the plaintiff's present solicitor, who, in 1886, was retained by the plaintiff in place of the former solicitor.

On November 4, 1887, the action came on on second further consideration before Kay, J., on an application by the plaintiff for directions as to payment of the taxed costs. The defendants to the action appeared on the hearing of the application, but did not contest the order sought. Kay, J., on the hearing of the application, refused then to make any order for payment of the costs, but directed, under ord. 65, r. 11, of R. S. C., 1883, a reference to the taxing officer for inquiry and report as to the cause of the delay in the prosecution of the action, and what costs were occasioned thereby; also who was responsible for such delay, and the costs occasioned thereby or any part thereof; and meanwhile directed the hearing of the further consideration to stand over.

The plaintiff, the present solicitor of the plaintiff, and the other mortgagee of the former solicitor of the plaintiff appealed. The order made by Kay, J., was not drawn up, but the appeal was set down and came on for hearing.

T. Brett, for the appellants.—The order made by Kay, J., directing a reference is ultra vires in this case, the orders made by Bacon, V.C., directing the costs of all parties to be taxed as between solicitor and client, and declaring that the costs of all parties were charged on the whole real estate of the testatrix, practically amounted to a direction that all parties were to be paid their costs out of the real estate, and Kay, J., had no jurisdiction to review those orders: Krehl v. Park, 23 W. R. 475, L. R. 10 Ch. 334; Quarrell v. Beckford, 1 Mad. 269; Clutton v. Pardon, T. & Russ. 301; Wilson v. Metcalf, 1 Russ. 530. But assuming the orders of Bacon, V.C., are not conclusive, ord. 65, r. 11, is not applicable in a case like this, where the costs incurred are payable out of a fund, but only relates to cases where costs have been incurred and are payable by one of the litigant parties: Furness v. Davis, 33 W. R. 320. Again, Kay, J., had no power to make the rule in question operate retrospectively by applying it to the delay that took place and to the costs that were incurred previous to October 24, 1883, the date when the new rules came into operation: In re McClellan,* 33 W. R. 888, 29 Ch. D. 495; In re Bradford, 31 W. R. 919, 15 Q.B.D. 635.

Swinfen Eady, for the defendant Roberts, appeared, but did not support or contest the appeal.

Dibdin, for other parties.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Kay,

(a) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* But see the case of Boswell v. Coaks, ante, p. 65, in which it was held by the Court of Appeal that the provision contained in Form No. 1, Appendix H., of the R. S. C., 1883, relating to the date from which interest on costs runs, was applicable to, and should be, applied in taxation proceedings taken after October 24, 1883, in respect of costs, not only incurred, but also adjudged to be paid, before October 24, 1883.

J., and I doubt if the appeal ought to have been set down, as the order made by Kay, J., has not been drawn up.

Kay, J., on the hearing of an application made on second further consideration of the action, refused to make any order providing for costs until certain inquiries which he directed to be made were answered—that is to say, he directed, under ord. 65, r. 11, a reference to the taxing master for inquiry and report as to the cause of the great delay in the prosecution of the proceedings—and here the delay was very great—viz., from 1876 to 1887—as to what costs had been occasioned thereby, and who was responsible for the delay and the costs occasioned thereby, or any part thereof; and he refused to make any order on the application until these inquiries were answered. The plaintiff in the action and the present solicitor of the plaintiff have appealed from that order of Kay, J.

Now I feel great reluctance in interfering with such an order made by the judge who had knowledge of the proceedings in the action, but, of course, if the judge had no jurisdiction to make the order we should interfere.

With regard to the costs incurred since October 24, 1883, there can be no question, as they are clearly within the operation of this rule.

As to the costs prior to October 24, 1883, three objections have been raised—first, that these costs had been already allowed by an order of Bacon, V.C.; secondly, that rule 11 of order 65 does not apply where costs are payable out of a fund, but only where an individual has to pay a particular sum for costs; and, thirdly, that rule 11 of order 65 is not retrospective in its operation.

The question is an important one, not only to solicitors, but also to persons interested in estates which are being administered.

As to the first objection, the order of Bacon, V.C., of August 2, 1882, directed taxation of costs, no doubt on the footing that they would be payable out of the estate. But at that time, in my opinion, the attention of the judge was not called to the matters contained in the rule we are now considering, for this rule was not then framed, and at that time it was a matter of course generally that the costs of an administration action, by whomever instituted, would be paid out of the estate.

It was with reference to that general practice that it was held in In re McClellan that rule 1 of order 65 of the R. S. C., 1883 (which restricted the generality of the practice by enacting that the costs of administration actions should be in the discretion of the judge, with a saving clause in favour of the right of an executor, administrator, trustee, or mortgagee to costs), did not apply to costs of an administration action instituted by a residuary legatee, and incurred before the new rules came into operation, and, therefore, that an appeal lay against the disallowance of the costs of the residuary legatee incurred before that date.

But rule 11 was made to call the attention of judges to the great mischief resulting from delay in administration actions, and to give them the power—if they needed the power—to disallow, even as between the solicitor and his client, costs occasioned by the delay in administration.

I do not consider any of the orders of Bacon, V.C., to be an allowance of the costs so as to prevent the judge before whom the matter might afterwards come from exercising any power of this kind given him by the rules and orders. As to the cases cited in support of this objection, Quarrell v. Beckford was a case relating to the costs of a mortgagee, but the original order there expressly directed payment of the costs to be made to the mortgagee, that they should be added to his security, and the only question was as to what costs came within the order, and it was held, as it was also held, in Clutton v. Pardon, that when an order for taxation is made it includes the whole of the costs. Wilson v. Metcalf is more like the present case, as there does not seem to have been anything in the original order amounting to a direction for payment, but it appears that the court there considered they were only following the decision in Quarrell v. Beckford without attention having been called to that fact. In my opinion the orders made by Bacon, V.C., do not preclude Kay, J., from dealing with the disposition of the costs of the action as the rules and orders give him the power. The fact that there was no opposition in the court below to the allowance of the costs may, I think, have influenced Kay, J., in making the order he did. No doubt parties are always willing that the costs should be paid out of the money of someone else—we constantly see that illustrated in Lunacy matters—but that very fact properly influences the judge in requiring a more strict investigation. In my opinion, therefore, we are not bound, either on principle or by authority, to recognize the orders of Bacon, V.C., as conclusive.

Then, as to the second objection—that rule 11 of order 65 does not apply to a case where costs are to be provided out of a fund, but only applies where an individual has to pay a particular sum by way of costs—that is a complete mistake. To restrict the operation of the rule in that way would defeat the very object in view, and with regard to which the rule was made, and would to a great extent render the rule inoperative. The rule no doubt specially provides for a particular case, but it does not shut out cases where costs are payable out of a fund in which the litigant parties are not interested.

As to the third objection—that rule 11 of order 65 is not retrospective in its operation—that is a more doubtful point. The cases cited in support of this contention were only cases relating to the right of appeal on the subject of costs. Those cases are no doubt right. But the question we have here to consider is whether this power given to the judge by rule 11 of order 65 of R. S. C., 1883, is confined to seeing whether any delay has occurred since the new rules of 1883 came into operation. In my opinion the power is not confined to costs incurred since the new rules and orders, but the rule, being general in its terms, must be construed as applying to costs incurred in any action pending when the new orders came into operation.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also think that the contention on behalf of the appellant cannot prevail. The power given by rule 11 of order 65 of the R. S. C., 1883, is a new power. I think no such power was given by the R. S. C., 1875. As to the rule itself, nothing can be more general than its words, and nothing more plain than its object. I take the same view of the rule as that taken by Kay, J. If there has been any extraordinary delay it is perfectly competent for the judge, although not asked to do so, to direct an inquiry to ascertain the facts and to see who is responsible for the delay. As to what ought to be done after the inquiries have been answered is another matter. I think the judge had jurisdiction to make the order he did make in this case.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

In re ADDLESTONE LINOLEUM CO. BENSON'S CASE. (a.)

Company—Contract to issue fully paid-up shares—Non-registration of contract—Winding up—Claim of contributory to prove for damages for breach of contract—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 25—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 38, sub-section (7).

The principle of the decision in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, 28 W. R. 677, 5 App. Cas. 317, is that a person who has purchased shares in a company has thereby contracted to contribute the amount of the value of the shares, to be dealt with as part of the assets of the company, and therefore cannot, while he remains either voluntarily or involuntarily the holder of the shares, in any way, directly or indirectly, withdraw from the company any part of those assets which, as holder of the shares, he has contracted to contribute. Mudford's case, 28 W. R. 670, 14 Ch. D. 634, and Ex parte Appleyard, 30 W. R. 147, 18 Ch. D. 587, being contrary to that principle, cannot be relied on.

A company issued preference shares at a discount, the certificates declaring the shares so issued to be shares fully paid up. It was doubtful whether there was a contract to issue the shares as fully paid-up shares or only a contract to issue the shares at a discount, but no contract was registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The shares issued were not in fact fully paid up. The company went into liquidation, and a holder of some of the shares in question was placed on the list of contributories, and paid the liquidator the amount remaining unpaid thereon. The holder claimed to prove against the company in the winding up in damages, to the amount of the call paid by him, "for breach of contract or otherwise in relation to the issue of the shares."

Held, that, even assuming there was a contract to issue the shares as fully paid up, the holder of the shares was precluded, by the principle of the decision in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, from putting in any proof in the winding up in respect of damages for breach of contract.

Decision of Kay, J. (ante, p. 57), affirmed.

The Court also expressed an opinion that, even if the holder of the shares had been entitled to prove, he could not, having regard to section 38, sub-section (7), of the Companies Act, 1862, have proved in competition with outside creditors of the company.

Appeal from a decision of Kay, J., reported ante, p. 57.

The point raised by this appeal was whether a person who had been placed on the list of contributories of a company which was being wound up, in respect of certain shares not fully paid up which had been allotted to him, was or was not entitled to prove in the liquidation in damages—to the amount of the calls made—"for breach of contract or otherwise in relation to the issue of the shares." The shares in question were issued by the company in pursuance of a resolution to issue part of the nominal capital of the company in the form of preference shares of £10 each, every existing shareholder to be entitled to one such share at 25 per cent. discount for each ordinary share held by him. The present appellant Benson, as an existing shareholder, had applied for and had been allotted some of these £10 preference shares, for which he paid at the rate of £7 10*s.* each share. The certificates of the shares so allotted to him stated that the shares were fully paid up. No contract had been registered at or before the issue of these shares under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

Section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, provides as follows:—"Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filed with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares."

Section 38 of the Companies Act, 1862, so far as material to the present case provides: "In the event of a company . . . being wound up, every past and present member of such company shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company to an amount sufficient for payment of the debts . . . of the company . . . with the qualifications following:" inter alia, "Sub-section 7. No sum due to any member of a company in his character of a member by way of dividends, profits, or otherwise, shall be deemed to be a debt of the company payable to such member in a case of competition between himself and any other creditor not being a member of the company."

Kay, J., dismissed the summons taken out by Benson for leave to prove in the winding up against the company in damages for "breach of contract or otherwise in relation to the issue of the shares." (See the report, ante, p. 57.)

Benson appealed.

Farwell, for the appellant.—The first point is whether the appellant is a creditor of the company at all; and, second, if he is, whether he is entitled to prove in competition with the other creditors of the company. On the first point I say there was an express contract by the company to issue these shares as fully paid up, and, in addition, there was an independent though implied contract to register the contract at or before the time of issuing the shares. [COTTON, L.J.—I doubt whether you can show that there was any contract in terms to issue these shares as shares fully paid up.] No one reading the resolution and report could suppose that he was to get anything but fully paid-up shares, and the certificates certify that the shares are shares fully paid up. If there had been no liquidation and the company was still a going concern the appellant would have had a right to sue the company for damages in respect of the breach of contract; the fact of liquidation cannot destroy that right, because it was a liability attaching to the company at the date of the winding up. If the appellant cannot prove as a creditor against the company in liquidation, the result will be that the company gets the appellants' money for nothing, and the only consideration the appellant gets is a damnosa hereditas—a liability to pay: Mudford's case, 28 W. R. 670, 14 Ch. D. 634, and Ex parte Appleyard, 30 W. R. 147, 18 Ch. D. 587, are distinct authorities in favour of the appellants' right to prove against the company in liquidation. The case of Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, 28 W. R. 677, 5 App. Cas. 317, is distinguishable; that was a case where a shareholder sought to bring an action and get damages for deceit against the company in which he was a shareholder; the reasoning of the judges there show that the decision in that case turned entirely on the nature of the claim made, and not on the fact of the company being in liquidation. Subject to the qualification contained in section 38, sub-section (7), of the Companies Act, 1862, a shareholder may be also a creditor of the company: Grissell's case, 14 W. R. 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. 528. On the second point—viz., as to proving in competition with other creditors—section 38, sub-section (7), of the Act of 1862 only provides that a member who is a creditor cannot prove, in competition with non-member creditors, in respect of any sum due to the member in his character of a member: In re Leicester Club Co., Ex parte Cannon, 34 W. R. 14, 30 Ch. D. 629; but the claim of the present appellant is not for any sum due to him in his character of member, but arises in respect of the independent though implied contract, entered into by the company with him to register the agreement they had made before issuing the shares.

Marten, Q.C., and F. B. Palmer, for the liquidator, the respondent.—The principle of the case of Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank applies; the appellant is not entitled, by making a claim for damages, to get back part of the capital of the company which he was bound to contribute, and to withdraw, therefore, some of the property from the outside creditors. When liquidation supervened rescission became impossible. This is a claim made in respect of the very contract itself to take shares: Mudford's case and Ex parte Appleyard may be distinguished from Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank on the ground that the contract for breach, of which proof was allowed in those cases, was a contract quite irrespective and independent of the contract to take shares. Again, a contract by the company to accept £7 10s. as payment in lieu of £10 is nudum pactum and invalid. A company such as this is cannot agree to reduce their capital by purchasing its own shares: Trevor v. Whitworth, ante, p. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409; Foakes v. Beer, 33 W. R. 233, 9 App. Cas. 605. The contract to issue shares at a discount was, therefore, in itself ultrà vires: In re Ince Hall Rolling Mills Co., 30 W. R. 945, 23 Ch. D. 545 note; In re Plaskynaston Co., 23 Ch. D. 542, 32 W. R. Dig. 41; In re Millers' Dale Co., 34 W. R. 192, 31 Ch. D. 211. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Burgess' case, 28 W. R. 792, 15 Ch. D. 507.] Registration of such a contract, even if there were registration, could not make any difference: Oakes v. Turquand, L. R. 2 H. L. 345, 16 W. R. H. L. Dig. 15. The company had no power to give a bonus to its shareholders: Lydney and Wigpool Co. v. Bird, 34 W. R. 749, 33 Ch. D. 85; even if the appellant has a right to prove, he cannot prove in competition with outside creditors of the company, section 38, sub-section (7).

Farwell in reply.—The company, or its liquidator, cannot now assert that the contract to issue shares at a discount as fully paid-up shares was ultrà vires. They have affirmed the contract by putting the appellant on the list of contributories and compelling him to pay up the unpaid balance. Again, if there was no contract to take shares at all, how can the appellant be liable for calls? In that case, at any rate, the company would be liable to the appellant for money had and received: Turner v. Browne, 3 C. B. 157.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kay, J., refusing to allow the present appellant to put in a proof in the winding up of a company in respect of damages for breach of contract, which contract, it is alleged, is contained in an invitation by the company to the appellant to take shares, which was accepted by the appellant.

Now, in the first place, it is very doubtful, in my opinion, if there is, in fact, any such contract as the appellant founds his claim upon. It seems to me the contract was not a contract to issue and take the shares as shares fully paid up, but a contract to issue the shares at a discount—as it was supposed the directors had power to do; and if that was the contract I also doubt if any registration of it under section 25 of the Act of 1867 could have rendered it effectual so as to relieve the shareholder from the liability to pay the full amount of the shares in the event of a winding up of the company. There were cases before the Act of 1867 which showed that it was not necessary that the payment for shares should be in money, but that it was sufficient if money's worth were given by the subscriber as consideration for the shares when there was an agreement to that effect; and section 25 of the Act of 1867 only provided that such agreement should be registered at or before the issuing of the shares.

But I do not enter into either of those questions for the purpose of deciding them; it is not necessary to do so, for in my opinion the case of Houldsworth v. City of Glasow Bank precludes us from allowing this proof. It is true that that case was not exactly like the present case, for it was a claim by a shareholder in the nature of an action for deceit. But the ground of the decision of the lords was that the claim was founded on that which would have entitled the shareholder to repudiate the shares and sever himself altogether from the company, but that when the claim was made it was too late for the shareholder to repudiate the shares, the company not then being a going concern, and that the shareholder could not, while being a member of the company, withdraw from the assets of the company the sum which he alleged was the damage which he had suffered by the misrepresentations. The principle of that decision governs this case. Mr. Farwell's client may have had a right to go to the company and say, "You gave me something which I did not contract to buy; take me off the list of shareholders," and if he had done so while the company was a going concern he might have been entitled to prove in the liquidation afterwards. But he comes here now as holder of the shares, and as holder of the shares claims to prove in the liquidation of the company. In my opinion he is precluded from doing so, and the appeal therefore fails. I do not think it necessary to decide whether, if the appellant could have brought in this proof, he could have proved in competition with the other creditors having regard to section 38, sub-section (7), of the Act of 1862; in my opinion, however, section 38, sub-section (7), would prevent him doing so.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. What was the contract here? It may be put in one of two ways. It was either a contract to issue the shares at a discount or a contract to issue them as fully paid-up shares. If it were the former, the appellant would be saddled with the liability of paying up the full amount, even if the contract had been registered. The amount to be paid for shares is regulated by the memorandum of association. Before the Act of 1867 there were cases which showed that an agreement might be entered into either before or after the issue of the shares for payment being made otherwise than in cash; section 25 of the Act of 1867 put a stop to any such agreement being made after the issue of the shares, and to any such agreement being made before the issue of the shares unless registered. But section 25 of the Act of 1867 has nothing to do with the amount to be paid, but only regulates and restricts the mode of payment. If the contract was to issue the shares as fully paid-up shares, the position of the appellant is this: he has not in fact got fully paid-up shares, but he has kept them, and kept them so long that he cannot now get rid of them.

He cannot, while holder of the shares, get repayment of the consideration by recovering damages for breach of contract from the company. The principle of the decision in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank is that a person, by being saddled with shares, is bound to pay the amount of the shares as so much money to the capital of the company, and that it would be inconsistent with that obligation that he could take back any part of that money either directly or indirectly by means of a claim against the company for fraud or in any other way. Mudford's case and Ex parte Appleyard, both before Hall, V.C., cannot be relied on, having regard to the principle of the decision in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank.

LOPES, L.J.—I will assume the contract to have been a contract to issue fully paid-up shares, and that the appellant has not got what he contracted for; assuming that to be so, I think that in principle there is no distinction between the case of Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank and the case of the appellant. In my opinion the injured shareholder cannot get damages from a company of which he is a member, but only rescission of the contract. Here rescission has, under the circumstances, become impossible. There was said to be a distinction between Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank and this case, as the former was the case of a claim for damages for deceit, and this is a claim for breach of contract. I do not think any distinction in principle can be drawn. It is said that this view is contrary to the two cases mentioned before Hall, V.C., but in my opinion those cases cannot be relied on. I agree with the opinion expressed by Cotton, L.J., as to the construction to be put on section 38, sub-section (7).

MITCHELL v. CANTRILL. (a.)

Easement—Light—Prescription—Lessor and lessee—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 3.

A lease for 999 years of a plot of building land, with a house which the lessee had erected on the land in pursuance of a building agreement, contained a demise of the house and land, "and all rights and appurtenances, legal, used, or reputed, to the said plot, except rights (if any) restricting the free use of any adjoining land, or the conversion or appropriation at any time hereafter of such land for building or other purposes, obstructive or otherwise."

Held, that the reservation in the lease was not an agreement within the proviso contained in section 3 of the Prescription Act, and that it did not, therefore, prevent the lessee from acquiring a right to light under that Act.

Appeal from a decision of the registrar sitting for the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court of Lancaster.

By a lease dated the 21st of April, 1864, made in pursuance of a building agreement, a plot of land, with the house thereon, erected by the plaintiff, was demised to the plaintiff for a term of 999 years, together with "all rights and appurtenances, legal, used or reputed, to the said plot, except rights (if any) restricting the free user of any adjoining land, or the conversion or appropriation at any time hereafter of such land for building or other purposes, obstructive or otherwise."

The plaintiff enjoyed the access of light to the house without interruption down to July, 1887, a period of more than twenty years, when the defendant, who was the lessee of an adjoining plot from the same lessor, commenced building so as to obstruct the access of light to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action to restrain the defendant from proceeding with his proposed buildings, and moved for an interim injunction in the Palatine Court.

The registrar, sitting for the Vice-Chancellor, refused the injunction, on the ground that the plaintiff was precluded by the terms of her lease from acquiring a right to light as against her lessor or other lessees of the estate.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

Section 3 of the Prescription Act provides "that when the access and use of light to any dwelling-house, workshop, or other building shall have been actually enjoyed therewith for the full period of twenty years without interruption, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, any local usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Clarkson, for the appellant.—The appellant, by uninterrupted enjoyment for a period of over twenty years, has acquired an indefeasible right to this light: Prescription Act, s. 3. And the circumstance of the two leases being granted by the same lessor will not prevent the plaintiff from acquiring this right: Frewen v. Phillips, 9 W. R. 786, 11 C. B. N. S. 449. The reservation in the lease of rights restricting the free use of any adjoining lands, &c., does not amount to an agreement within the proviso contained in section 3 of the Prescription Act.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and W. H. Bather, for the respondent.—The reservation contained in the lease comes within the proviso contained in section 3 of the Prescription Act, and prevents the plaintiff from acquiring a right to this light by uninterrupted enjoyment for twenty years: Bewley v. Atkinson, 28 W. R. 638, 13 Ch. D. 283.

Cozens-Hardy replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 3.—COTTON, L.J.—This was an appeal from an order of the registrar of the Palatine Court, who, without entering into the facts of the case, dismissed the action, on the ground that the lease under which the plaintiff claimed to be and was entitled to her house prevented her from bringing any action against a lessee on the same estate for obstructing her lights. The plaintiff has been in occupation of this property since 1864, and we must assume that during that period she has enjoyed the lights of her house without any interference. The defendant is now going to build, or has built, I understand, since the action was commenced, as the plaintiff alleges, so as to obstruct and interfere with her lights. That point has not been entered into, because the learned registrar dismissed the action simply on the ground that under her lease there was a proviso which prevented the plaintiff from getting any right to lights, or bringing any action with respect to interference with her lights. We must consider, therefore, if that is so. In my opinion that was an incorrect view. The question turned on one particular provision in the lease, which was a lease for 999 years, and which was granted in pursuance of a building agreement to the plaintiff, and a house had been built under the agreement at the time the lease was granted, and therefore the lease was of the plot of land without describing it "and all that dwelling-house recently erected by the said lessee on the said plot." Now comes the passage relied upon by the registrar, "and all rights and appurtenances, legal, used, or reputed, of the said plot." There is probably some inaccuracy either in copying or in the words of the deed, but it really means all appurtenances used or reputed of the said plot "except rights, if any, restricting the free use of any adjoining land, or the conversion or appropriation at any time hereafter of such land for building or other purposes, obstructive or otherwise." It is clear that this plot was part of an estate which was being used for building purposes. A similar lease to the plaintiff's was subsequently granted to the defendant. But has this clause the effect which is attributed to it by the learned registrar of preventing the plaintiff from claiming any right under the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71) because it is under that she claims her right to light? It is said that it brings the case within the proviso at the end of the 3rd section, and therefore prevents her from relying on the previous part of the section. Does it do so? The provision is this, that the right to light is granted where there has been any enjoyment of the access and use of light for twenty years, "unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for the purpose by deed or writing." Now, does this clause which I have read bring it within that? In my opinion it does not. It is not an agreement given for the purpose of the enjoyment of the light, but it is simply an exception out of the grant made of appurtenances and rights so as to prevent the lessee from urging, as against the landlord, or anybody claiming through him, before a right had been obtained by prescription, that the landlord could not derogate from his own grant, either by his own building or granting to anybody else a right to build, so as to interfere with the plaintiff's lights. That is the reasonable, and, I think, the only, meaning of this clause. It was not intended to prevent the plaintiff gaining any right under the statute; it was not an agreement as to her enjoyment of the light so as to prevent the statute from operating; but it was merely a provision to prevent her saying, in case the landlord built upon any adjoining land, that he was derogating from his own grant. But if, independently of the grant, the plaintiff has enjoyed the use of these windows for twenty years, she would have the same right as against the adjoining lessee as against a stranger. No case which was referred to in the argument supports the contention of the respondent. She has the right simply by the effect and operation, not of the grant, but of the statute, and in my opinion she is entitled to enforce that right.

Then another point was suggested—namely, that this must be considered an agreement between the landlord and the lessee that the landlord should be at liberty, if he thought fit to do anything, even although it would operate so as to interfere with the lessee's right to light, but I do not think that is the true meaning of it. If there had been an express proviso in the contract between the parties that, notwithstanding the grant to the lessee, the landlord should be at liberty to build so as to interfere with the right, that would be another thing; but there is no express provision, and in my opinion the fair and clear meaning of this clause, construing it without reference to the consequences to one party or the other, is not anything of that sort. During the twenty years before the plaintiff got the right under the statute it is true that the landlord would have been able to build, and to do anything he liked, although he obstructed the plaintiff's lights, not because there was a contract between him and the lessee, but because under the statute, during the twenty years, the plaintiff would not have got any right. In my opinion neither view can assist the defendant in this case. The case must go on to be tried. As the house has been built, I think the proper course would be to discharge the order and to direct the motion to come on with the trial of the action. If the plaintiff establishes her case, of course there will be a mandatory injunction, as through no fault of hers, but in consequence of the error of the law into which the registrar has fallen she will not be able to stop the defendant from erecting the building.

The only other point I need mention is one raised upon the case of Bewley v. Atkinson, but that has really no bearing upon this case. There there was an express agreement as to the use and enjoyment of light, and the only question there really was whether a writing signed, not by the owner of the servient tenement, but simply by the owner of the dominant tenement, would be a good agreement within the proviso in the statute; that was the point for the consideration of the court, and the Lords Justices held it was. That had no application to a case like this, where there is no express agreement as to the enjoyment of light. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal succeeds and the order which I have mentioned must be made.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As I understand the matter, the learned registrar decided against the plaintiff upon the ground that the plaintiff's lease was conclusive against her. Now has the plaintiff by the lease the right to restrain the defendant from building on the adjoining plot? The learned registrar has decided she has not, and that the lease contains a clause which is inconsistent with such a right, but that does not dispose of the case at all. The question is whether the plaintiff has not, by actual enjoyment of the access of light for twenty years, acquired something in addition to what the lease gives her. Looking at the 3rd section of the Act, it appears to me that the plaintiff's case upon that Act is unanswerable. That the plaintiff can acquire an easement to light under circumstances such as these, when both the plaintiff and defendant are under the same landlord, is settled in the case of Frewen v. Phillips. Here the plaintiff has in fact enjoyed access of light for twenty years, that fact has not been controverted, and that fact gives her a statutory right to light unless the last part of section 3 applies to this case. Now the last part of section 3 is this, after saying that access of light for twenty years may confer a right the section says, "unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed"—that is, the access of light was enjoyed—"by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing."

Now I cannot construe this document as an express deed or writing under which the right of light was enjoyed without going this length, that under and by virtue of every grant and every lease of land with a house or without a house upon it, the lessee enjoys a right of light, not because it is given or referred to in the grant or lease, but because the ownership given by the grant is within this clause, which would be to destroy the section altogether. The meaning of the last words in that clause is most obvious. It is when you find an agreement under which the light is enjoyed you must look at that agreement and see what, if any, right is given by it. Here the plaintiff falls under the words of the statute, and it appears to me the contention of the defendant is neither warranted by the words of the section nor by the proper construction of it. There is nothing except the grant coupled with the words which Cotton, L.J., has alluded to, and which obviously are for the purpose of preserving to the lessor a right, until an adverse right is acquired, of doing what he likes to the adjoining property. Under the grant he could act within the twenty years, and within that period he might have blocked up all the lights, but the statute comes in after that period has expired, and enables the plaintiff to acquire a right to these lights. I think, therefore, this appeal should be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—The question in this case is, What is the meaning of this reservation? Is it a bargain between the lessor and the lessee that the lessor is always to have the right to use the adjoining land as he thinks fit, or is it a reservation in the more limited sense? It is clear what the position would have been if this reservation had not been inserted, the lessor, after he granted the lease, could not have used the adjoining land in a way to prejudice any rights arising from the lease he had granted. If he had so done it would have been an act in derogation of his grant. I think, therefore, that the reservation means that such consequences are not to follow as would necessarily do so if the reservation had not been there—namely, that the lessee is not to be permitted to say to the lessor, "You are acting in derogation of your grant." The reservation, according to my view, cannot be used in any way to operate to prevent acquisition of a right aliunde in some other way —for instance, by the operation of the Prescription Act. It is said, however, that the case comes within the latter part of the 3rd section of the Prescription Act, which words are, "unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing." For the reasons which have already been given I am clearly of opinion it cannot be brought within those words. I think, therefore, that the view the learned registrar took was wrong, and that this appeal should be allowed, with costs.

Ex parte BISCHOFFSHEIM.
In re AYLMER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Scheme of arrangement—Approval of court—"Judgment by consent"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 18, 28, sub-section 6.

A scheme of arrangement providing that, "by consent of the debtor the trustee should enter judgment against him for full amount of the debts, and that such judgment should have effect in like manner and to a like extent as though the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt," is to be disapproved, on the ground that such a provision is an attempt to incorporate the powers given to the court in the case of a judgment by consent under section 28, sub-section 6, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that the powers given to the court under such section are not authorized to be incoporated into schemes of arrangement under section 18.

Appeal by the debtor, Aylmer, against the refusal of Mr. Registrar Giffard to approve of a scheme of arrangement.

A scheme of arrangement had been duly accepted by the creditors of Aylmer under section 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The scheme provided (inter alia) that the debtor should, prior to the approval of the scheme, consent to a "judgment by consent" being entered against him by the trustee under the scheme for the full amount of the debts provable thereunder, "such judgment to have the same effect and to be enforceable in like manner and to the like extent as though the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt under the proceedings, and as though the court had granted him an order of discharge conditional upon his so consenting to judgment and as though such judgment had been entered accordingly." There was a further provision that "such judgment should only be enforceable in respect of any balance remaining due to the creditors after giving credit for any dividends distributed by the trustee out of the assets vested in him under the scheme or out of moneys which might be paid to him by the debtor for such distribution."

The registrar held that this was an attempt to incorporate section 28, sub-section 6, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and refused on that ground to allow the scheme.

F. Cooper-Willis, for the appellant, the debtor.—The creditors have full control over the scheme without section 28. The debtor can, if in default under the scheme, be subsequently made bankrupt under section 18, sub-section 11. The powers authorized under section 28 can be incorporated into the scheme, and these are sufficient to control the debtor.

Cooper-Willis, Q.C., and Woodfall, for the respondent, an opposing creditor.—This court has decided that creditors cannot incorporate into a scheme powers other than those given under section 18: Ex parte Bischoffsheim, In re Aylmer, 35 W. R. 532, 19 Q. B. D. 33; Ex parte Whinney, In re Grant, 34 W. R. 539, 17 Q. B. D. 238; Ex parte Clark, In re Clark, 32 W. R. 775, 13 Q. B. D. (per Cotton, L.J.) 435. Consent to a judgment cannot be made in any other way than is provided by this Act, that is, under section 28, sub-section 6, and that section cannot be incorporated into a private scheme.

F. Cooper-Willis replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Many points raised and considered by us in the course of the argument have become unnecessary for our consideration now, and in accordance with the practice of this court we shall not determine points unnecessary to the present judgment. There is one point which is fatal to the adoption of this scheme. The scheme proposes that the debtor should consent to judgment. Such judgment is to have effect in like manner and to the like extent as though the debtor had been adjudged a bankrupt. If the effect of that provision is to give to the scheme the power given by section 28, sub-section 6, that is an attempt to incorporate the statutory provisions of that section of the Act. Such a provision cannot be incorporated under section 18, which authorizes schemes of arrangement. We have previously held, when this case was before us a short time ago, that section 27 of the Act cannot be so incorporated. For the same reason section 28 cannot be so incorporated. If an attempt be made under any scheme to give powers similar to those given to the court by consent of the creditors, such consent cannot give jurisdiction to the parties under the scheme which the court has not otherwise given. That attempt is made here. The scheme makes the judgments illusory and of no effect since it cannot really incorporate the powers given to the court in regard to judgments by consent under section 28, sub-section 6. Such a judgment as is here attempted to be authorized could not be enforced at common law. It could only be enforced by reference to the Act, and it fails to give effect to any judgment allowed under the Act either by consent or otherwise.

BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

MERIVALE AND WIFE v. CARSON. (a.)

Libel—Literary criticism—"Fair"—Questions for jury —Privilege.

In actions for libel conveyed in the public criticism of literary work, the only questions for the jury are, What is the meaning of the words used, and whether such meaning comes within the limits of "fair criticism"? Imputations on the private character of the author or an account of the work so false as to amount to an actual misdescription of it are outside the limits of "fair criticism." The expression of the opinion of the critic, not the opinion itself, is the criterion of "fair criticism."

Per Lord Esher, M.R.—If it could be shown that the critic had written the words complained of, not for the purpose of criticism, but with a malicious intent to injure the author, that might make a statement libellous which, if written without such intent, would not be beyond the limits of "fair criticism."

Held, further, that no question of privilege arises in reference to public criticism in accordance with the judgments in Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 11 W. R. 569.

Appeal of the defendant against the refusal of a divisional court (Mathew and Grantham, JJ.) to grant a new trial or to enter judgment for the defendant.

The action was one for a libel, as set out below, in the comments of the defendant published in a Liverpool newspaper on a play written by the plaintiffs and acted at Liverpool. The action was tried before Field, J., and a special jury. Field, J., left the following questions to the jury—(1) What construction they thought the words alleged to be libellous would naturally bear; (2) whether the words so construed exceeded the bounds of honest, fair, independent criticism? The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, with damages, 1s., and the judge entered judgment accordingly. The defendant having moved the Divisional Court for an order for a new trial on the ground of misdirection or for judgment to be entered in his favour, that motion was refused by the Divisional Court, against which refusal the defendant now appealed.

The following are the material issues and innuendoes as set out in the statement of claim:—

"On or about the 7th day of May the defendant falsely and maliciously printed and published of the plaintiffs, and of them as joint authors as aforesaid, and of them in their occupation and profession as dramatic authors, the words following in the said newspaper called the Stage—'Liverpool: Prince of Wales.—"The Whiphand," the joint production of Mr. and Mrs. Herman Merivale, gives us nothing but a hash up of ingredients which have been used ad nauseam until one rises in protestation against the loving, confiding, fatuous husband with the naughty wife and her double existence, the good male genius, the limp aristocrat, and the villainous foreigner.' . . . Meaning thereby that the said play was not original, and that the plot and action of the said play had an immoral tendency and belonged to a class of plays founded upon sexual intrigue and of a low moral character, and that the production of the said play was discreditable to authors of good literary position and repute."

"The plot of the said play is original, and is not, in fact, based upon the adultery of the principal female character, nor does the action of the play in any way turn upon the sexual immorality or intrigues of any of the characters therein. The criticism of the said play and of the plaintiffs' work as the authors thereof contained in the publication referred to is unfair and misleading."

Cock, Q.C., and Blake Odgers, for the appellant.—The occasion of the criticism was privileged. The judgments in Henwood v. Harrison, 20 W. R. 1000, L. R. 7 C. P. 606, and Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 11 W. R. 569, 32 L. J. Q. B. 185, only apply to the particular circumstances of those cases. An honest and genuine opinion, however untrue in fact, is not libellous when expressed as public criticism of a published work. To be "unfair" it must be an attack on the personal character of the author: Hibbs v. Wilkinson, 1 F. & F. 608; Eastwood v. Holmes, 1 F. & F. 347; Barwell v. Adkins, 1 M. & G. 807; Turnbull v. Bird, 2 F. & F. 508; Stevens v. Sampson, 28 W. R. 87, 5 Ex. D. 53.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Boxall, for the respondents.—The cases from 1793 onwards show that the word "fair" has generally been adopted by judges as the test word for the jury's consideration. The test of fairness is either the truth of the criticism, or, if false in fact, whether such criticism is the real, honest opinion of the writer expressed in a reasonable and moderate manner. That is reasonable which the jury, as twelve reasonable men, think so. Here the jury have found the criticism to be, in fact, untrue, and, therefore, unreasonable and, by implication, malicious. There is no especial privilege in public criticism, and, even if there were, the jury have in this case practically found malice: Macleod v. Wakley, 3 C. & P. 311; Turnbull v. Bird; Davison v. Duncan, 22 W. R. 575, L. R. 9 C. P. 396; Campbell v. Spottiswoode; Wason v. Walter, 17 W. R. 169, L. R. 4 Q. B. 73; Henwood v. Harrison.

Blake Odgers replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This was an action brought for an alleged libel in a criticism on a play written by the plaintiffs. What are the questions to be left in such a case to a jury? First, "What is the meaning in your view of the words or sentences alleged to be libellous?" The jury are to look at the context, and are to say what any reasonable person would undoubtedly understand by the published statement complained of. That is the first question to be decided. I am not prepared to say that they might not have to look at the subject criticized in order to appraise the libellous nature or otherwise of the criticism. That, however, it is not material here to consider. The jury on the trial of this action were asked to say what would a reasonable man think this particular criticism of the play would mean? The interpretation put before them by the plaintiffs was that the meaning of this statement implied that the play was of a class founded upon the incident of adultery; that no stigma was applied to such an incident; that such a play was mischievous; and that the public were asked to stigmatize the play as immoral. For the defendant it was contended that no such meaning could properly be attached to the criticism, and that the words "naughty wife" as there applied did not necessarily mean an adulterous woman. It might be a question for the judge at the trial whether in this particular play the word "naughty" could imply "adultery," and the court might come to the conclusion that it could not by any reasonable person be taken to mean "adulterous." But unless it was held that there was no evidence to go to the jury upon such a point the jury were right in putting their interpretation upon the words, and I am inclined to agree that such was the meaning of the critic.

Then what is the next question to be decided? Is it to be said that to criticize a published writing is to do something on a privileged occasion? and ought the judge to say that it is so privileged and to hold that, to whatever length the criticism may go, the verdict must be for the defendant unless the plaintiff can show the defendant to have been guilty of malice in fact—that is, that the defendant had some indirect motive for making use of a privileged occasion for a malicious attack on the plaintiff? I say unhesitatingly that that is clearly not the law. This has been for once decided in Campbell v. Spottiswoode, and over and over again accepted. That case has never been overruled, and all judges have ever since acted upon the principle there laid down, and the principle is that criticism on published matter is not criticism on a privileged occasion within the legal meaning of those words. Lord Blackburn there defines the test of a privileged occasion—namely, that a particular person may do on that occasion what no other person may do on another occasion. But as to criticism on a published work, that is not a case in which one person may do what another may not do. On the contrary, every member of the public may do the same thing, and is equally forbidden to do the same thing. The real question to be decided after the above-mentioned first question has been answered is, "Whether the criticism is or is not libellous at all?" In what form is this question to be left to the jury? That is well expressed by Crompton, J., in Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 11 W. R. 571, 32 L. J. Q. B. 200:—"Nothing is more important than that great latitude should be allowed to writers in the public press, and, indeed, to all writers, in canvassing by way of comment or criticism any public matter which may come before the world. . . . And if such a comment or criticism is made the subject of an action it is for the jury to say whether, on the whole, and without looking to minute expressions, it is a fair comment upon the subject-matter which it professes to discuss." That is the true question to be left. Upon the answer to that it depends whether the article complained of is a libel or not. By that question it is to be determined, and not any question of whether it is privileged or not? Now I am prepared to say that the meaning of "fair criticism" is this. Is it in the opinion of the jury criticism beyond what any fair-minded man, however prejudiced or strong his opinion may be—on that I would give a wide latitude—would write of the work discussed? It is easy to say what is altogether beyond that. For instance, clearly anything derogatory as to his private character is beyond that limit. The difficulty is to say what is within that limitation. That depends really so much on the circumstances of each case and requires the careful honest consideration of the jury.

What we have to decide here is whether that question was substantially left to the jury? I think it was. [His lordship then commented upon some of the phrases in Field, J.'s summing up.] If the criticism was, as Field, J., puts it, no more than what "a fair, honest, independent man" might write, even though it might be exaggerated in expression, that would come within the limit, though I think the word "fair" is sufficient, as that implies honesty, while the word "independent" is almost superfluous. Even gross exaggeration may not necessarily make the criticism "unfair." I would repeat that, however wrong the criticism may be in truth, however exaggerated, however prejudiced, all that may be within the limit, which is, Could any fair man, however strong, or exaggerated, or obstinate in his opinions he may be, regard the work criticized in this way or not? If the jury are not satisfied that the criticism is more than that there is no libel in it. The word "fair" has been used or adopted by all judges in leaving such a question to the jury, and I think it is the best word, and one sufficient without any addition to it. The way in which Crompton, J., as before mentioned, says that the question should be left to the jury, is to my mind the clearest and most satisfactory.

In the present case the answer to this second question depended to a great extent on their answer to the first. Upon their finding as to the meaning of the alleged libel, it was for them to say whether a fair-minded man could have given so wrong an account of the play that no fair man who had seen it could possibly have given of it. It is admitted by the defendant that the plot does not turn upon an adultery. In fact, that there is no adulterous incident in the play at all. To say so would be to give a misdescription of the work. If, however, the meaning attributed by the jury to the words of the criticism is correct, I cannot help concluding that such criticism was not only misleading, but carried an imputation on the character of the writer. If that is so, even though the summing up had not been so correct as it was, we should not send the case down for a new trial, since such an imputation would in itself be libellous and exceed fair criticism. But I absolutely deny that any plea of privilege for such criticism, unless proved to be malicious in fact, is capable of being legally raised after the decisions of Blackburn, J., and Crompton, J., in Campbell v. Spottiswoode. As to one other point raised by the defendant, that if the language alleged to be libellous was not beyond the limits of fair criticism no action could be supported, even though such language contained imputations which if not written in regard to a published work would be libellous, I am inclined to think that if it could be shown that the defendant in such a case had not written with a view of criticizing so much as for the purpose and with the dishonest intention of attacking the credit of the plaintiff, such writing would be libellous, because the result would not be a criticism of the work, but would be the emanation of the mind of a man writing with the intent to injure another. It would not, therefore, be within the limits of "fair criticism," but would fall within the ordinary rule of personal liability for published statements. Upon every ground I hold that this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—This case is of such an important nature that, though I could add nothing to what the Master of the Rolls has said, in all of which I entirely agree, I think it right to give one's reasons for concurring in the judgment.

I begin with asking, What is the true meaning of the words used? That question is for a jury. The jury here have found against the interpretation contended for by the defendant. We must, therefore, take it as conclusively settled, so far as we are concerned, that the critic has imputed to the author the writing of a story which turns on the adultery of a wife, so described as to lead no one to suppose that the author objected to adultery as such, but rather that he introduced it as a spicy element without any moral aspect of culpability. That is what is found by the jury. It is an acknowledged fact that the play does not admit of any such argument, that there is no adulterous wife introduced, and no such incident as the jury find implied by the criticism. Such are the facts. Let us apply the law to them. What is the true question to be left to the jury upon those facts as found by them or as admitted by the parties? I take precisely the same view as the Master of the Rolls as to the way in which the plea of privilege is to be used. This is not, in its strict legal sense, a case of privilege at all. A privileged occasion is, in the natural legal sense of the word, one where certain members of the public are clothed in quasi-immunity from what would otherwise be the legal result of their statements. Here we have to deal with the right of public criticism which every other single person enjoys. It is the right of criticizing any published work on which public judgment is invited; and the author is the last person who should complain if the work is found to be worthless. There have been different metaphysical explanations of the law as applied to this class of criticism. Willes, J., in Henwood v. Harrison, treated every such case of public comment as a branch of the general law of privilege, and found a justification of the use of such criticism in the subject-matter and the occasion of the criticism. I do not think that is so good an explanation as that given by Blackburn, J., and Crompton, J., in Campbell v. Spottiswoode. I do not believe that really it would make much difference in this case which explanation were adopted, but I prefer the latter because it leaves undisturbed the modern practice of leaving to the jury the question which a series of able judges have adopted—namely, have the limits of fair criticism been passed?

It would be more consistent to say that nothing written within that limit was libellous rather than to term such criticism privileged. Once outside that limit a writer is within the region of libel if he uses language which would bring another person into disrepute. He falls then within the ordinary law of libel. Within that limit he is not within the law of libel at all. The whole question in Campbell v. Spottiswoode, put shortly, is—What is the true meaning of "fair criticism"? By what standard is it to be judged? Criticism, to be fair, must be fairly expressed. The only limit is in the expression of such criticism. There is no limit in this country as to the opinion which may be expressed. A man has the right to hold any opinion he may choose and to express any opinion he likes, provided that in expressing it he does not transgress the limit of what the law calls "fair."

Although there may be no definition of that word in any decided case, perhaps because judges prefer to leave it to the jury to deal with such a well-known simple word, the words of Lord Tenterden in Macleod v. Wakley, 3 C. & P., at p. 312, are deserving of mention, being not unlike those just used by the Master of the Rolls: "Whatever is fair and can be reasonably said of the works of authors or of themselves, as connected with their works, is not actionable, unless it appear that, under the pretext of criticizing the works, the defendant takes an opportunity of attacking the character of the author, and then it will be a libel."

Assume that the writer is entitled to express his opinion, however wrong that may be, or however prejudiced, the only question is, Does such expression transgress this reasonable limit of criticism? It is the mode of expression, not the opinion expressed, which has alone to be considered in such cases—whether or not it is outside the region of "fair criticism."

In literature, as in politics or in religion, it is not easy to conceive at once what is outside such limit unless it be an attack on the author personally, some personal imputation. That, one can see at once, travels beyond the limit of public criticism altogether. Such was the question in Campbell v. Spottiswoode. The jury were asked whether the criticism was fair or whether it went beyond the limits of fair criticism and attacked the plaintiff's personal character. That case is an exact illustration of how criticism ceases to be fair because of its being an attack on personal character. There is another class of cases in which a person clearly travels out of the region of fair criticism—if he imputes to a writer that he has written something which he has not in fact written, so that it amounts to a misdescription of what has been in fact written. Disapproval of the moral tendency of a book or play is one thing. Many may think and others may say that such and such a book may have such tendency, however innocent the intentions of the author may have been. But to say that such a book or play contains a description of an adulterous wife when in fact no such wife is introduced into the work is to impute to a man the authorship of what there is not. That is outside the limit of criticism altogether, just as much as an imputation on a man's trade.

Such a case is Turnbull v. Bird. There there was no foundation for the statement; and, as Lord Campbell points out, it is not fair criticism to accuse a man of writing what he has not written. The question for us now is: Did the judge misdirect the jury at all, having regard to the construction of the libel as found by them? The libel was found to be the statement implying that the story turned upon adultery when it was admitted that it did not do so in fact. The judge was not called upon in such a case of manifest misdescription to go into minutiæ of illustration as to the possible meaning of the words used, as he might have been had the libel been of a different character. The jury had to deal with a positive statement of what was not. It was not a question of opinion, but of fact. If so, does not it clearly fall beyond the limit of fair criticism? and even if the summing up of the judge had not in every particular exactly defined those limits, could we, on such a state of facts, alter the findings of a jury?

I have no doubt in supporting the view of the law as laid down against the suggested plea of privilege. On the contrary, I unhesitatingly adopt that view. I have no possible doubt that a statement such as this was not mere criticism, but transgressed the limits of criticism altogether. It imputes to the author a plot which does not exist, and the jury must be taken to have found there was some other motive actuating the defendant than that of a desire for fair criticism.

Solicitor — Remuneration — Administration action—Order for sale of real estate—Sale by auction—Solicitor's charges—Auctioneer's charges—Solicitors Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44)—General Order, schedule 1, part 1, r. 11—Local custom.

A sale by auction of real property was made under an order of court in an administration action, and the conduct of the sale was given to the plaintiff, whose solicitor personally performed part of the duties of conducting the sale, the auctioneer merely offering the property in the auction room. The auctioneer was paid by the client.

Held, that the solicitor was not entitled, under the Solicitors Remuneration Order, schedule 1, part 1, r. 11, *to scale fees for his services as auctioneer, and that the existence of a local custom to the contrary did not affect this rule.

In the above-named action, which was for the administration of the estate of Frank Sykes, a testator, an order was made for the sale of his real estate in the county of York, the plaintiff having the conduct of the sale. Subsequently to the taxation of the solicitor's costs of the sale a summons was taken out to review the taxing master's certificate, and raised the question whether, under schedule 1, part 1, r. 11, of the General Order made in pursuance of the Solicitors Remuneration Act, 1881, the plaintiffs' solicitor was or was not entitled to charge scale fees for conducting the sale.

The property was advertised to be sold by auction in ten lots, and only six of them were sold.

The bill of costs carried in for taxation by the plaintiff's solicitor pursuant to an order dated the 17th of March, 1886, comprised the sum of £23 12s. 6d. for the auctioneer's fees, and the sum of £52 10s. for the surveyor's fees, the latter sum being inclusive of valuation fees.

Six other items were also entered in the bill of costs, together amounting to £31 10s., being scale charges for conducting the sale of property by public auction.

These scale charges, together with other items, were disallowed by the taxing master.

The plaintiff objected to this disallowance on the ground that the six items were the scale charges fixed by schedule 1, part 1, of the Remuneration Order as proper to be allowed to the vendor's solicitor for conducting a sale of property by public auction, including the conditions of sale when the property was sold; that there were six lots sold, and it was in respect of these lots that the charges were made; that an auctioneer was employed and paid a fee of £23 12s. 6d., but that this was merely for offering the ten lots in the auction-room, and all the real work connected with the sale was done by the solicitor.

(a.) Reported by A. D. MACLAREN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* See In re Newbould (ante, p. 161).

The plaintiff also objected to the disallowance of the sum of £17 10s., being the scale fee for conducting under the same schedule in respect of the four lots not sold calculated as directed by rule 2 on the aggregate amount of the reserved prices.

The plaintiff further objected to the disallowance of the sum of £65, being the scale fee under the same schedule for deducing title and perusing and completing conveyance, including preparation of contract or conditions of sale (if any) in respect of the four lots not sold calculated as directed by rule 2 on the aggregate amount of the reserved prices. It was submitted that the solicitor should not lose his remuneration because no sale of the four lots had been effected, and that it could not have been intended by the rules that no allowance for deducing title (which included particulars and conditions of sale) should be made to the vendor's solicitor in case of an abortive sale by auction.

A fee of ten guineas was added at the end of the bill for extra labour connected with the preparation for the auction not covered by the scale fees allowed, but it was submitted that there was no authority for substituting such an allowance for the items above referred to.

The taxing master's reasons were stated to be as follows:—That, with regard to the first six items and to the £17 10s., it would be a violation of the express terms of rule 11, schedule 1, part 1 of the Remuneration Order to allow those scale fees; and that in this case £52 10s. had been paid to a surveyor for lotting the property for sale and valuing the lots, and £23 12s. 6d. to an auctioneer for offering the lots for sale.

The case of In re Wilson, 29 Ch. D. 790, 34 W. R. Dig. 185, was referred to.

With regard to the £65 disallowed, the taxing master did not consider it possible that the solicitor could be entitled to the scale fee for "preparing contract, deducing title, and completing" in respect of the four lots not sold.

The taxing master pointed out that the solicitor was allowed the scale fees in respect of the six lots which were sold, and, in addition, he was allowed a fee of ten guineas for extra labour incidental to the sale which such fees as the scale allowed did not appear to include.

The taxing master, in the exercise of his discretion, allowed the additional fee of ten guineas, which, in his opinion, was abundant remuneration for all the additional labour not covered by the scale fees. He further observed that the abstract and conditions of sale were common to all the lots, and their length was very slightly increased by the fact that the lots not sold were offered for sale; that the length of the particulars was increased by the description of the four unsold lots; but that, as above stated, the ten guineas allowed, as above mentioned, was sufficient remuneration for the extra work, and he overruled the objections.

The taxing master subjoined a note that the objections could not have been made in the interest of the plaintiff, in whose behalf they purported to have been brought in.

It appeared that, in accordance with the prevailing practice in the North of England, the auctioneer had merely offered the lots in the auction-room and had been paid for that only, and the surveyor for valuing, measuring, surveying, and lotting the property; but that all the work in connection with making arrangements for the sale, preparing, printing, and distributing the particulars and conditions of sale, and lithographing the sale-plan, advertising in newspapers and by bill-posting, and getting a full attendance at the auction-rooms was done by the solicitor, and all the bills for printing, advertising, &c., were sent in to the solicitor and paid by him.

On the appointment to tax and also on seeing the taxing master on the objections carried in to the taxation, the plaintiff's solicitor asked the taxing master to strike out the auctioneer's charges and permit the solicitor himself to pay them; but this the taxing master declined to do, stating that when a sale took place through the court the solicitor was not allowed to pay the auctioneer.

It was contended by the plaintiff that it was the solicitor, and not the auctioneer, who had done the work, and that In re Wilson was merely a decision that when the auctioneer had done the work and been paid for it the solicitor could not charge scale fees, and that this was the construction which ought to be put on rule 11.

A summons was, therefore, taken out on behalf of the plaintiff, asking that the objections to the taxation of costs in the action might be allowed, and that it might be referred back to the taxing master to vary his certificate accordingly; and that the costs of and occasioned by this application might be taxed and paid out of the residue of certain funds in court.

The summons was adjourned into court.

Dunning, in support of the summons.

G. E. S. Fryer, contrà.

Chitty, J.—In my opinion this case falls within the principle of In re Wilson. The auctioneer's and surveyor's charges were approved by the chief clerk. The auctioneer and surveyor have not been paid by the solicitor, but by the client, and the case is, therefore, exactly within schedule 1, part 1, r. 11 of the General Order made in pursuance of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881. The plaintiff's solicitor offered to pay the auctioneer, but the taxing master was right in not permitting the solicitor to pay the auctioneer, for had the solicitor had the power to make such payment, the application in chambers to the chief clerk for his sanction to the payment would not have been required. The allowance was made for what the solicitor really did. It is said that the solicitor himself has done the business which in London usually falls within the duties of the auctioneer, but that the custom in the North of England is different from that in the South. That may be so, but inasmuch as rule 11 of the General Order does not constitute any distinction between customs obtaining in different parts of the kingdom, I have no option except to refuse this application, as I think the taxing master was perfectly right. I shall, therefore, dismiss the summons, but shall make no order as to costs.

Friend v. Shaw. (a.)

County courts—Landlord and tenant—Actions for ejectment—"Legal notice to quit"—Determination of tenancy—Jurisdiction—County Courts Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108), s. 50—1 Geo. 4, c. 87, s. 1.

A landlord having given a tenant notice to quit for forfeiture by reason of breach of covenants under a lease, brought an action for ejectment in the county court, the rent under the lease being for less than £50.

Held, that, under section 50 of the County Courts Act, 1856, the term or interest of the tenant must be determined by efflux of time or by a legal notice to quit, and that a "legal notice to quit" implied a necessary determination of the lease by law, and not under any private contract.

Held, further, that the construction of the words "legal notice to quit" was analogous to that of the words "regular notice to quit," under 1 Geo. 4, c. 87, and that the old cases decided under that statute applied.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Powell, sitting at the Greenwich County Court,

The action was one for ejectment on the ground of forfeiture by the defendant through breach of covenants under a lease. The rent of the premises was £40 per annum. The defendant, the tenant, had declined to pay the full rent on the ground that the premises were unfit for human habitation, but he continued to retain possession of them for business purposes.

Cavanagh, for the defendant.—The county court judge had no jurisdiction to try this action. His jurisdiction is limited, by section 50 of the County Courts Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108), to cases "where the term or interest of the tenant has expired by efflux of time, or been determined by a legal notice to quit. Determination by forfeiture is not included under the phrase "a legal notice to quit." Notice by law to determine a tenancy is not a notice under any special agreement. The phrase "a regular notice to quit" used in 1 Geo. 4, c. 87 is analogous, and the cases decided under the Act apply: Doe d. Conyngham Tindal v. Roe, 1 Dowl. 143; Doe d. Carter v. Roe, 10 M. & W. 607; Doe d. Cundey v. Sharpley, 15 M. & W. 558; Doe d. Tindal v. Roe, 2 B. & A. 922. Barlow v. Teal, 34 W. R. 54, 15 Q. B. D. 501, under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, also applies.

Erichsen, for the plaintiff.—The tenancy is no longer in existence after the forfeiture. The value of the premises being under £50 the county court had jurisdiction to try the action. Such a determination is within the meaning of "legal notice." Jurisdiction was a question of fact for the county court judge to determine.

Wills, J.—I am of opinion that the objection to the jurisdiction of the county court raised by the defendant must prevail. No consent by the parties can give jurisdiction where none previously exists. As to the last point raised by the plaintiff's counsel, of course, questions of facts cannot be reviewed by us, but had this case been brought before us on an application for a writ of prohibition or a certiorari, we should clearly have had power to review the determination of the tribunal below on the question of jurisdiction. As it is the application comes before us by way of appeal under the statute, and it is an application on a question of law arising out of the facts found in the action. On those facts we hold that the county court judge has made a wrong finding in law. We have no fault to find with his determination on the facts, except that we should have found otherwise upon those facts, and his decision must be altered so as to be in conformity with the law as laid down in this particular statute. The appeal is, therefore, properly instituted, and properly covers a question of law with which we have power to deal. Now, does this action fall within 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 50? In my opinion it does not. The jurisdiction there given only applies where the writ of ejectment is for rent or for premises of a value not exceeding £50 per annum. Here the rent was, indeed, below that amount, and so far the action was within the section, but then there is a further limitation of the section to cases where the tenancy has expired by efflux of time or been determined by a legal notice to quit. The words are sufficiently significant. The section does not simply refer to any notice, but only to a legal notice to quit. These words must clearly have some further meaning than the wider term, and seem to have been taken from the earlier statute referred to, where the words are "a regular notice to quit." It seems clearly to have been held that a notice given under a lease does not satisfy the meaning of the description of "a regular notice to quit." The phraseology is, indeed, altered in the later statute, but it is impossible from the wording to suppose that the meaning is in any way altered; unless, indeed, the word "legal" implies even a stricter limitation than the word "regular." This case is, therefore, almost entirely governed by the cases under the old Act, and also, apart from those decisions, by the wording of the later Act, which is in substance a legislative re-enactment of the phrase on a similar subject of legislation, and in a manner possibly still further qualifying the limitation before laid down. This is clear evidence of the enactment of the same kind of limitation as that previously laid down in the old decisions on the construction of the words. What does "legal notice to quit" mean? Some reasonable effect must be given to the word "legal." It must be meant to apply to notices to quit under such circumstances that the notice to quit follows as a matter of law from the state of things existing. That may be a vague description, but it is as near a one as I can give. It clearly was not intended to give to the county courts jurisdiction over every question of title within the limit of £50, but only over cases where no question of title arose, and where a clear determination of the term or interest had ensued, one provided for by law and not by any contractual relationship established by the parties. In this case the notice could be in one sense considered illegal. We have one case as an authority to guide us as to what is an illegal notice under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883. In that Act the expression used is "a notice by law," instead of "a legal notice to quit." That phrase, "by law," has been held, in Barlow v. Teal, to mean a notice established by law, and not by private contract. That phrase is less free from ambiguity than the one of "legal notice to quit," but undoubtedly our construction of the latter phrase is strengthened by that decision, and it also is in harmony with the current of decisions under the older Act of George IV. I am of opinion that the defendant's contention is sound, and that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to deal with this action.

Grantham, J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot imagine a case to which our judgment on this point could be more applicable. The causes of action are complicated and of a kind most desirable for the High Court to deal with. The county courts, indeed, at the time of the passing of the Act under consideration, had not the same extended jurisdiction as has since been given to them, but we must look at their then jurisdiction rather than at present views regarding their capabilities. It was never intended at that time to give them jurisdiction such as would cover this case. If this were the first case on the point, whether such a notice to quit as is now before us is equivalent to a legal notice to quit, there might be some room for doubt, but now we have got far beyond that. Decision after decision under kindred Acts and kindred legislation have been cited, and we should clearly not be justified in giving any decision contrary to these.

Appeal allowed.

Practice—Costs—Reference—High Court and county court scale—Rules of 1883, ord. 65, r. 12.

An action on a partnership account was by consent referred to an arbitrator. The terms of reference were that "all matters in difference between the parties in the action" were to be referred, and that "the costs of the action" should abide the award. Subsequently to this order of reference, the parties agreed to submit to the arbitrator a further matter of account outside the action. The arbitrator awarded £40 to the plaintiff on his claim, and found that a further sum of £14 2s. was due to him on the subsequent account.

Held, that the plaintiff had recovered "in the action" less than £50, and therefore came under the provisions of ord. 65, r. 12, of the Rules of 1883, whereby the costs recoverable are limited to county court costs in actions of contract where less than £50 is recovered, unless by leave of the court the High Court scale is allowed.

Appeal from an order of Field, J., at chambers.

This action was one on a partnership account which had been referred by consent to an arbitrator. By the terms of the reference "all matters in difference between the parties in this action are to be referred, and the costs of the action are to abide the award."

The arbitrator found that £40 was due to the plaintiffs from the defendant up to the date of the issue of the writ. He further stated that "by consent of parties subsequent to the order of reference it was agreed that the reference should include not only the state of accounts between the parties up to the date of the commencement of the action, but also a certain account of £14 2s., which had arisen subsequently." And he found that this sum was also due from the defendant, making up the total amount due to the plaintiff to be £54 2s., with costs.

The plaintiff applied to Field, J., at chambers, to have these costs taxed on the High Court scale, in accordance with ord. 65, r. 12, as being for an amount over £50, which scale Field, J., allowed; and against this order the defendant now appealed.

Trevor White, for the defendant.—The terms of the reference limited the award of the arbitrator and the costs to matters "in the action," and only "costs in the action" were to abide the award. The plaintiff only recovered £40 in the action. The account as to the remaining £14 was by consent referred to the arbitrator, and the costs as to that were in his discretion; but neither that account nor the costs come within the original reference, and the amount recovered under that being less than £50 the costs must be on the county court scale.

Willes Chitty, for the plaintiff.—The total amount recovered by the judgment in the action exceeds £50. There is only one judgment, and that is for £54 2s.: Ferguson v. Davidson, 30 W. R. 462, 8 Q. B. D. 470, per Brett, L.J. The amount is to be tested by the verdict, and the finding of the arbitrator is equivalent to a verdict under section 5 of the County Courts Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142). The matter is one for the discretion of the court, and upon the merits the plaintiff is entitled to High Court costs.

Wills, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal ought to succeed. The order of reference as agreed to by the parties ordered that "all matters of difference in this action" were to be referred to an arbitrator, and "the costs in the action" were to abide the award. The parties subsequently agree to submit to the arbitrator certain matters of difference not included in the action. The award is separable. Up to the date of the action the arbitrator finds that £40 only is due to the plaintiff, but that a further sum of £14 2s. is also due on a matter outside the action, and possibly outside the terms of the reference altogether. At any rate, this second sum was due after the cause of action accrued and after the writ in the action was issued. The costs of the action are not to abide the gross event of the award, whatever that might be, but the event, so far as it was applicable to the action.

As to costs outside the action itself, they are not really provided for by the provisions of the reference. That expression must be read divisibly: the costs of the action are to abide the legal event of the award, which is for £40. That is clear, and I should only hesitate to be of that opinion because of the decision of Field, J. As it is, I cannot, however, doubt that that is the proper way to treat this award. Otherwise the result would be most unfortunate, because the defendant, who had agreed to refer this other matter to the arbitrator, very reasonably, in order to put an end to further disputes, would find himself saddled with High Court costs; whereas, if he had declined—as he had a right to do—to submit this outside question, the costs must have been on the county court scale. He cannot be held to have agreed to any such result. Such would be an unreasonable decision. The words of the reference are very clear, and I think it would be going contrary to the statute to hold otherwise.

As to the fact that only one judgment is signed for the whole amount, that is a mere method of avoiding the signing of two judgments for the amounts separately; and the mere signing of such judgment for £54 does not affect the legal result of the award in the action, which is for £40. The costs of that award are to abide that event; and that is £40 and no more.

Grantham, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I should have been sorry if we could not have found that this result was right in law. As it is, I have no doubt of the legal effect of the judgment in this action, which is an award for £40.

The Court further held that, on the merits of the case, the costs should only be allowed on the county court scale.

Appeal allowed.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH TRUST CO. v. FLATAU. (a.)

Practice—Indemnity—Principals and surety—Claim against co-defendant—Judgment under ord. 16, r. 55.

A defendant who is entitled to an indemnity from a co-defendant upon a special agreement is entitled to sign judgment against his co-defendant for the amount of his (the defendant's) liability before he has actually paid anything in discharge of it.

This was an action brought by a limited company against a firm consisting of Messrs. John Nathaniel Flatau, Alfred Louis Elborough, William Charriere Elborough, and Charles Edward Eden, for a sum of £4,000 for money lent. Proceedings were taken under order 14 and judgment was signed against all the defendants except the defendant Eden, who obtained leave to defend on bringing the whole sum into court. Eden, who had been indemnified against liability for the money, then took out a summons under ord. 16, rr. 52, 55, for leave to sign judgment against his co-defendants Flatau and Messrs. Elborough, upon their agreement to indemnify him, or for directions.

The question was referred to Pollock, B., at chambers, who refused the application.

The defendant Eden appealed.

Sidney Woolf, for the appellant.—It is true that the general rule is that an ordinary surety cannot sue the principal debtor until he has been compelled to pay something to the creditor. But this case is different. Here there was a special indemnity agreement between Flatau and Messrs. Elborough of the one part and Eden of the other. Under that special agreement Eden is entitled to sign judgment, because the amount which he would ultimately have to pay the creditor cannot be affected by the alleged counter-claim. Ord. 16, rr. 52, 55, applies to this case, as there is here "no real issue to be tried."

Mews, for the defendants Flatau and Messrs. Elborough.—Flatau has a counter-claim for negligence, which would be an answer to any claim against him by Eden. He ought not to be deprived of any right of defence when he shows that there is a question to be tried: Gloucestershire Banking Co. v. Phillips, 32 W. R. 522, 12 Q. B. D. 533. The Judicature Act gave no new remedy; it only altered procedure. The money not having been paid by Eden judgment cannot be given against Flatau. That was the case before the Judicature Act both in law and equity, and it has not been altered. Under the old Bankruptcy Rules a surety could not prove for a contingent debt. A man must have been compelled to pay, not merely compellable: Exall v. Partridge, 8 T. R. 308. An action quia timet in equity would not have gone so far as to include a claim like this: Padwick v. Stanley, 9 Hare, 627.

Chitty, for the plaintiffs.—Under rule 55 the plaintiffs are entitled to be paid at once, and it will prejudice them if judgment is given against Flatau and any delay is interposed. They are also entitled to select whom they will go against. The notice by third parties and the giving of directions is only resorted to when the defendants defend the action. Here there is no defence, and the object of the rule—namely, the prevention of a second trial of the same question—cannot arise. Eden is out of time for paying money into court, and he has no defence whatever to the action. The plaintiffs are entitled to immediate judgment.

A. L. SMITH, J.—This is an application by way of appeal from the decision of Pollock, B., at chambers, who refused to act as requested under rule 55 of order 16. I think that if all the facts had been before Pollock, B., he would have come to the same decision as we have in this case.

The English and Scottish Trust Co. (Limited) lent Flatau £4,000, for which Eden and Messrs. Elborough were security. At the same time indemnity was given by Flatau to Messrs. Elborough by an agreement dated the 19th of March, 1887; and a further special indemnity was given by Flatau and Messrs. Elborough to Eden, they being the principal debtors. This latter agreement was made known to the plaintiffs, who took by way of surety the names of Messrs. Elborough.

In September the plaintiffs issued a writ against Flatau and the sureties, and on the 1st of October they recovered judgment against Flatau and Messrs. Elborough by default, but Eden obtained leave to defend upon payment of £4,000 into court. It is sworn that the plaintiffs' and Messrs. Elborough's solicitors are the same, and it is suggested that they will not take proper steps to get this money from the principal debtor, although they are aware of the indemnity.

Under these circumstances Eden served a third party notice on Flatau and Messrs. Elborough, and asked the court to bring into play ord. 16, r. 55. Under rule 52 of that order, the provisions of which apply when the court is satisfied that there is no real issue to be tried, it may order such judgment as the nature of the case may require to be entered, in favour of the defendant giving the notice, against the third party.

Eden says that he is entitled to judgment against Flatau, but it is urged that he cannot sue upon that agreement until he has paid the money. In my judgment, upon a special bargain such as this is Eden is entitled to sue as soon as he shows legal liability. In Bullen and Leake, sub. tit. Contract of Indemnity, I find that in averring damage the author says, "whereby the plaintiff became liable to pay." That is not an authority, but as only one or two of these counts has ever been found defective—so far as I know—it is very good ground for believing that there is authority.

The case of Randal v. Roper, 6 W. R. 445, 27 L. J. Q. B. 266, is an express authority as to the right to sue upon a special bargain. This has no reference to a count for money paid. The first point, therefore, taken by the defendant Flatau in my opinion fails. Then it is said that Flatau has a counter-claim against Eden. I have taken the trouble to look at the counter-claim, and I can see nothing in it whatever. In my opinion the claim is an undefended one and Eden is entitled to judgment. I think the proper order should be that Eden be at liberty to sign judgment forthwith against Flatau, and that his solicitor gives a personal undertaking for the payment of any money received under the judgment into court, and that Eden have another week to pay the sum of £4,000. I do not think that the plaintiffs can be prejudiced by such an order.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether a suit can be brought upon a special agreement to indemnify when no money has been paid under it. I think it can. An express contract of indemnity differs in this from an ordinary suretyship contract. Randal v. Roper is an authority for saying that money need not necessarily have been paid before action brought. There it was held that a first purchaser could sue his vendor for what he was bound to pay, though he had not yet paid, to a sub-purchaser. Flatau, in my opinion, has no answer to the action, and his counter-claim has no substance in it. The plaintiffs will not, in my opinion, be prejudiced by the judgment suggested by my brother Smith, with which I concur.

REG. v. MAYOR OF POOLE. (a.)

Municipal corporation—Liability to repair highway—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 144 —Form of indictment—"Against the form of the statute."

An indictment having been preferred against a municipal corporation for non-repair of a highway within their borough, a verdict was found for the Crown.

The indictment did not show on the face of it the kind of liability sought to be imposed upon the defendants, nor did it contain any statement as to the neglect alleged being "against the form of the statute."

Held, that the defendants were entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto on the grounds that (1) the indictment was bad beyond power of amendment; (2) they were not indictable for non-repair under the Public Health Act of 1875, although they might be if the preliminary steps required by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 20, were taken.

Rule nisi for a new trial on the grounds of misdirection and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, or for judgment non obstante veredicto.

Two indictments were preferred against the defendants, the Mayor and Corporation of Poole, as the urban sanitary authority of the district, for the non-repair of two highways, and alleging respectively that "the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the town and county of the town and borough of Poole, acting by the council as the sanitary authority for the urban sanitary district of the said town and county and district, ought to repair and amend the said common highway being in decay as aforesaid when and as often as it shall be necessary." There was no allegation to show how the defendants were liable, nor any statement as to the neglect alleged being "against the form of the statute."

The indictments having been removed by certiorari, were tried by Mathew, J., and a special jury at the Dorchester Assizes, and a verdict was found for the Crown. The learned judge at the trial intimated his willingness to make any amendment within his powers, though no amendment was, in fact, made.

B. Fossett Lock (Charles, Q.C., with him) showed cause.—The urban sanitary authority is indictable. The duty of repairing is expressly imposed on them by section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, by which the streets are also vested in them. Indictment is the proper remedy. Under section 144 they are not merely surveyors of highways, but also have all the "powers, authorities, duties, and liabilities" under the Highway Acts of the inhabitants in vestry assembled of any parish within the district. Consequently all the machinery by which the inhabitants, if indicted, could silence inter se their liability, has been taken from them and given to the sanitary authority, including the power to make rates to defray expenses, which in urban sanitary districts are to be paid out of the general district rate: Public Health Act, 1875, s. 216. This was not the case in R. v. St. George's, Hanover-square, 3 Camp. 222, which was also the converse of the present case. Under the Public Health Acts it was clearly intended by the Legislature that the authority should be indictable and that the inhabitants should not. And this was right, for the sanitary authority is a corporation. When the liability to repair is imposed on a corporation, whether by presumption or otherwise, the inhabitants cease to be liable: R. v. St. Giles', Cambridge, 5 M. & S. 260, 2 Inst. 700. This indictment is sufficient. The defendants are indicted as the urban sanitary authority, which is a creature of statute only, therefore statutory liability is alleged. It is not necessary to state the particular statute if the offence be described in the words of the statute. Here the words of section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, are substantially followed. Nor is it necessary to add "against the form of the statute." No indictment is bad for "want of a proper or formal conclusion": 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24; Reg. v. Castro, 29 W. R. 669, 6 App. Cas. 229. There is no ground for the suggestion that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

Alderson Foote, in support of the rule.—The form of the indictment is bad in that it does not show that a statutory obligation is relied on or how that obligation arose. The defendants are not indictable under the Public Health Act, 1875. They are in the position of the old surveyors of highways, who could not be indicted for neglect: Young v. Davis, 11 W. R. 735, 1 H. & C. 197. The procedure by which the statutory duty could be enforced would be summary proceedings for a penalty under section 20 of the Highway Act, 1835, or by application to justices under sections 94, 95. There is no power by statute to proceed against an urban sanitary authority by the old common law indictment which could be preferred against the inhabitants of a parish. Lastly, the roads in question were not laid out under the Inclosure Act (42 Geo. 3, c. 109, s. 9).

The following cases were also cited: Parsons v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, 16 W. R. 85, L. R. 3 C. P. 56; Gibson v. Mayor of Preston, 18 W. R. 689, L. R. 5 Q. B. 218; Loughborough Highway Board v. Curzon, 34 W. R. 621, 17 Q. B. D. 344; Hartnall v. Ryde Commissioners, 11 W. R. 963, 4 B. & S. 361, 12 W. R. Dig. 60; Ohrby v. Ryde Commissioners, 12 W. R. 1079, 5 B. & S. 743; Kent v. Worthing Local Board, 31 W. R. 583, 10 Q. B. D. 118; Smith v. West Derby Local Board, 27 W. R. 137, 38 L. T. N. Cur. adv. vult.

July 6.— The judgment of the court (Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and DENMAN, J.) was delivered by Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., who, after stating the facts, continued as follows:—As regards the omission of the words "against the form of the statute," it is laid down in Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, vol. 4, Indictment, s. 116, that "If an offence indicted be only prohibited by statute, and not by common law, and the indictment do not conclude 'contra formam statuti,' it is wholly insufficient, and no judgment can be given upon it." This appears to have been decided in several cases, and we think it is applicable to a case like the present, where a criminal neglect of duty is charged against a corporation, who, in the absence of a statute, would clearly not be persons liable to be indicted for the non-repair of a highway.

So far from containing anything to cure this defect in the indictment, we find that the statutes relating to indictments are so worded as to exclude any power to amend this particular defect, or to authorise us to treat it as immaterial. The power of amendment of indictments is very limited. The 9 Geo. 4, c. 15 was confined to the case of variances between the record and any matter in writing or print produced in evidence in misdemeanours. The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46 only carried the power further by applying the same provision to all criminal trials. The 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 1, enumerates the cases in which amendment is to be allowed. They are numerous; but there is no power given to amend by inserting the words "against the form of the statute" in cases where a statutable misdeameanour is proved and the words have been omitted. The 24th section of that same Act seems conclusive against any such power; for it deals with the very words in a manner wholly inconsistent with any such intention. Again, referring to Hawkins, vol. 4, s. 117, we find this passage: "If there be more than one statute concerning the same offence, and the first of them was never discontinued, and the latter only continue the power without making any addition to it or only qualify the method of proceeding upon it, without altering the substance of its provision, it seems agreed that it is safer in an indictment on any such statute to conclude 'contra formam statuti,' and it hath been holden that a conclusion 'contra formam statutorum' will in such cases vitiate the prosecution."

With this before him, in a statute intended to get rid of all over-technical objections to indictments in kindred respects, the draftsman of section 24 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 100 has provided as follows: "No indictment for any offence shall be held insufficient" (amongst other things) "for the insertion of the words 'against the form of the statute' instead of 'against the form of the statutes,' or vice versâ." We think it impossible to read this clause without being convinced that the framer of the enactment deliberately abstained from enacting that in a case where the liability to do an act was imposed by statute, and an indictment was preferred for the violation of a duty so imposed, it should be henceforth competent to the prosecutor to treat the case exactly in the same way in which it would be treated if the neglect alleged were that of a duty imposed by the common law.

Then arises the question whether this is a formal defect apparent on the face of the indictment, or an objection which cannot be taken after the jury are sworn, according to section 25 of the same Act. The very authorities referred to in the passages in Hawkins, above cited, were to the effect that the omission to conclude "contra formam statuti" was a fatal objection in arrest of judgment. We do not think that the objection can be considered a formal one any more than the omission of the word "feloniously" would be upon a charge of arson, or "scienter" in a case of receiving, which was held to be incurable after verdict by Lord Campbell and the court of criminal appeal in Reg. v. Larkin, 2 W. R. 496, only two years after the passing of the statute. The indictment fails to give the defendants notice of the kind of liability which it is intended to fix them with. The cases of Reg. v. Sill, 1 W. R. 147, 22 L. J. (M. C.) 41, and Reg. v. Lardin are illustrations of the distinction between mere formal defects and defects of which advantage may be taken after verdict.

We think section 25 of the Act must be construed with reasonable reference to section 24, and that for the reasons already given it would be contrary to the intention of the Act to hold that either section was intended to repeal the law as laid down in Hawkins. We therefore think that the defendants are entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto on this ground.

We are confirmed in our opinion that the above objection is fatal by the consideration that the questions raised by Mr. Foote as to the liability of the defendants are questions of very great nicety, and that, if the defendants are liable under the statutes to an indictment at all, it is not unreasonable to require that the circumstances creating their liability should be shown on the face of the indictment in such a way that the court might see whether the indictment does or does not show a legal liability; or, at least, that the indictment should inform the defendants whether they are being prosecuted for a common law or a statutory offence.

But, even assuming that in this case the indictment is sufficient without amendment, or, if not, that an amendment could be and was made, we are of opinion that the defendants are entitled to judgment. The liability of the defendants as urban sanitary authority is created by section 144 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The first branch of that section makes the urban sanitary authority subject to all the liabilities of surveyors of highways under the law for the time being in force. No authority has been cited to show that a surveyor of highways (against whom it was decided long ago in Young v. Davis that an action will not lie) was ever liable to be indicted for the non-repair of a highway. The only persons liable to be indicted were the inhabitants of the parish or the other person or persons liable to bear the burden of repair (see Loughborough Highway Board v. Curzon.) The case of Gibson v. Mayor of Preston, in which all the authorities were reviewed, is entirely to this effect, and is recognized, though distinguished, in Kent v. Worthing Local Board, the only case in which a local board has been held liable to an action for an omission of any of the duties in relation to highways imposed upon them by the Public Health Act, 1875. That case, however, was decided wholly upon the difference or supposed difference between the mere neglect to repair highways and what the court held to be the doing of an act in such a way as to become a nuisance, a distinction which must be considered doubtful after the case of Moore v. Lambeth Waterworks Co. in the Court of Appeal, in which it is spoken of as the only case in which a local board had been held liable for an act of omission or a mere nonfeasance, and said to be a case only to be supported on grounds quite inapplicable to a case of mere non-repair of a highway.

One conclusive reason for holding that a surveyor could not be indicted for the non-repair of a highway is that, by the law existing as long as surveyors were the only persons appointed for the purpose of attending to such matters on behalf of a parish, at all events since 5 & 6 Will. 4, the surveyor could be punished by specific methods provided by statute; so that it sufficiently appeared from the statute regulating their conduct that it was the intention of the Legislature to provide a different punishment for disobedience to the statute from a prosecution by indictment.

Section 20 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50 provides that for any neglect of duty for which no particular penalty is by that Act imposed the surveyor shall forfeit £5. Section 144 of the Public Health Act, 1875, also provides that the urban sanitary authority shall be subject to all the duties and liabilities which, by the Highway Act, 1835, or any Act amending the same, are vested in and given to the inhabitants in vestry assembled.

But the liability to an indictment at common law cannot be intended to be a liability which was imposed upon the inhabitants in vestry assembled. No assembly of the vestry was required to constitute such liability. Nor was it a liability imposed by the Highway Act or any other Act. It existed wholly independently of the Acts, though the Acts contained certain provisions limiting the cases in which, and the terms upon which, indictments might be successfully preferred in accordance with the provisions of the Acts. There is nothing, as far as we can see, in the 144th section of the Public Health Act, 1875, nor in any of the existing Acts, to make the urban sanitary authority liable to a common law indictment for neglecting those duties which they have imposed upon them either as surveyors of the highways or as inhabitants in vestry assembled. If their liability is to be established in the latter capacity we think it could only be upon an indictment preferred according to the provisions of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, after the preliminary steps thereby required, and not as persons liable at common law, to be indicted as though they were the persons liable for repair in the same sense in which the parish or other persons liable ratione tenuræ are liable.

Mr. Foote relied upon another point—viz., that the roads in question had not been set out under the Inclosure Acts. But this was a point, as we understood, not raised at the trial—at all events, not so insisted upon as that we should be justified in setting aside the verdict. It is a matter which might very easily have been taken as proved in the absence of special attention being called to it. But, for the reasons given above, we are of opinion that the defendants are entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto, the indictments not alleging a case of liability in the defendants upon which the jury were warranted in finding any verdict against them and the statute not creating any such liability, even if the indictment had alleged all the circumstances upon which the prosecution relied.

Judgment for the defendants.

Note.—Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Denman, J., have recently announced that when they expressed their view of the proper interpretation to be placed on the words of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24, they were not aware that the section had been otherwise interpreted by the House of Lords in Reg. v. Castro. If the decision had been present to their minds it would have been their duty to defer to it. So much, therefore, of the judgment of the Divisional Court as conflicts with the decision of the House of Lords should not be considered as good law.

Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), s. 70, and schedule—Ad valorem duty—Conveyance on sale—Compulsory sale under Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 19)—Compensation for loss of business.

A railway company gave notice to the owners of certain saw-mills of their intention to purchase their premises compulsorily. A jury summoned under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, assessed a certain sum as the value of the land and buildings and £9,500 as compensation for loss of business. The conveyance to the railway company recited these assessments.

The Stamp Act of 1870 provides in the schedule for an ad valorem duty on every "conveyance on sale of any property," to be calculated upon the "amount or value of the consideration for the sale," and, by section 70, "conveyance on sale" includes "every instrument . . . whereby any property, upon the sale thereof, is legally or equitably transferred to or vested in the purchaser."

By section 48 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the jury shall deliver their verdict as to the "value of lands to be purchased."

Held, that the total sum, including the £9,500, assessed by the jury was the value of the lands to be purchased, and, as part of the consideration for the sale, was liable to the ad valorem duty.

Decision of the Court of Session (reported 13 Court Sess. Cas., 4th series, 480) reversed.

This was an appeal from the First Division of the Court of Session as the court of exchequer in Scotland, upon a case stated under the Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), s. 19.

In 1885 the respondent company gave notice to Messrs. Sommerville & Co., saw-millers, of their intention to purchase their premises for the purposes of the railway.

A jury summoned under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 19), assessed the compensation to be paid as follows:—£28,586 2s. 1d. as the value of the land, £14,572 16s. 3d. as the value of the buildings, &c., and £9,499 8s. 3d. as compensation for loss of business.

A conveyance of the property was executed, which recited these findings of the jury, and the appellants claimed duty on the total sum, the respondents contending that the £9,499 8s. 3d. ought to be excluded, as not being, in fact, part of the consideration for the sale.

Section 48 of the Act of 1845 provides that "Where such inquiry shall relate to the value of lands to be purchased, and also to compensation claimed for injury done or to be done to the lands held therewith, the jury shall deliver their verdict, by a majority of their number, separately for the sum of money to be paid for the purchase of the lands required for the works . . . and for the sum of money to be paid by way of compensation for the damage (if any) to be sustained by the owner of the lands by reason of severing of the lands . . ."

The schedule of the Stamp Act, 1870, provides that an ad valorem duty shall be paid on every "conveyance or transfer on sale of any property (except, &c.,), where the amount or value of the consideration for the sale does not exceed £5 . . . 6d.," &c.

Section 70 of the Stamp Act, 1870, provides that "the term 'conveyance on sale' includes every instrument . . . whereby any property upon the sale thereof is legally or equitably transferred to or vested in the purchaser . . ."

The Court of Session (dissentiente Lord Shand) held that the £9,499 8s. 3d. was not part of the consideration.

The appellants appealed to the House of Lords.

May 20.—MacDonald (Lord Advocate), Sir R. Webster, A.G., Robertson, S.G. (Scotland), and A. J. Young (of the Scotch bar), for the appellants.—Sections 3, 48, and 74 of the Act of 1845 show that the only duty the jury can perform in such a case as this is to assess the value of the property, and that value in this case is the total sum awarded, including the £9,500 for loss of business.

They cited Potter v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 10 Ex. 147, and Pile v. Pile, 24 W. R. 1003, 3 Ch. D. 36.

Balfour, Q C. (of the Scotch bar), and R. S. Wright, for the respondents.—This sum is awarded for loss of business solely, and not as part of the price. If Sommerville & Co. had been occupiers only, they would have received this sum, although they conveyed nothing to the railway company.

No reply was required.

Lord Halsbury, C.—I cannot say that any doubt has been infused into my mind by the arguments which have been addressed to us by Mr. Balfour and Mr. Wright. The matter seems to me to be an exceedingly plain one. That which the railway company had, under the powers of the Act, power to do was to take land compulsorily from the owners, and the statute has provided the machinery by which the price at which it is to be taken should be ascertained. The parties may, if they please, agree, but, if they do not agree, the price is to be ascertained as between them, and two subject-matters are dealt with by the statute—one the value of the property so taken, and the other the question of severing the property so taken from the lands held therewith.

The 48th section of the statute is that which in truth we are at present construing; because this is a proceeding under the 48th section, and, although the other sections may be quoted to throw light upon, and to interpret the language of that section, that which your lordships are at present considering is proceedings under the 48th section. That section expressly provides:—"Where such inquiry shall relate to the value of lands to be purchased, and also to compensation claimed for injury done, or to be done, to the lands held therewith, the jury shall deliver their verdict," and so on; and the latter part of the section refers to severance. The two things, and the only two things, which are within the ambit and contemplation of the statute, are the nature of the lands, and such damages as may arise to other lands held therewith by reason of the particular land which is taken being taken from them.

Now that seems to be at the foundation of the whole argument. That was alone what the jury in this case had power to assess, because it is admitted that no question arises here upon the other part of the section, no question arises here about any damage from severance. It is admitted, therefore, impliedly that the only thing which the jury had here to assess was the value of the land. Of course, the word "value" is a relative term, and in ascertaining what is the value of the land it is extremely common, indeed it is inevitable, to go into a great number of circumstances by which that which is proper compensation to be paid for the transfer of one man's property to another is to be ascertained. A whole nomenclature has been inserted by gentlemen who devote themselves to the consideration of such questions, and sometimes I cannot help thinking that the language which they have employed, so familiar and common in respect of such subjects, is treated as though it were the language of the Legislature itself. We, however, must be guided by what the language of the Legislature is. Now the language of the Legislature is this, that what the jury have to ascertain is the value of the land. In treating of that value, the value under the circumstances to the person who is compelled to sell (because the statute compels him to do so) may be naturally and properly and justly taken into account; and when such phrases as "damages for loss of business" or "compensation for the goodwill" taken from the person are used in a loose and general sense they are not inaccurate for giving verbal expression to what everybody understands as a matter of business; but, in strictness, the thing which is to be ascertained is the price to be paid for the land—that land with all the potentialities of it, with all the actual use of it by the person who holds it, is to be considered by those who have to assess the compensation. As Mr. Balfour has pointed out, the language used in this narrative may not, perhaps, be strictly accurate. I am by no means certain that it is; but suppose it is not, suppose that the jury or the conveyancer who drew this deed has, in the narrative, introduced a description of the different elements by which the gross sum is to be ascertained, and has inaccurately used phrases not altogether appropriate to the particular transaction which they describe, what does that come to? The thing which the railway company had to pay, and the thing which the owners of the land had to transfer by this compulsory process, was, on the one hand, £52,658 6s. 7d., including this £9,499 8s. 3d., and, on the other hand, the lands and premises which were the subject-matter of the transaction.

Under these circumstances it seems to me to be beyond all doubt that that which is to be paid as stamp duty is the ad valorem stamp on the transaction itself which conveyed from the one to the other that which by the process of this Act of Parliament is ascertained to be the value; and that is, under the express language of the 48th section, the value of the land. If it is the value of the land, it cannot be doubted that the ad valorem stamp must be put upon that value. It appears to me, therefore, beyond all doubt that the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed, and that your lordships ought to affirm the original judgment of the commissioners, and so I move your lordships.

Lord Watson.—I also am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Session in this case cannot be sustained. The learned judges of the majority appear to me to have fallen into error from assuming that the Lands Clauses Act authorizes persons whose property is taken to claim, and compels railway companies to pay, something in the nature of personal damage. That view is very distinctly expressed by Lord Muir; but it appears to me to be entirely inconsistent with the provisions of the Act. As I read these provisions, the statute authorises, in the first place, compensation for land or an interest in land. By "compensation" is meant an equivalent for that which the railway company take and acquire, and which the proprietor gives up to them. Then, in the second place, these provisions contemplate damages for injury occasioned to lands which are not taken, by reason of the execution of the company's works upon the land taken.

In this case the jury, following the terms of the claim which was lodged by the landowner in answer to the notice to treat given by the railway company, have found the former entitled to £9,500 for loss of business. I do not think that claim would be sustainable if the words in which it is described did correctly express the legal category to which the claim itself belongs. You cannot discover, from the words which are used to describe the sum, that it was claimed as compensation for an interest in land; but I entertain no doubt whatever that it was meant to do so, and that it was so treated by the jury. In assessing the value of the property, or, in other words, the consideration which the railway company ought to pay for the land, or interest in land which they take, it has become the practice of claimants to state the various items into which that price or consideration is capable of being resolved, and ask the jury to consider these separately.

When a proprietor, instead of letting his land to a tenant, occupies it himself for the purposes of trade, that is a special kind of occupancy which must be taken into account in estimating the value of the land; and the claim made here, which was affirmed by the jury to the extent of £9,500, was obviously intended to cover the loss which Somerville & Co. sustained by reason of their having to give up the occupancy of the saw-mills which the railway company took for the purposes of their undertaking. Upon that footing it is an item of value which is rightly included in the price. In the view which the majority of the court below seem to have taken of it it was an item which could not be made matter of charge against the railway company. The Lord President points out what is perfectly true—that occupancy may be severed from ownership. The owner may let to a tenant, and in that case the proprietor's claim would cover only the first two items in the finding of the jury. Upon the third item the railway company would in that case have to deal with the tenant, and to satisfy his claim for loss of occupancy, which would be greater or less according to the duration of his lease. But then the learned judge goes on to say this, comparing the case of a proprietor occupying his own premises for the purposes of trade with the case of his letting them to other traders:—"Now, does it make any difference that the two characters of proprietor and tenant or occupier are combined in the same person, or does that circumstance of the combination of these two characters affect the nature of the compensation for loss of business which was awarded by the verdict of the jury? I think not." Upon that point I cannot come to the same conclusion as his lordship. Occupancy is a right incidental to property; it passes with a disposition of property, unless it has been severed from it by a lease, in which case the tenant's right becomes a burden upon that of the proprietor. The difference between the two cases, and to my mind the essential difference, is this, that in one case the disposition of Sommerville & Co. carries the whole right of occupancy from the date of entry specified in the deed, in the other case it would not carry any right of occupancy until the expiry of the tenant's lease, and therefore no such item as this could have been claimed by the owner had the currency of the lease been for a considerable period.

It is argued that the sum of £9,500 is not consideration for any right taken by the company or conveyed to the company by Sommerville & Co. If I am right in saying that it is a sum paid in respect of the company taking from them, and becoming possessed of, their exclusive right of occupancy, that is not so. The deed of conveyance, in which the consideration is inserted, gives the company the right of occupancy. So far as I know it is their only title to it; and if Sommerville & Co. refused to give up possession, the railway company's remedy would lie in founding upon the deed of conveyance as giving them the right of occupancy; they have no other title, so far as I can see. In these circumstances I cannot doubt that they have got in return for that sum the very subject, the very interest in the estate, for which it was intended that compensation should be given.

Upon these grounds I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed.

Lord Fitzgerald.—For the reasons given by the noble and learned lord, the Lord Chancellor, and by the noble and learned lord opposite (Lord Watson), I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the 22nd of January, 1886, by which the Court of Exchequer in Scotland determined "that the sum of £9,499 8s. 3d. sterling is not to be reckoned part of the consideration for the sale on which the conveyance mentioned in the case was granted," should be reversed, and that the determination of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue should be restored.

The conveyance in question is undoubtedly a conveyance on the sale of property, whereby property was legally transferred to the railway company. What was the property so transferred? The lands in question—the conveyance of the lands carrying by its very force the right to the immediate possession—and thus determining the occupation of the vendor. From the conveyance the £9,499 8s. 3d. seems to have been apportioned by the jury as compensation for loss of business. But how was that loss occasioned? The answer must necessarily be, by the determination on the conveyance of the vendors' right to possession and occupation of the lands. The conveyance then appropriately goes on to say, "said three sums amounting in all to the sum of £52,658 6s. 7d." That sum, no matter how you may subdivide it, no matter how you deal with it, is the price to be paid by the railway company in one shape or other for the right to the lands and the immediate occupation, and, in my judgment, forms the consideration for the sale.

Lord Macnaghten.—I entirely agree. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. require to purchase and take for the purpose of their undertaking certain lands belonging to Messrs. Sommerville & Co., who were saw-millers and timber merchants. Messrs. Sommerville & Co. were in occupation of those lands for the purposes of their trade. The railway company gave a notice to treat under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act in the usual form. In answer to that notice Messrs. Sommerville & Co. sent in their claim: it was a claim in respect of those lands. That was the only claim they could make in answer to the notice to treat. They divided their claim into three heads. That was a convenient mode for enabling the jury to ascertain what was the sum proper to be paid under the circumstances; but still the sum, however arrived at, was purchase-money or compensation for the lands, and it was awarded as such; in fact the jury had no power to award Messrs. Sommerville a single farthing except as compensation in respect of the lands.

Now the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act prohibits a railway company from entering upon any lands, except by consent, until payment or deposit of the purchase-money or compensation agreed or awarded to be paid. It seems to me impossible to contend that the consideration for the sale of the lands was anything less than the full amount of purchase-money or compensation ascertained in accordance with the Act and required by the Act to be paid or deposited before entry.

Judgment appealed from reversed; determination of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue affirmed. Respondents to pay to appellants the costs of the appeal to this House and the costs below.

Ind v. Emmerson. (a.)

Discovery—Production of documents—Ejectment—Defence of possession and purchaser for value without notice.—Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 24 (2)—R. S. C. 1883, ord. 37, rr. 1, 14.

An action was brought in the Chancery Division for the recovery of land and for the delivery up of title deeds. Upon a summons for production of documents, the defendants raised the objection that they were purchasers for value without notice, and therefore privileged from producing the documents, though they did not in their affidavits aver that the documents related solely to their own title, and did not in any way tend to prove the title of the plaintiff.

Held, that, inasmuch as this objection was, before the Judicature Act, 1873, allowed by the Court of Chancery in respect of its auxiliary jurisdiction only, and not in respect of its concurrent jurisdiction, it could not now be sustained when the court has a complete jurisdiction over the whole action, and that the defendants were not protected by section 24, sub-section 2, of the Judicature Act, 1873.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 34 W. R. 636, 33 Ch. D. 323) affirmed.

(a.) Reported by C. G. Napier Trollope, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Lindley, and Lopes, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of Chitty, J. (reported 34 W. R. 778, 33 Ch. D. 323).

A summons for production of documents had been taken out by the respondent, the plaintiff in the original action, which was for the recovery of land and the delivery of title deeds.

The respondent claimed as devisee of the land under the will of Zephaniah Emmerson, and the appellants, Ind, Coope, & Co. and others, were in possession, and by their affidavits claimed to be entitled in fee as purchasers for value from Zephaniah Emmerson's heir-at-law without notice of any adverse claim.

Chitty, J., dismissed the summons, and on appeal the Court of Appeal reversed his decision.

The appellants appealed to the House of Lords.

March 31, April 1, 21.—Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Haldane, for the appellants.—The objection would clearly have been valid in equity before the Judicature Act: Wallwyn v. Lee, 9 Ves. 24; Heath v. Crealock, 21 W. R. 380, L. R. 15 Eq. 257 and L. R. 18 Eq. 215, 22 W. R. Dig. 250, Colyer v. Finch, 5 H. L. Cas. 905, 5 W. R. The principle is admitted after the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, in Gomm v. Parrott, 5 W. R. 882, 3 C. B. N. S. 47, and Horton v. Bott, 5 W. R. 792, 2 H. & N. 249. Williams v. Lambe, 3 Bro. Ch. 263, and Collins v. Archer, 1 Russ. & My. 284, are both questioned in Lord St. Leonards' Vendors and Purchasers, 14th ed., pp. 792, 793. See also Roper's Husband and Wife, 2nd ed., vol. 1, p. 451. The defence was good before the Judicature Act, 1873, and is expressly preserved by section 24, sub-section 2.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Rigby, Q.C. (Ford with them), for the respondent.—There was a distinction between the auxiliary and concurrent jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery as to the practice in discovery. The defence was held not to be of any avail in Newton v. Newton, 17 W. R. 238, L. R. 4 Ch. 143; Greenslade v. Dare, 17 Beav. 502, 3 W. R. Dig. 63; Stackhouse v. Jersey, 9 W. Sir H. Davey, Q.C., replied.

May 20.—Earl of SELBORNE.—By order 31 of the Supreme Court, the rules laid down as to discovery are that interrogatories may be delivered for the examination of the defendant by the plaintiff, or the plaintiff by the defendant, "in every cause or matter" (except cases of alleged fraud or breach of trust, in which they are to be of right) by leave of the court or judge; and that, if interrogatories are delivered, any objection to answering any one or more of them, on any ground (i.e., some ground legally admissible), may be taken in the affidavit in answer; and that any party may apply to the court or a judge for an order directing any other party "to any cause or matter" to make discovery on oath of documents; the party against whom any such order is made being at liberty to object (specifying the grounds of his objection) to the production of any particular documents; and it being for the court or a judge to decide on the validity of any such objection, if taken.

So far as this order goes, the rules as to discovery are general, and apply equally (with the exception mentioned) to all causes and matters. But it is left open to the party required to make discovery in every cause or matter to object to any particular discovery on any ground which he may think tenable; and it is for the court or a judge to decide whether such ground is tenable or not.

I assume, for the purpose of the present question, that a party to whom interrogatories have been delivered by leave of the court or a judge may, by affidavit in answer, object to answer all or any part of them, not only on any special ground of objection to particular discovery, but also on the general ground that he is privileged, by the position in which he stands, against giving any discovery at all in a suit such as that brought against him. It may be that, if such a privilege could be shown to be well founded in law, he would have that right, though I do not think it necessary now to decide that question. The question to be now decided is whether every defendant who, under the old practice in chancery, might have successfully pleaded to a bill for discovery in aid of an action at law that he was a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, has, under the present law of the High Court of Justice, a privilege of absolute exemption from the obligation to make discovery. The Court of Appeal has held the contrary, and with that opinion I agree.

The argument for the appellants has been that, under section 24, sub-section 2, of the Judicature Act of 1873, the court, and every judge, is bound to give to "every equitable defence," properly alleged, "such and the same effect by way of defence against the claim of the plaintiff or petitioner as the Court of Chancery ought to have given if the same or the like matter had been relied on by way of defence in any suit or proceeding instituted in that court for the same or the like purpose before the passing of the Act." It was contended that in the Court of Chancery before the passing of the Act of 1873 a plea of purchase for valuable consideration without notice would have been a good equitable defence to a bill for discovery only; and, therefore, that it is now a good equitable defence against discovery in the present action, which is (in effect) an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff upon an alleged legal title, or, at all events, against the production of those deeds and documents of which production and delivery are expressly asked by the plaintiff's amended statement of claim, and which she therein alleges to be necessary to establish her title.

I will consider, first, the question as to the right to discovery generally; and, afterwards, that as to the discovery of the deeds and documents of title.

The first observation to be made is, that the Court of Chancery, when it allowed a plea of purchase for valuable consideration without notice to a bill for discovery only, allowed it, not to particular discovery (as, e.g., of certain deeds and documents), but to the whole; not on the ground that certain things ought not to be inquired into, but because the court ought not, as against such a purchaser, to give any assistance whatever to a plaintiff suing upon a legal title in another jurisdiction. And, upon the same ground, a like plea would have been allowed to a suit asking for more than discovery (e.g., for an injunction to restrain the defendant at law from setting up outstanding terms) when the object of the suit was still to obtain from the Court of Chancery assistance to the suit of the plaintiff suing upon a legal title in another jurisdiction. The defence was, in effect, "no equity," which is a different thing from an "equitable defence." It was thought inequitable, generally, that a man should defeat a legal title by keeping back facts in his own knowledge, or by setting up outstanding terms; it was thought not inequitable that a purchaser for value without notice should use any such tabula in naufragio as best he could. But in the present case there is no suit in any other jurisdiction; the High Court of Justice is asked, and is competently asked, to exercise a principal, and not an auxiliary, jurisdiction, and to give effect to the legal title, which the plaintiff alleges to be in herself. If a like suit had formerly been brought in the Court of Chancery it would have been demurrable; not because there was an equitable defence, but because the title was legal, and the plaintiff stated no equity. To abolish that division of jurisdictions was the very object of the Judicature Act. As against "the claim" of the plaintiff in this suit, it is not, and it cannot be, pretended that purchase for valuable consideration is a good equitable defence. Why, then, should it be an equitable defence against the discovery which is sought only as incident to, and as evidence in support of, the claim? In the class of cases referred to, the separation and division of jurisdictions between the courts of equity and the courts of common law was the real and only ground on which such a defence was admitted. As against an innocent purchaser, sued at law, the Court of Chancery (having no jurisdiction itself to try the title) found no equity requiring it to give assistance to a proceeding brought elsewhere for that purpose. But it is impossible, without departing from that ground, to make the same defence available against discovery (otherwise proper) in a suit in which it is not available against the relief, and in which the High Court has proper jurisdiction to try, and must try and determine the question of title. And, accordingly, we find that there is no instance of any suit competently brought in the Court of Chancery, for relief as well as discovery, in which the defence of purchaser for value without notice has been held available against discovery incident to the relief, and not against the relief itself also. That defence was never admitted as an objection to particular discovery, it went to all or none. And in those cases in which the Court of Chancery had concurrent jurisdiction with the common law courts upon legal titles it was not available against either discovery or relief: Williams v. Lambe, Collins v. Archer, Phillips v. Phillips.

In the words, therefore, of that section of the Judicature Act on which the appellants' reliance was placed, this would not, before 1873, have been a good equitable defence to discovery in the Court of Chancery "in any suit or proceeding instituted in that court for the like purpose."

With respect to the deeds and documents of title, the appellants would be privileged against their production if they could say on oath that they related solely to their own title, and did not in any way tend to prove or to support the title of the plaintiff. But the present question relates to deeds and documents, as to which they have not made (and I presume cannot make) any such averment. To the discovery of such deeds and documents, as evidence to be used at the trial in support of the plaintiff's case, no principle or authority is, in my judgment, opposed. The case of Wallwyn v. Lee, before Lord Eldon, was that of a plea (which was allowed) to relief as well as discovery; and that of Joyce v. De Moleyns, 2 Jo. & Lat. 374, before Lord St. Leonards, was also one in which the defence (which prevailed) was to the whole suit.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the order appealed from is right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

Lord WATSON.—Until the Judicature Act of 1873 came into operation, the plaintiff in an ordinary action of ejectment could not obtain discovery from his opponent, except by an application to the Court of Chancery, which had not jurisdiction in regard to the subject-matter of the suit. It was the general practice of the court to aid the litigant who thus applied to it by giving discovery; but an exception was made when the defendant in ejectment had in bonâ fide purchased and paid for the property forming the subject of the litigation without notice of the plaintiff's right. In that case the court declined to exercise its auxiliary jurisdiction, upon the ground that there was no equity requiring it to interfere and deprive the purchaser of what was termed his tabula in naufragio. On the other hand, the authorities which were referred to in the course of the argument appear to me to establish that in cases where the plaintiff applied to the Court of Chancery for complete relief, which its jurisdiction enabled the court to give, the court did not hesitate to deprive the defendant, although a purchaser for value, and without notice, of the advantage which, in the exercise of its auxiliary jurisdiction, it permitted him to retain.

I think it is impossible to affirm that a court of equity ought always to give to a litigant who is suing before another tribunal the same assistance to which he would have been justly entitled if the principal action had depended before itself. However that may be, the decision of this appeal appears to me to depend upon the practice as settled, and not upon the sufficiency or insufficiency of the considerations which led to its adoption.

The main object of the Judicature Act was to enable the parties to a suit to obtain in that suit, and without the necessity of resorting to another court, all remedies to which they are entitled in respect of any legal or equitable claim or defence properly advanced by them, so as to avoid a multiplicity of legal proceedings. In pursuance of that object the Act has given to both sides of the High Court the same jurisdiction in suits for the recovery of land which previously belonged to the courts of law; and also (subject, of course, to its provisions) the same jurisdiction to grant discovery for the purposes of these suits, which had belonged exclusively to the Court of Chancery. Auxiliary proceedings, with a view to discovery in a court other than that before which the principal suit depends, are inconsistent with its provisions, and are no longer competent.

The present suit, which is for possession of land, and is in substance an action of ejectment, was instituted in the Chancery Division, and it might, with equal competency, have been brought before the other side of the High Court. The plaintiff has applied for discovery, against which the defendants have stated the plea that they are purchasers for value, without notice of her title. I am not satisfied that, if otherwise available, the plea would have been prejudiced by the alteration in the form of pleadings which the Judicature Act has introduced. Whether it is still available to the defendants depends upon the construction of section 24 (2), which deals expressly with the effect to be given to equitable defences by the new courts constituted under the provisions of the Act.

The Act of 1873 deals with the remedies, and not with the rights, of parties litigant. It was not intended to affect, and does not affect, the quality of the rights and claims which they bring into court and submit to the judgment of the court, whether as plaintiffs or as defendants. But it does not follow that its provisions cannot affect the substance as well as the form of procedure by means of which these rights are to be ascertained and enforced. Discovery is matter of remedy, and not matter of right. If an Act had been passed by the Legislature which simply conferred jurisdiction in ejectment suits upon the Court of Chancery, that would have been a statute altering, not the rights of parties, but the forum in which their remedy was to be sought; yet it does not seem to me to be doubtful that its effect would have been to deprive the defendant, who was a purchaser for value and without notice, of the benefit of the plea, founded on these circumstances, which he could have urged successfully in a mere auxiliary proceeding.

Section 24 (2) enacts that the new courts shall give to every "equitable defence" the same effect which the old Court of Chancery ought to have given "if the same or the like matters had been relied on by way of defence in any suit or proceeding instituted in that court for the same or the like purpose before the passing of this Act." Assuming the plea in question to be an "equitable defence" within the meaning of the sub-section, is an application for discovery, made in the principal cause to the judge before whom it depends, to be regarded as a suit or proceeding instituted for the same or the like purpose with an application made to the old Court of Chancery in aid of an action of ejectment depending before a court of common law? In my opinion that question must be answered in the negative. Before the Act of 1873 the Court of Chancery observed a distinction between an incidental application in causâ to a court competent to give full equitable relief, and an application for discovery to another court. Although in an auxiliary application the Court of Chancery declined to interfere with a bonâ fide purchaser for value, yet it appears to me to have invariably acted upon the principle that a court which had jurisdiction not only to give relief to the plaintiff, but to enforce the equitable claim of the defendant, was bound by equitable considerations to grant discovery. That is, in my opinion, the rule which ought to be followed in considering whether the plea advanced by the appellants in this case should be sustained; and I have accordingly come to the conclusion that the order of the Court of Appeal must be affirmed.

Lord Fitzgerald.—I entirely concur. I adopt the judgment of the noble and learned earl and the conclusion at which he has arrived, and also the judgment of my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson).

Lord Herschell.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. I think the appellants have established that prior to the Judicature Act the plaintiff in this action could not have compelled the defendants to make the discovery which she seeks either in a court of law or equity. And it seems at first sight strange that, by reason of a change of procedure the object of which was not, except in certain specified cases, to alter rights, but only to enable every division of the High Court to administer both law and equity, and to afford all the relief to which the parties were entitled, it should be possible to obtain discovery when it could not previously have been had either at law or in equity. But I think the explanation is to be found in the fact that the right of a purchaser for value to exemption in equity from the obligation to make discovery had its origin in, and was founded upon, that separation of jurisdiction which it was the object of the Judicature Act to abolish. Where a plaintiff suing at law on his legal title sought the assistance of a court of equity to procure discovery, that aid was denied when the defendant was a purchaser for value. To a bill filed praying discovery the plea that the defendant was a purchaser for value without notice was a complete answer. And it was an answer too in all cases in which the auxiliary jurisdiction of the court of equity was appealed to in furtherance of an action. But I think it was well settled, at the time the Judicature Act was passed, that it was only where discovery was thus sought as auxiliary to an action that it could be successfully resisted by a purchaser for value. If the court of equity had concurrent jurisdiction and a plaintiff sought to enforce his legal title there, as for example in a case of dower, the court compelled discovery even by a purchaser for value as ancillary to the principal relief sought by the suit. No case was cited at the bar in which discovery ancillary to other relief had been refused by the court.

Under the existing system it is not necessary to apply to one branch of the court as auxiliary to another. And there is no longer any need of praying for discovery in the statement of claim which is substituted for a bill. The plaintiff in every action is entitled to discovery as ancillary to the relief which he claims in the action.

It is contended that the right to resist discovery is preserved to a purchaser for value, because by section 24, sub-section 2, of the Judicature Act the Court is bound to give to every equitable defence such and the same effect by way of defence against the plaintiff as the Court of Chancery ought to have given if the same or the like matter had been relied on by way of defence in any suit instituted in that court for the same or the like purpose before the passing of the Act.

I think it may fairly be said that the allegation that the defendant was a purchaser for value was an equitable defence. For the matter which was a bar to the suit did not appear on the face of the bill, and needed to be set up by plea. But it was not an equitable defence unless the bill sought discovery only to assist a plaintiff who was pursuing his remedy elsewhere. I therefore am of opinion that the present action, in which the plaintiff seeks to recover possession of land to which she alleges a legal title, and applies for discovery as ancillary thereto, is not an action instituted for the same or a like purpose as that in which a plea of purchase for valuable consideration could have been relied on as an equitable defence.

I cannot profess to be satisfied with the reasoning which led the Court of Chancery to deny its ordinary assistance to a plaintiff who was suing a purchaser for value at law, and to afford the very same kind of assistance to a plaintiff who, having a choice of either jurisdiction, selected the Court of Chancery as the tribunal to enforce a legal right. But I am satisfied that the distinction existed, and that it was only in the former case that discovery could be resisted.

Every plaintiff is now primâ facie entitled to discovery in any action, and I can find nothing, either in the Act or in the rules, to warrant us in depriving the present plaintiff of the right thus conferred.

I accordingly concur in thinking that this appeal must be dismissed.

Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict., c. 11), s. 7—Meaning of the words "any other party" in section 7—Application for order to inspect banker's books—Affidavit in support of application not always necessary—Jurisdiction of court to make the order ex parte.

Section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, gives to a litigant party a certain extended right of inspection by enabling him before trial to inspect, and take copies of entries in, banker's books; but such right exists only for, and must be strictly limited to, the purposes of the proceedings.

Section 7 also gives the court jurisdiction—to be exercised, however, with caution—to make the order for inspection on an application made without notice to "the bank or any other party," and the words "any other party" include any party to the action.

Affidavit evidence in support of the application for liberty to inspect may be dispensed with if it is obvious from the issues raised by the pleadings that the entries in the banker's books must be material.

Quære, whether section 7 can be used for the purposes of obtaining "discovery" in the strict sense of that term.

Order of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The plaintiff had brought an action for rescission of a contract to take shares in the Automatic Boiler Feeding Co. on the grounds of misrepresentation and that the company was not a bonâ fide one. The company, with several other persons, were made defendants. The defendants, in their defences, denied the allegations of the plaintiff. The plaintiff subsequently obtained leave to amend his claim by adding Edward Beall as a defendant, alleging that Beall had, in fact, received and converted to his own use moneys paid for shares in the company by the plaintiff. The defendant Beall, by his defence, denied these allegations.

On June 13, 1887, the plaintiff made an application in chambers ex parte and without any affidavit evidence, and obtained an order under section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 11), for liberty to inspect and peruse the entries of the accounts of the defendant company and of the defendant Beall in the books of the Royal Exchange Bank, and take copies and extracts therefrom.

On June 28, 1887, the defendant company and the defendant Beall moved to discharge the order of June 13. The plaintiff and the bank were served with notice of the motion and appeared at the hearing thereof, when Kekewich, J., modified the order of June 13 by limiting the period of inspection, and directed that it should begin from the time of registration of the company, and continue, with respect to the company, down to the time of the commencement of the action, and, with respect to Beall, down to the time when he was made a party to the action.

The defendant company and the defendant Beall appealed.

Section 7 of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, so far as material, is as follows:—"On the application of any party to a legal proceeding, a court or judge may order that such party be at liberty to inspect and take copies of any entries in a banker's book for any of the purposes of such proceedings. An order under this section may be made either with or without summoning the bank or any other party. . . ."

Humphreys (Herbert Reed with him), for the appellants.—The inspection ought to have been confined to those entries which are relevant to the matters in issue; otherwise the result will be to introduce a material alteration in the law relating to discovery. A person against whom an order for discovery is made has a right to seal up what he declares to be not material. [BOWEN, L.J.—Have you made any affidavit that these entries are not relevant to the issue?] In our answer to interrogatories we have. Then the original order was made ex parte, and the court had no jurisdiction to make the order ex parte. The words in the section "any other party" are words ejusdem generis; they do not necessarily mean party to the litigation: In re Quartz Hill Co., 32 W. R. 773, 21 Ch. D. 642. The order was made without any affidavit evidence to show that the inspection of the entries was material for the purposes of the trial; it ought not, therefore, to stand: Davies v. White, 32 W. R. 520. There is no reported case in which general inspection of the private banking account of a party to an action has been allowed. In Marshfield v. Hutchins, 34 W. R. 511, 32 Ch. D. 499, it appears from the report in the WEEKLY REPORTER that that part of the application asking for inspection of the private account was given up.

Swinfen Eady (Warmington, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff, the present respondent.—The plaintiff is entitled to put in as evidence against the defendants copies of the accounts in the banker's books, and for that purpose is entitled to inspection: Harding v. Williams, 28 W. R. 615, 14 Ch. D. 197. [FRY, L.J.—I think my decision in that case was not approved by the Court of Appeal.] There is no reported case in which Harding v. Williams has been overruled or its authority shaken. No affidavit evidence was necessary under the circumstances of this case, for, having regard to the whole nature of the claim, and the allegations contained in the pleadings, inspection of entries in the banker's books of the accounts of the company and of the defendant Beall is obviously most material. Then as to the order being made on an ex parte application, and as to the application itself being a bonâ fide one—[COTTON, L.J.—You need not argue either of those points].

Humphreys replied.

COTTON, L.J.—Various objections have been made to the order of Kekewich, J., as modified by the order of the 28th of June. The first objection was that the original order was made ex parte, and that it ought not to have been so made. There was an opportunity when this matter was before Kekewich, J., on the 28th of June, to take an objection on that ground to the order; but neither then nor now has any reason been shown why the order ought not to have been so made in this particular case; and if the Act enables an order under this section to be made ex parte, we cannot discharge the order on the ground of want of jurisdiction. At the same time I agree that it is better, as a general rule, in the first instance to serve the person whose account it is desired to inspect. But in my opinion the Act does enable an order to be made ex parte.

The next objection was, that the words, "any other party," do not necessarily mean party to the litigation. That may be so, but they must necessarily include a party to the litigation, although they are not confined to such party. Therefore the judge has power to make an order ex parte for the inspection of the banking account of any other party, including a party to the action, although I think it would be a wise course for a judge to require notice to be given to the party before making the order, rather than to have the objection taken at a later stage that no such order ought to have been made.

Then it is said the order was made without affidavit. An affidavit is not necessary, in my opinion. In certain cases the court may, and ought to, require an affidavit to enable it to see whether in fact the inspection of the entries or account is material; but I think the judge may dispense with an affidavit if the issues raised on the pleadings (without saying the pleadings are to be taken as true) are such as to render it obvious that the entries must be material. If, on the other hand, it appears probable that the application has been made, not for the purpose of the proceeding, but for some other or collateral purpose, then I think the judge should not make the order without an affidavit. Here, looking at the pleadings, whether the issues raised are true or false, the question is whether Beall did or did not put money into his own pocket which ought to have gone to the company; and it is obvious that the inspection of his banking account must be material to that issue. The order under the section is to assist the litigant in making out his charge. The objection that in this case an affidavit should have been made before the order for inspection was made falls to the ground therefore.

Is the order which has been made right? The object, or at least one of the objects, of the section is, for the purposes of the proceedings, to enable evidence of material matters to be given at the trial. Of course, the information acquired under an order under the section cannot be applied for other purposes, and if the person who has obtained such an order were to make use of it for any purpose other than the purposes of the proceedings the court would interfere, as it does when a person makes use for some other purpose of the information obtained under an order for discovery.

As Mr. Swinfen Eady pointed out, the Act took away from a litigant the power of compelling a banker to produce his books at the trial of an action, thus taking away a right which the suitor had before. So far the Act is for the relief of bankers. For it was, of course, a great inconvenience for the banker to be summoned himself and to have the books of the bank which were necessary for daily use to be brought into court.

The Act enables copies of entries in bankers' books to be taken and given in evidence. How can a suitor tell, without inspecting the account, of what entries he desires copies to be taken? He can only do that by a prior inspection of the books; and although it no doubt does give the suitor a larger right of examination before the trial than he had before, the object of the Act is to enable evidence to be given at the trial without putting the bankers to inconvenience, and therefore it is necessary to have that examination before trial.

Then it was said that this order, in fact, gave the suitor a greater right of discovery than he had before. But that argument is based on a fallacy; for, although the suitor may obtain the same benefit by this inspection as he would have obtained from discovery, it is not really discovery, which is the extorting of information from the litigant himself, whereas this order only gives the suitor the right to examine the books to see of what entries copies should be given.

But the information should only be used for the purposes of the proceedings, and I am of opinion that the judge should be careful not to make an order in too large terms, but should limit it to suit the facts of each case; and I have considered in this case whether the order could not be more strictly limited. On consideration I do not think it could and yet enable the plaintiff to produce such evidence as may be relevant to the question in issue at the trial. The period covered by the order begins when the transaction began and goes down to the time when the action commenced in the case of the company, and when Beall was made a party in the case of Beall. I think, when we look at the particular charges made, the order does not cover too large a space. If we were to limit it further it might prevent the plaintiff getting evidence on a material point. In many cases, no doubt, it might be right to limit the order to a certain month or number of months, or to some particular item of an account—for instance, in the case of a bill of exchange.

It has been contended that the Act only authorizes an inspection of entries and not of the account. But that is mere form, because if we decide that the respondent could inspect and take copies of all entries between these particular periods that would be exactly what has been done here. The appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with Cotton, L.J., in thinking that great caution should be exercised by a judge in putting in force the provisions of this section; but, on the other hand, I have no doubt that caution is properly exercised.

In order to see the effect of this legislation we should consider what was the state of the law as to evidence of bankers' books in 1876. At that time there was no power of obtaining discovery from a bank of the account of its customer, except by the circuitous process of obtaining an order from a judge to examine the particular clerk or officer who made the entry, and to have the books produced. That could be done under the Common Law Procedure Act before the trial, but it was a cumbrous process, and in practice was seldom resorted to. In all probability the judge would refuse to make the order before the trial.

As a matter of practical dealing the banker's books made their first appearance at the trial. A subpœna was issued to the banker to produce his books, and to compel the officer who made the entries to explain them, and prove the transaction to which they related. In practice no counsel who regarded either the time of the court or his own convenience—except when the particular circumstances of the case rendered the examination of the officer of the bank necessary—insisted on proof of the account, and the account was put in and treated as a pass-book.

Then came the Bankers' Books Evidence Act, which was passed, primâ facie, to relieve the banker. It is described as "An Act to amend the Law of Evidence with respect to Bankers' Books," and its primary object was to simplify proof at the trial.

I also, like Cotton, L.J., refuse to say whether this section ought or ought not to be made use of for the purpose of obtaining inspection of books in cases where the right to discovery would have existed if the books had been in the defendant's possession. As Cotton, L.J., has pointed out, it is obvious that, the object of the Act being to obtain copies of entries of account, a certain extended right of inspection must be given to enable a person to obtain copies of proper entries: but the judge ought to be extremely careful to limit the right to the particular purpose for which the evidence is wanted. Here it is impossible to say that the order under appeal will do anything more than is actually necessary for the purposes of the trial, limited, as it is, to the entries made during the period only over which the contest spreads.

If we could see any indirect attempt to use the power of the section for purposes for which the Legislature did not intend it to be used—if we thought that it would give more information than was absolutely necessary—the court would further limit the order. But here, in my opinion, all has been done in the way of protecting the appellants that could be done. It is said we ought not to act under the section without an affidavit. Of course an affidavit would be necessary if there were any question of the bona fides of the application; but no such case can be made here. The moment we look at the pleadings it is obvious that the issue of fraud committed during the period covered by the order will be the real issue to be tried.

Again, it is said that the order ought not to be made ex parte. I agree with Cotton, L.J., that such an order can be made ex parte, although the judge should be extremely careful as to how he makes it ex parte. But all difficulty has been removed here by the conduct of the parties who appeared to move and discharge the order, so that the matter has been, in fact, discussed in the presence of the parties.

FAY, L.J.—I quite agree as to what has been said as to the power to make these orders ex parte. I cannot read the words "any other party" otherwise than as including a party to the action, although it has been suggested in argument that the word "party" here means any person "other than a party to the action." There is no irregularity in making such an order ex parte, though I agree it should be so made ex parte with great caution; and, speaking for myself, I probably should never make it ex parte. But here, the court having power to make the order ex parte, the order has been the subject of a motion to which the appellants were parties.

Then with regard to the construction of the Act. I was struck with the arguments of the appellants that we were, in effect, giving inspection at a time when, by the Rules of Court as to discovery, no such right of inspection was allowed. But if such right is necessarily incidental to the new provision introduced by the Act, it may very well be that we cannot use it without, to some extent, altering the balance of rights of the litigating parties.

Before the Act of 1876 the litigant had a right to subpœna the bankers and compel them to produce their books, but he could not look at those books till they were put in. But all these copies of the entries which have been substituted by the section must be obtained by the person putting them in: he cannot call on his antagonist or the bankers to make a copy for him. And, therefore, the result is, that the Act does enable the litigant, by enabling him to take copies of the entries, to obtain inspection at an earlier date than he would have obtained it if he had not been authorized to make the copies.

There is one other observation. The legislation in question began with the statute of 1876. The preamble cites two objects; it runs thus:—"Whereas serious inconvenience has been occasioned to bankers and also to the public by reason of the ledgers and other account books having been removed from the banks for the purpose of being produced in legal proceedings; and whereas it is expedient to facilitate the proof of the transactions recorded in such ledgers and account books." When the Act of 1876 was repealed and the Act of 1879 substituted, I see no reason for supposing that the Legislature was not actuated by a similar motive. I think, therefore, that the facilitating of proof of the transaction recorded in banker's books was as much one of the objects of the Legislature as the relieving of bankers from their liability. Therefore, if the result of the substituted provision be to enable a litigant party to see the accounts before they are put in, it is a right given by the Legislature.

Appeal dismissed.

In re AVERY'S PATENT. (a.)

Patent—Petition for revocation—Invention communicated—Patent obtained without disclosure of fact of communication—Patent alleged to be obtained "in fraud of . . . rights" of the petitioner—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 26, sub-sections (4), paragraphs (c) (d); sub-section 8.

The owner of a foreign patent communicated the invention to a person whom he appointed his agent for the purpose of obtaining a patent for the invention in England, with power to the agent to appoint a substitute. The agent appointed a substitute, who applied for and obtained a patent for the invention in England in his own name as first and true inventor, and without disclosing the fact that the invention was communicated. The owner of the foreign patent presented a petition for revocation of the English patent under section 26, sub-section (4), clause (c), of the Patents Act, 1883, alleging that the English patent was obtained "in fraud of his rights."

The evidence showed that the substitute had not at any time, either when applying for the patent or after he had obtained it, acted with the intention of depriving the principal of his rights.

Held, on the evidence, that the patent was not obtained in fraud of the rights of the petitioner, and therefore that the petition should be dismissed.

Decision of Stirling, J. (35 W. R. 541), affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Stirling, J., reported 35 W. R. 541.

The present appellant, Avery, obtained a patent in the United States for a certain invention. Avery appointed Weeks as his agent to obtain letters patent for the same invention in England, with power to Weeks to appoint a substitute. An agreement was also entered into between Avery and Weeks by which it was agreed that Avery and Weeks and two other persons, one of whom was the present respondent Lindsay, were to be partly interested in the English patent when obtained. Weeks came to England and substituted Lindsay to act in obtaining the letters patent in England. Lindsay was advised by a patent agent to apply for the patent in his own name as the first and true inventor, and accordingly did so, and obtained the patent in his own name as the first and true inventor.

These and all other material facts will be found fully set out in the report of the case in the court below (35 W. R. 541).

A petition was presented—in the first instance by E. Kimber alone, acting as attorney for Avery, but afterwards, by the direction of Stirling, J., amended by adding Avery as a petitioner and by adding all persons interested in the patent as respondents as well as the original respondent Lindsay—under section 26 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57),* for a revocation of the patent granted to Lindsay on the ground that it was obtained in fraud of the rights of Avery. The petition also prayed for a declaration that Avery was the first and true inventor, but did not contain any distinct allegation that he was in fact the first and true inventor.

Stirling, J., dismissed the petition.

The petitioner Avery appealed.

Oswald and R. W. Wallace, for the appellant.—Neither the agent nor his substitute here was authorized by the power of attorney to take out the patent in his own name, and the act of so doing is a fraud on the rights of Avery, the principal. It is not necessary that there should be any moral culpability on the part of Lindsay to render the act done a fraud on the rights of Avery. Anything done in derogation of the rights of the true inventor by a person to whom the true inventor has confided his rights is in fraud of those rights: Peek v. Gurney, 22 W. R. 29, L. R. 6 H. L. 377; Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves.

(a) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* The Patents Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), enacts as follows:—Section 26, sub-section (4)—"A petition for the revocation of a patent may be presented by . . . (c) Any person alleging that the patent was obtained in fraud of his rights or of the rights of any person under or through whom he claims; (d) Any person alleging that he or any person under or through whom he claims was the true inventor of any invention included in the name of the patentee. . . . Sub-section (8).—Where a patent has been revoked on the ground of fraud the Comptroller may, on the application of the true inventor made in accordance with the provisions of this Act, grant him a patent in lieu of and bearing the same date as the date of the revocation of the patent so revoked, but the patent so granted shall cease on the expiration of the term for which the revoked patent was granted."

470. Rule 27 of the Rules of the Board of Trade under the Act of 1883 provides that an application for a patent for an invention communicated from abroad shall expressly state that the invention has been communicated to the applicant from abroad. That was also the practice under the former Acts: Milligan v. Marsh, 2 Jur. N. S. 1083, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 60; Steedman v. Marsh, 4 W. R. 476. The keeping back the fact that the invention was communicated is a fraud on the Crown which invalidates the patent obtained, and so Avery's rights are prejudiced. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Beard v. Egerton, 3 C. B. 97.] That case is not really against us, as the communication there was made abroad, not in England. Stirling, J., relied on the cases of Plimpton v. Malcolmson, 3 Ch. D. 531, 24 W. R. Dig. 170, and Nickells v. Boss, 8 C. B. 679, but both those cases were decided before the Act of 1883 and the present Rules of the Board of Trade were in force. In re Wirth's Patent, 26 W. R. 329, 12 Ch. D. 305, is an authority that a patent may be obtained here by an alien resident abroad. The patent should have been taken out either by Weeks in his own name, but as a communicated patent, or by Avery in his own name. Avery is, at all events, entitled to claim revocation of the patent, on the ground that he and not Lindsay is the true inventor: section 26, sub-section (4), clause (d). [COTTON, L.J.—There is no allegation to that effect in the petition.] Leave to amend the petition in that way can and ought to be given us. Marsden v. Saville-street Co., 26 W. R. 784, 3 Ex. D. 203, was also referred to.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Yate Lee, for the respondents Lindsay and Weeks, were not called on.

Pochin, for other respondents, who supported the appeal.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Stirling, J., dismissing the petition presented to revoke letters patent which had been granted to a Mr. Lindsay, but giving liberty to the petitioner to present a new petition on the ground of his being the first and true inventor. There is no appeal against the latter part of the order, but we think (and Mr. Graham Hastings does not object to that) that in order to save expense there should be added to that part of the order words giving liberty to either party to use any evidence filed on the present petition, subject, of course, to all just exceptions to be raised by any person affected, and subject also to the right of either party to demand cross-examination of the deponents making any new affidavits.

Then was the order right? I am of opinion it was. The petition was presented really under clause (c) of sub-section (4) of section 26. [The Lord Justice here read the words of the clause referred to, and continued:—] If it is made out that the petitioner Avery is a person who brings himself within that clause, then we should have to go into the other question—viz., whether the patent is or is not good; but if the petitioner has no locus standi — if he is not one of the persons who are entitled under the Act to present a petition to revoke the letters patent—then we have not to go into the question which was so much argued as to whether this patent is or is not a good patent.

I may say, with regard to sub-section (8) of section 26, which enables a patent obtained by fraud to be revoked and a new patent to be granted, that I am satisfied, as the learned judge was, that this petition avoided alleging that the petitioner was the first and true inventor, because his object was not to destroy the patent, but to get a new patent if he made out that it had been obtained by fraud. Therefore, in my opinion, he intended on his petition to confine himself, under clause (c), to the case that the patent had been obtained in fraud of his rights, and he has not alleged that he was the first and true inventor.

It is difficult, notwithstanding the arguments presented on behalf of the appellant, to see who it is alleged ought to be considered here as the first and true inventor—whether Avery, or Weeks, or Lindsay, because it does not appear whether the information under which the patent was obtained was communicated to Weeks or to Lindsay, we not having the correspondence which took place between the parties till August, 1886.

Now has this patent been obtained in fraud of the rights of Avery? [The Lord Justice here referred to the facts as appearing from the evidence, and continued:—] I do not enter into the question whether this patent was good or not. I intimate no opinion that it was bad; the only question I have to consider is, Was the patent thus obtained obtained in fraud of the rights of Avery?

There is no evidence, in my opinion, that Lindsay ever intended to deprive Avery of any of the rights which he would have been entitled to under the agreement that had been entered into. Everything shows just the contrary. If Lindsay, having obtained the patent in his own name, had sought by means of that to deprive Avery of any rights which he would have had if the patent had been in his own name, then the case would have stood very differently; but in my opinion if Lindsay made a mistake—I do not say that he did—but if he made a mistake honestly, that fact, although it might make the patent bad, would not enable Avery to establish that the patent was obtained in fraud of his rights. In my opinion that means obtained in violation of the rights of the true inventor (which I will assume Avery was), and obtained so as directly or indirectly to deprive him of his rights, and to get some benefit for another. An honest mistake by an agent, even although that may cause loss to the principal, is not in my opinion an act done in fraud of the rights of the principal. It is an act done which injures the rights of the principal; but an act done in fraud of his rights is to my mind an entirely different thing. To be in fraud of his rights it must be either done with the intention of depriving the principal of his rights, or must be insisted upon so as to deprive the principal of his rights.

It was urged that anything done depriving a person of his rights, if done by a person in a confidential position such as an agent is, must be considered as done in fraud of the rights of the principal. That, in my opinion, is a misuse of the term "fraud." It may be a mistake for which the agent may be answerable for not having performed his duty; it may be a mistake for which he may not be answerable, but which still may cause great loss to his principal; but an act, to be in "fraud of the rights" of the principal, must involve an attempt by the agent to deprive the principal of something, or to gain for himself something at the expense of his principal.

On the evidence here there is nothing which can justify us in coming to any other conclusion than this—that if, in fact, Lindsay did act under a mistake or was wrongly advised, he acted under an innocent mistake, and not in fraud of the rights of his principal. In my opinion, therefore, the case raised by the petition fails, and Stirling, J., was right in his dismissal of the petition.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The simple question we have to determine is this, whether the patent obtained in the name of Lindsay was obtained in fraud of the rights of Avery? We were asked to hold that every mistake which is made by an agent which may operate, or does operate, to the detriment of his principal is an act done in fraud of the rights of the principal. There can be no possible basis for such a contention. It is founded on a misconception of the remedies and relief which equity constantly affords in fit cases where persons are not allowed to take advantage of mistakes, even though they are bonâ fide, or misrepresentations which they have made bonâ fide. But although equity in such cases gives the same relief as if the mistake or misrepresentation had been fraudulently made, it does not follow that what is honest is fraudulent, and it would be monstrous to apply such reasoning to the clear words of the statute. We were subsequently asked to deal with this matter as if the case had been launched and the appeal pursued, not upon the line of "fraud of the rights" of another, under clause (c) of sub-section (4) of section 26, but as if it were also based on an allegation that somebody other than Avery was the true inventor. That case was not made by the petition, and I think was intentionally not made; for if it had been made, and the petitioner had succeeded on it, he could only have succeeded in getting the patent set aside, and could not have obtained a fresh patent for himself, because, in order to obtain that, he should prove fraud within the meaning of clause (c). Therefore the petition was deliberately confined to the allegation that there had been a fraud on the rights of Avery. But in my opinion there was no fraud at all on Avery's rights. Ought we now to allow the petitioner to amend his petition so as to bring it within clause (d), and to ask for a declaration that he is the true inventor? It seems to me we should be doing no real good to the parties and saving no expense if we were to allow such amendment at the present moment. Mr. Graham Hastings' client would, for anything I know, desire to stand aloof altogether from such a petition, not appear to it, or not resist it in the first instance. We should therefore be able only to allow the petitioner to make such an amendment, if we did allow it, on his paying all the costs which have been incurred on the other side; and, on the other hand, if Mr. Graham Hastings' client did wish to oppose such a petition, he would naturally like to remould his affidavits or to file affidavits with references to the early correspondence between Lindsay and Avery which we have not got before us, and, indeed, to make an entirely new case. Therefore, in that case, again, we could only allow such a burden to be imposed on Mr. Graham Hastings' client on condition of the prior payment by the petitioner of all the costs incurred by the framing of the case under clause (c) and not under clause (d). It seems to me, therefore, that no additional costs can be incurred by our refusing leave to amend. The petitioner, if so advised, may present a fresh petition—I do not encourage the presentation of it in any way—and as no objection is raised to all the affidavits being used again, subject to all just exceptions and to the right of cross-examination, so far as the costs are concerned the petitioner will be in no worse position then than if we allowed the amendment now. On the contrary, I think that a petition properly framed would give the parties, not only an opportunity of considering their position, but would prevent the embarrassment and entanglement of such a case as would then be made with the present case. I think, therefore, we are acting in no way contrary to the usual course of the court in refusing leave to amend.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. One of the persons who, by the statute of 1883, is permitted to present such a petition as the present, is a person alleging that the patent was obtained in fraud of his rights. In my view that means that the patent was obtained in derogation of the rights of the petitioner and by fraud. The petitioner took that view himself, because his petition contains this allegation:—"Instead of obtaining letters patent for, and on behalf of, your petitioner, Avery, on a communication from abroad, Weeks conspired with Lindsay to wrongfully, and by fraud, obtain from the Crown the grant of letters patent." Therefore, the case which the petitioner came here to try was, as the statute required it to be, a case of fraud against the respondent Lindsay. I desire to state in the broadest terms that, in my judgment, no fraud whatever has been shown to have been committed by Lindsay. As far as I can see, his conduct throughout has been that of a perfectly honest man. The terms in which the prospectuses were settled, and the terms of the letter written by Avery on October 20, 1886, after he knew how the patent had been granted, convince me that Lindsay never intended to set up any claim inconsistent with that of Avery, and I can see no ground for supposing that Lindsay desired to avail himself of any technical right arising from the form in which the letters patent were applied for. The only point that weighed with me was this. It was said that Lindsay had set up the fact that he had invented a portion of the subject-matter of the letters patent as a ground for claiming the invention as his own property. That suggestion, however, appears to be wholly unfounded, for the only way in which Lindsay refers to that fact is by way of explanation of the advice given him by the patent agent. Then it is urged that we ought to allow the petitioner to amend by suggesting that he is the true inventor. I confess I do not know who the appellant's counsel say is the first and true inventor, whether Avery or Weeks. But certain it is, to my mind, that the point was never intended to be raised, and is not raised by the petition. It was raised at the last moment in the hope of saving costs. Stirling, J., gave the petitioner the full measure of what he was entitled to. The petitioner may present a fresh petition if so advised. I do not encourage the presentation of any such petition. I do not desire to express any opinion as to whether there has been any mistake, or as to whether the patent is or is not good. Both those questions deserve full consideration before the petitioner takes any further proceedings.

Appeal dismissed.

ALLCARD v. SKINNER. (a.)

Undue influence—Voluntary gift—Religious sisterhood—Gift by professed member of religious sisterhood to the lady superior—Relation existing at the time of the gift—Laches—Acquiescence.

The relation existing between professed nun and lady superior in a sisterhood—the rules of which require each professed member to take vows binding for life to give up all present and future property, to obey the voice of the lady superior as the voice of God, and not to seek the advice of externs without the leave of the lady superior—is a relation which of itself alone necessarily raises the presumption in equity that a voluntary gift made, during the existence of the relation, by a professed nun to the lady superior for the purposes of the sisterhood, is a gift induced by undue influence; and, in order to displace that presumption, it is not sufficient for the donee to show that the donor, before the relation existed and while acting as a free agent, had formed and expressed the intention of making the gift.

The donor in such a case has a right to claim a return of so much of the property comprised in the gift as remains in the hands of the donee at the time of making the claim; but that right may be lost by delay, after the relation has ceased, in asserting the right when coupled with acts on the part of the donor from which acquiescence in, or confirmation of, the gift may be reasonably inferred.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (35 W. R. 424, 36 Ch. D. 145), affirmed on different grounds by the Court of Appeal (Cotton, L.J., dissenting).

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The cases in equity relating to the setting aside of voluntary gifts on the ground of undue influence reviewed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J. (reported 35 W. R. 424, 36 Ch. D. 145).

In 1868 the plaintiff, Miss M. A. Allcard, then aged twenty-eight, and acting of her own free will, began to assist in the objects and work of a religious sisterhood of which the defendant, Miss Skinner, was the lady superior. The sisterhood was a voluntary association of ladies who resided together and devoted themselves and their property to charitable works. The members of the sisterhood were divided into three grades—postulants, novices, and professed members. The first two grades consisted of probational members, and the third of members who were supposed to remain for life in the sisterhood. By the rules regulating the sisterhood each professed member on becoming professed was required to take certain vows (inter alia) to give up all her present and future property, though not necessarily to the sisterhood, to obey the voice of the lady superior as the voice of God, and not to seek the advice of externs without the leave of the lady superior. The rules also provided that all property given by any member to the lady superior was to be held on trust for the purposes of the sisterhood.

In 1870 the plaintiff, being then well acquainted with the rules and objects of the sisterhood, resolved, of her own free will, and contrary to the advice of her brother, a barrister, who acted as the trustee of her property, to devote herself and her property to the purposes of the sisterhood, and intimated that resolution to the Rev. H. D. Nihill, the spiritual director of the sisterhood. Accordingly in January, 1870, she entered the sisterhood as a postulant, became a novice in April, 1870, and a professed member in August, 1871. While a postulant the plaintiff made her will, leaving all her property to the defendant; and after becoming a professed member the plaintiff from time to time made voluntary gifts of large sums of money to the defendant, and in 1874 transferred to the defendant two sums of railway stock.

No external advice as to making the gifts was, on the one hand, sought or obtained by the plaintiff at the time of making the gifts, nor, on the other hand, was there any evidence of any acts of pressure brought to bear by the defendant or Mr. Nihill on the plaintiff to induce the gifts being made before or at the time of making the gifts.

In May, 1879, the plaintiff left the sisterhood, and shortly afterwards revoked her will.

It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff, in February, 1880, consulted various persons, including her solicitor, as to making a claim for the return of her property, but no claim was actually made till April, 1885.

In August, 1885, the writ in the present action was issued, by which the plaintiff claimed to have the various voluntary gifts set aside on the ground of undue influence and a repayment and retransfer by the defendant of the sums of money and stock in question. At the date of the issue of the writ the only part of the property comprised in the various gifts remaining unexpended for the purposes of the sisterhood in the hands of the defendant was the railway stock above referred to.

Kekewich, J., dismissed the action on the ground that the fact that the plaintiff had originally formed the intention of making the gifts while acting under competent independent advice, and before she joined the sisterhood, was evidence—presumptive in the first instance, but becoming conclusive in the absence of any clear evidence to the contrary—that at the time the gifts were actually made they were made in pursuance and completion of that original intention, and were therefore not induced by any undue influence. The learned judge also expressed an opinion with regard to the railway stock still standing in the defendant's name, that if the plaintiff had succeeded in making out a case of undue influence she would not have been debarred by laches or acquiescence from recovering it from the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed from this decision, but on the appeal limited her claim to the recovery of the railway stock above referred to.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., and F. B. Palmer, for the appellant.—Two questions of mixed law and fact arise: First, whether this gift was made under circumstances which make it voidable in equity? Secondly, if voidable, whether the right to elect to avoid has been lost by laches? At the time this gift was made the plaintiff was not a morally free agent, for at that time the plaintiff was a professed member of this sisterhood, and, having regard to the vows she had taken, she was then in a state of moral and spiritual bondage. It is said that the plaintiff voluntarily entered the sisterhood; no doubt she did; the first act of placing oneself under any influence is no doubt voluntary, but that is not the test. The law on the subject is laid down by Lord Eldon in Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273, and the arguments used in reply by Sir S. Romilly in that case have been adopted by Lord Cottenham in Deal v. Bennett, 4 My. & Cr. 277. Where the relation existing between donor and donee is such as to raise the presumption of undue influence, the onus of negativing undue influence lies on the donee: Hoghton v. Hoghton, 15 Beav. 278. The remarks of Turner, L.J., in Rhodes v. Bate, 14 W. R. 292, L. R. 1 Ch. 252, are not against, but in favour of, the plaintiff's case, because the plaintiff had no competent independent advice at the time the gift was made. Kekewich, J., held that as the plaintiff had formed and expressed the intention of making the gifts before entering the sisterhood, the intention must be presumed to be continuous, and therefore that the making of the gifts must be attributed to an intention formed when the plaintiff was not in the sisterhood. But no such presumption or conclusion arises as a matter of law, because a mere promise or expression of intention does not amount to a gift. The real question is, was the donor, at the time of making the gift, a morally free agent? From the relation that existed at the time of making the gift between plaintiff and defendant, the presumption is that the plaintiff was not a free agent: Fulham v. McCarthy, 1 H. L. Cas. 703; Whyte v. Meade, 2 Ir. Eq. R. 420; In re Metcalfe's Trusts, 12 W. R. 538, 2 De G. J. & S. 122; Wright v. Vanderplank, 4 W. R. 410, 8 De G. M. & G. 133; Clegg v. Edmondson, 8 De G. M. & G. 808, 5 W. R. Dig. 60. On the question of acquiescence and laches, the plaintiff in her evidence states that it was not till 1884 she became aware that she might have her money returned. The railway stock still standing in the defendant's name is impressed with a constructive trust in favour of the plaintiff. Turner v. Collins, 20 W. R. 305, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 329; Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurd, 22 W. R. 492, L. R. 5 P. C. 221; De Bussche v. Alt, 8 Ch. D. 286, 26 W. R. Dig. 192, were referred to on this point.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., Warmington, Q.C., and Edward Ford, for the respondent.—First, on the question of laches and acquiescence. The plaintiff left the sisterhood in May, 1879, and made no demand for the return of her property till March, 1885. The evidence shows that in 1880 the plaintiff consulted her solicitor and other advisers as to claiming her money back; she therefore then knew, or ought to have known, what her rights were, and yet she made no claim till five years afterwards, but allowed the money to remain in the hands of the defendant, and to be dealt with by the defendant as if it belonged to the sisterhood. Such conduct on the part of the plaintiff amounts to acquiescence in, or election not to avoid, the gift: Mitchell v. Homfray, 29 W. R. 558, 8 Q. B. D. 587; Turner v. Collins; Savery v. King, 4 W. R. 571, 5 H. L. Cas. 627. Then, on the question of undue influence. There is no authority for saying that the relation existing between a nun and the lady superior in a convent necessarily raises the presumption that a gift made during the existence of that relation is made under undue influence; Fulham v. McCarthy and Whyte v. Meade, the only cases with regard to gifts by nuns, lay down no such doctrine. It is not necessary, therefore, for the defendant to prove that no undue influence in fact existed; the onus of proving the existence of undue influence lies on the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 9.—Cotton, L.J.—This is an action brought to set aside certain gifts made by the plaintiff to the defendant, Miss Skinner, while the plaintiff was a member of a sisterhood of which the defendant was the lady superior. Kekewich, J., dismissed the action, with costs. The plaintiff, by her action, sought to recover two sums of stock transferred by her to the defendant in 1874, which still remained in the name of the defendant, and also all moneys other than annual income which had been from time to time given by the plaintiff to the defendant, and which had been expended by the defendant for the charitable purposes in which the plaintiff and the other members of the sisterhood were engaged.

On this appeal, however, the claim of the plaintiff is confined to the two sums of stock still remaining in the name of the defendant. [The Lord Justice then stated the history of the case, and continued:—] The stock was transferred by the plaintiff in 1874. There is no evidence as to what took place at the time when the transfer was made.

It was urged by the defendant's counsel that there is no difference between the claim of the plaintiff to the stock remaining and her claim to the moneys given by her to the defendant and applied by the defendant to the purposes of the sisterhood. If the money so expended had been applied by the transferee for her own selfish purposes, or had been obtained by fraud or deception on the part of the donee, probably this would have been the case. But if the plaintiff has an equity to set aside gifts made to the defendant, in my opinion the defendant would have a stronger equity against the plaintiff to prevent the plaintiff making the defendant personally liable for money spent by the defendant for the charitable purposes to promote which the plaintiff and the defendant were at the time of the expenditure associated, and which the plaintiff at the time was willing and anxious to promote.

Is the plaintiff entitled to recall the stock now in question and still in hand? There is no decision in point with reference to a case like the present. For, although in Whyte v. Meade a deed of gift by a nun was set aside, there were in that case special circumstances which prevent it being treated as an authority in favour of the plaintiff here. The question is, Does the case fall within the principles laid down by decisions of the Court of Chancery in setting aside voluntary gifts executed by parties who at the time were under such influence as, in the opinion of the court, enabled the donor to set the gift aside? These decisions may be divided into two classes—(1) When the court has been satisfied that the gift was the result of influence expressly used by the donee for the purpose; (2) when the relation between donor and donee have at, or shortly before, the execution of the gift been such as to raise a presumption that the donee had influence over the donor. In such cases the court sets aside the voluntary gift unless it is proved that, in fact, the gift was the result of a free exercise of the donor's will. The first class of cases may be considered as depending on the principle that no one shall be allowed to retain any benefit arising from his own fraud or wrongful act. In the second class of cases the court interferes, not on the ground that any wrongful act has, in fact, been committed by the donee, but on the ground of public policy, and to prevent the relations which existed between the parties and the influence arising therefrom being abused.

Influence has been denied. There is no suggestion the defendant acted from any selfish motive, and it cannot be contended that the case comes under the first class of decisions I have referred to. The question is, whether the case comes within the principle of the second class; and I am of opinion that it does.

At the time of the gift the plaintiff was a professed sister, and as such bound to make absolute submission to the defendant as superior of the sisterhood. She had no power to obtain independent advice. She was in such a position that she could not freely exercise her own will as to the disposal of her property, and she must be considered as being (to use the words of Knight-Bruce, L.J., in Wright v. Vanderplank) "not in the largest and amplest sense of the term, not in mind as well as in person, an entirely free agent."

We have nothing to do with the plaintiff's reason for leaving the sisterhood; but in my opinion when she exercised her legal right to do this she was entitled to recover so much of the money transferred by her as remained in the hands of the defendant, on the ground that it was property the beneficial interest in which she had never effectually parted with. But it was urged that it would be contrary to public policy to grant the plaintiff relief, on the ground that it would be a hindrance to the charitable work in which the plaintiff and the sisterhood were engaged, and that it would be better to show those who were desirous of leaving the work that they could not take with them any part of their property But in my opinion it would be wrong to put such a pressure on those who may wish to leave. Such work, to be effectual, must be done with a willing mind; and in my opinion it would be productive of evil to attempt to retain in such a society as the sisterhood, by the pressure of loss of property, those whose hearts and will are no longer in the work, and who desire to exercise their legal right of withdrawing.

But it is contended that Kekewich, J., decided against the plaintiff on this ground, that she had competent advice—that of her brother—before she joined the sisterhood, and that she then formed the resolution (as Mr. Nihill stated in his evidence) to give everything to the sisterhood, and that this prevents the subsequent transfer being set aside.

In my opinion, even if there were evidence that she had before she joined the sisterhood advice on the question of how she should deal with her property, that would not be sufficient. The question is, I think, whether at the time she executed the transfer she was under such influences as to prevent the gift being considered as that of one free to determine what should be done with her property? No reliance can be placed on the promise made to Mr. Nihill. This could not be enforced, and did not in any way bind her at law or pass the property, and the title of the defendant depends solely on the transfer made in 1874. In my opinion, when the plaintiff left the sisterhood in 1879 she was entitled to set aside the transfer and to have retransferred to her the fund still held by the defendant.

Has she lost this right by delay? The case is not like that of a contract voidable for fraud. There the party defrauded must elect, and within a reasonable time, for until he does so he retains the rights or the benefits, however inadequate, secured to him by the contract. It is to such a case that the judgment in Clough v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 20 W. R. 189, L. R. 7 Ex. 26, applies, and not to a case of voluntary gift like the present, where the person seeking to set aside the transfer never received any benefit whatever from the transaction. There was an attempt to show that in consequence of the plaintiff's delay in bringing the action the defendant and the sisterhood which she represents had incurred liabilities on the faith of retaining the money given by the plaintiff. But I can find no evidence to support this contention. It was contended that in 1883 a lease was taken for the sisterhood at a rent exceeding that for which it had been previously liable. But the lease, if it were of the suggested date, is not in evidence, and the evidence attributes the taking of a larger piece of land at the increased rent to the reliance of Mr. Nihill on the expectations formed in 1870 or 1871, based on the plaintiff's promises that she would give her property to the sisterhood. This defence, in my opinion, therefore fails.

Is the delay (and in this case it was very great) of itself sufficient to deprive the plaintiff of her right to the fund now in the defendant's hands? The defendant has not pleaded the Statute of Limitations, and I do not suggest she could successfully have done so. In cases where the fact of influence depends on the result of conflicting evidence delay must be important, but it cannot be disputed that the plaintiff here was in a state which necessarily subjected her to a powerful influence. The proof of this does not depend on parol evidence, but on the rules and admitted principles of the sisterhood.

Mere delay in endorsing a right is no in itself at defence. It is very different from raising no objection to an act while it is being done, which may be treated as an assent to the act, and, therefore, as being acquiesced in in such a sense as to be an equitable defence. The judgment of Thesiger, L.J., in De Busseche v. Alt is in point. In Wright v. Vanderplank, which was much relied on as regards delay, the action was not brought until ten years after the execution of the deed sought to be set aside, yet Turner, L.J., says, "As to the time which has elapsed, if the case had rested on time only, much might have been said in favour of the plaintiff's claim," and in dismissing the action he relied on the way in which the donor had, during the period subsequent to the execution of the deed, dealt with the property, as recognising the deed as effectual. Moreover, delay in asserting rights cannot be in equity a defence unless the plaintiff were aware of her rights. In her evidence she stated that until long after 1879 she did not know that she could set aside the gift. A letter of June, 1879, was relied on to displace that statement. But the terms of the letter, though apparently inconsistent with her evidence, are ambiguous, and the letter was not put to her in cross-examination. Also it is in evidence that shortly after she left the sisterhood she had some conversation with her brother about her money, and with a Roman Catholic priest who advised her not to trouble herself about it, and also that shortly after she left the sisterhood she consulted with a solicitor about making a fresh will, and that he told her "it was too much money to leave behind her." But I understand that Kekewich, J., did not discredit her evidence as to the time when she first was informed of her right to set aside the gifts to the defendant, and I think that we ought to hold that she did not, until long after 1879, know her rights. The delay which has occurred since 1879 is, I think, a defence against any claim on behalf of the plaintiff to the dividends on the stock now in the name of the defendant before the commencement of the action. But in my opinion it is no defence as regards the stock itself remaining in the hands of the defendant and the dividends accrued since the commencement of the action. At the time when the plaintiff left the sisterhood in 1879 that stock was property which the plaintiff was entitled to claim as being held by the defendant in trust for her. The delay in this case does not, in my opinion, amount to evidence that the plaintiff recognized the gift as her own spontaneous act, nor can it be relied on as having deprived the plaintiff of any evidence in her favour which could have been adduced if the plaintiff had brought her action shortly after she left the sisterhood. I think the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for retransfer to her of the stock in question, and for payment of the dividends accrued since the commencement of the action.

LINDLEY, L.J. [after reviewing the facts, continued:—] Two questions are raised by the appeal—first, whether the gifts made by the plaintiff to the sisterhood were revocable or irrevocable when made; secondly, whether, assuming them to have been revocable when made, it was competent for the plaintiff to revoke them when she did. There is no statutory law in this country prohibiting such gifts unless what is given is land or money to be laid out in land. These are provided for by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Acts. But they have no application to this case. The common law, as distinguished from equity, does not invalidate such gifts as these. There being no duress or fraud, the only ground for impeaching such gifts at law would be want of capacity on the part of the donor, and although the plaintiff was a religious enthusiast, no one could treat her as, in point of law, non compos mentis. There is no authority whatever for saying that her gifts were invalid at law.

It is to the doctrines of equity, then, that recourse must be had to invalidate such gifts, if they are to be invalidated. The doctrine relied upon by the appellant is the doctrine of undue influence, expounded and enforced in Huguenin v. Baseley and other cases of that class. The defendant there had not only acquired considerable personal influence over the plaintiff, but was intrusted by her with the management of her property. His duty to her was clear; and it was with reference to persons so situated that Lord Eldon used the language so often quoted and so much relied on in this case. He said (at p. 299):—"Take it that she (the plaintiff) intended to give it to him (the defendant); it is by no means out of the reach of the principle. The question is not whether she knew what she was doing, had done, or proposed to do, but how the intention was produced; whether all that care and providence was placed around her as against those who advised her which, from their situation and relation with respect to her, they were bound to exert on her behalf." This principle has been constantly recognized and acted upon in subsequent cases, but in all of them, as in Huguenin v. Baseley itself, it was the duty of the donee to advise and take care of the donor. Where there is no such duty the language of Lord Eldon ceases to be applicable. What, then, is the principle? Is it that it is right and expedient to save persons from the consequences of their own folly? Or is it that it is right and expedient to save them from being victimized by other people? In my opinion the doctrine of undue influence is founded on the second of these two principles. The undue influence which courts of equity endeavour to defeat is the undue influence of one person over another, not the influence of enthusiasm on the enthusiast who is carried away by it—unless, indeed, such enthusiasm is itself the result of external undue influence. But the influence of one mind over another is very subtle, and of all influence religious influence is the most dangerous and the most powerful, and to counteract it courts of equity have gone very far. They have not shrunk from setting aside gifts made to persons in a position to exercise undue influence over the donors, although there has been no proof of the actual exercise of such influence, and the courts have done this on the avowed ground of the necessity of going this length in order to protect persons from the exercise of such influence under circumstances which render proof of it impossible. The courts have required proof of its non-existence, and, failing that proof, have set aside gifts otherwise unimpeachable.

In this particular case I cannot find any proof that any gift made by the plaintiff was the result of any actual exercise of power or influence on the part of the lady superior or of Mr. Nihill, apart from the influence necessarily incidental to their position to the sisterhood. Everything that the plaintiff did is, in my opinion, referable to her own willing submission to the vows she took and to the rules which she approved, and to her own enthusiastic devotion to the life and work of the sisterhood. I believe that in this case there was, in fact, no undue or undue influence brought to bear on the plaintiff other than such as inevitably resulted from the training she had received, the promise she had made, the vows she had taken, and the rules to which she had submitted herself. But her gifts were, in fact, made under a pressure which, while it lasted, the plaintiff could not resist, and were not, in my opinion, past recall when that pressure was removed. When the plaintiff emancipated herself from the spell by which she was bound she was entitled to invoke the aid of the court in order to obtain the restoration from the defendant of so much of the plaintiff's property as had not been spent in accordance with the wishes of the plaintiff, but remained in the hands of the defendant. The plaintiff now demands no more.

As to the second point—whether it is too late for the plaintiff to invoke the assistance of the court, more than six years having elapsed between the time when the plaintiff left the sisterhood and the commencement of the action. It is not necessary to decide whether this delay alone would be a sufficient defence to the action. The case by no means rests on mere lapse of time. There is far more than inactivity and delay on the part of the plaintiff. There is conduct amounting to confirmation of the gift. Gifts liable to be set aside by the courts on the ground of undue influence have always been treated as voidable, not void. A gift made in terms absolute and unconditional naturally leads the donee to regard it as his own, and the longer he is left under this impression the more difficult it is justly to deprive him of what he has naturally so regarded. So long as the relation between the donor and the donee which invalidates the gift lasts, so long is it necessary to hold that lapse of time affords no sufficient ground for refusing relief to the donor. But this necessarily ceases when the relation itself comes to an end; and if the donor desires to have his gift declared invalid and set aside, he ought, in my opinion, to seek relief within a reasonable time after the removal of the influence under which the gift was made. If he does not the inference is strong, and if the lapse of time is long the inference becomes inevitable and conclusive, that the donor is content not to call the gift in question; or, in other words, that he elects not to avoid it, or, what is the same thing in effect, that he ratifies and confirms it. In this case the plaintiff considered when she left the sisterhood what course she should take, and she determined to do nothing, but to leave matters where they were. She insisted on having her will back, but she never asked for her money until the end of five years or so after she left the sisterhood. In this state of things I can only come to the conclusion that she deliberately chose not to attempt to avoid her gifts, but to acquiesce in them, or, if the expression is preferred, to ratify or confirm them. Looking this as a question of fact, and upon the evidence I can come to no other conclusion than that which I have mentioned. Moreover, by demanding her will and not her money she made her resolution known to the defendant. It was urged that the plaintiff did not know her rights until shortly before she asked for her money back. But, in the first place, I am not satisfied that the plaintiff did not know that it was at least questionable whether the defendant could retain the plaintiff's money if she insisted on having it back. In the next place, if the plaintiff did not know her rights her ignorance was simply the result of her own resolution not to inquire into them; nor is it an answer to an equitable defence based on laches and acquiescence. Again, it was urged that the defendant had not been prejudiced by the delay, and that nothing has been done on the faith that the plaintiff would not require her money to be returned to her. But I do not think this material. I treat the money as absolutely given to the sisterhood when the plaintiff determined not to ask for it back, which she did in 1880. But, further, I cannot come to the conclusion that nothing has been done on the faith of the money being the property of the sisterhood. It is contrary to human nature to suppose the plaintiff's money was not for years regarded as the money of the sisterhood, and that they did not act on that assumption and make their arrangements accordingly. Mr. Nihill's evidence satisfies me that they did so, although I do not think he shows that they took any particular steps on the faith of having the particular sum now sought to be taken from them. It is not, however, in my opinion, necessary to prove so much as that. Whether the plaintiff's conduct amounts, in point of law, to acquiescence or laches, or whether it amounts to an election not to avoid a voidable transaction, or whether it amounts to a ratification or confirmation of her gifts, are questions of mere words which it is needless to discuss. In my judgment it would not be fair or right to the defendant to compel her now to restore the money sought to be recovered by this appeal. Nor, in my opinion, would such a result be in conformity with sound legal or equitable principles. Upon this ground, therefore, I am of opinion the appeal ought to be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—This is a case of great importance. There are no authorities which govern it; my brethren, on whose experience in matters of equity I naturally rely, differ, and on that ground I think it right to express my own views upon the point. It is a question which must be decided upon broad principles, and we have to consider what is the principle, and what is the limitation of the principle, as to voluntary gifts where there is no fraud on the part of the defendant, but where there is an all powerful religious influence which disturbs the independent judgment of one of the parties, and which subordinates for all worldly purposes the will of that person to the will of the other.

It seems to me that it is of essential importance to keep quite distinct two things which, in their nature, seem to me to be different—the rights of the donor, and the duties of the donee, and the obligations which are imposed upon the conscience of the donee by the principles of this court. As to the rights of the donor in a case like this, I entertain no doubt. It seems to me that persons who are under the most complete influence of religious feeling are perfectly free to act upon it in the disposition of their property, and not the less because they are enthusiasts. Persons of this kind are not dead in law. They are dead, indeed, to the world, so far as their own wishes and feelings about the things of the world are concerned, but such indifference to things external does not prevent them, in law, from being free agents. In the present instance there was no duress, no incompetency, no want of mental power on the part of the donor. It seems to me that, so far as regards her rights, she had the absolute right to deal with her property as she chose. Passing next to the duties of the donee, it seems to me that, although this power of perfect disposition remains in the donor under circumstances like the present, it is plain that equity will not allow a person who exercises or employs a dominant religious influence over another to benefit directly or indirectly by the gifts which the donor makes under or in consequence of such influence, unless it is shown that the donor, at the time of making the gift, was allowed full and free opportunity for counsel and advice outside—the means of considering his or her worldly position and exercising an independent will about it. This is not a limitation placed on the action of the donor; it is a fetter placed on the conscience of the recipient of the gift, and one which arises out of public policy and fair play. If this had been the gift of a chattel, therefore, the property would have then passed in law, and the distinction between the gift of a chattel and the gift of money may be treated as a pecuniary one only for this purpose.

Now, that being the rule, in the first place, was the plaintiff entitled to the benefit of it? She had vowed in the most sacred and solemn way absolute and implicit obedience to the will of the defendant, her superior, and she was bound altogether to reject the advice of externs, not to consult those outside the convent. Now I offer no sort of criticism on institutions of this sort: no kind of criticism on the action of those who enter them or of those who administer them. In the abstract I respect their motives, but it is obvious that it is exactly to this class of case that the rule of equity which I have mentioned ought to be applied if it exists. It seems to me the plaintiff—so long as she was fettered by this vow, so long as she was under the dominant influence of this religious feeling—was a person entitled to the protection of this rule. Now was the defendant bound by this rule? I acquit her most entirely of all selfish feeling in the matter. I can see no sort of wrongful desire to appropriate to herself any worldly benefit from the gift: but nevertheless she was a person who benefited by it, so far as the disposition of the property was concerned, although no doubt she meant to use it in conformity with the rules of the institution and did so use it. I pause one moment to say a word as to the view of Kekewich, J., which is not quite consistent with the above. He seems to have thought that the question turned on the original intention of the donor at the time she entered the convent, and that what passed subsequently could be treated as if it were a mere mechanical performance of a complete mental intention originally formed. I entirely agree with the view presented to us by the counsel for the appellant as to that part of the judgment of Kekewich, J. It seems to me that it is not the point upon which the case turns, that the standard of duty was originally created by the plaintiff herself, although her original intention is one of the facts, no doubt, which bear upon the case and is not to be neglected. But it is not the crucial fact. We ought to look, it seems to me, at the time at which the gift was made and to examine what was then the condition of the donor who sought to make it.

For those reasons I think that, without any interference with the freedom of persons to deal with their property as they please, we ought to and can hold but one opinion—viz, that in 1879 the plaintiff could have set this gift aside.

Then comes the question of the time which has elapsed since. What effect has time upon a right to the protection of this rule? The rule is an equity arising out of public policy. I do not think that delay in itself is an absolute bar, though it is a fact to be considered in determining the inference of fact which, it appears to me, we must draw on the one side or the other. The principle of the rule arises out of public policy, and imposes a fetter on the conscience of the recipient of the gift. When is that barrier removed from the conscience of the recipient of the gift? It seems to me that the common-sense answer ought to be—and I think the right answer is—as soon as the donor escapes from the religious influence which hampered her at the time, as soon as she becomes free, and has determined to leave the gift where it is.

Now, if she has so acted, if her delay has been so long as reasonably to induce the recipient to think and to act upon the belief that the gift is to lie where it has been laid, then by estoppel it appears to me that the donor would be prevented from revoking it. But I do not base my decision on that ground. I do not base my decision at all upon that view that she is estopped by the delay. But a long time has elapsed—five years. Every day and hour of those five years the plaintiff has had opportunity of reflecting upon her past life and upon what she had done. She has had that opportunity since she passed away from the influence of the defendant, and that she has so passed away is demonstrated by the fact that she has entered the Church of Rome—a different religious community. The influence, therefore, ceased completely. She was surrounded by persons perfectly competent to give her proper advice. She had her solicitor, she had her brother, a barrister himself, and she had the directors of the consciences of the community she had entered. I draw unhesitatingly the inference from these circumstances that she did, in or shortly after 1879, consider this matter and determine not to interfere with her previous disposition. Was she aware of her rights then? I incline to think she must have been, having regard to the advisers who surrounded her; but I do not consider it to be essential to draw that inference. It is enough if she were aware that she might have rights and deliberately determined not to inquire what they were or to act upon them. I again unhesitatingly draw the inference that she was aware she had, or might have, rights, and that she deliberately made up her mind not to enforce them.

In drawing this inference of fact, I do no discredit to the character of the plaintiff, which is above all reproach; but, on carefully considering her evidence, I do not feel that I can place reliance on her memory, and, in my opinion, it would be wrong to draw the inference from her evidence that she did in her own mind never form any definite view about the property she left behind in the convent. In my opinion the appeal must be dismissed, on the ground that the time which has elapsed, though not a bar in itself, though not amounting to laches, which disentitles the plaintiff to relief, is, nevertheless, coupled with the other facts of the case, a matter from which but one reasonable inference ought to be drawn by men of the world—viz., that the plaintiff considered her position at the time, and elected and chose not to disturb the gift which she then at that moment felt if she had the will, she had the power, to disturb.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 35 W. R. 68, 18 Q. B. D. 1, distinguished.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and A. L. Smith, J.).

The action was brought to recover possession of goods assigned by a bill of sale which contained clauses by which the mortgagor undertook to pay the rent, rates, taxes, and outgoings of the premises whereon the goods might be within seven days after the same should become payable, and to produce to the mortgagees on demand the receipts for such rent, &c. The bill of sale proceeded: "And if the mortgagor shall neglect or refuse to pay the said rent, rates, taxes, and outgoings within the said seven days, or on the expiration thereof to produce to the mortgagees as aforesaid the respective receipts for such rent, rates, taxes, and outgoings respectively, then and in any such case it shall be lawful for the mortgagees, if they shall think fit, to pay any rent, rates, taxes, and outgoings of the said premises which may then be due and owing, and all sums of money so paid by the mortgagees, together with interest thereon, shall be charged upon the goods assigned and shall be recoverable in the same manner as the principal moneys and interest hereby secured." It was further declared that the goods assigned should not be liable to seizure or to be taken possession of by the mortgagees for any cause other than those specified in section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882.

The county court judge nonsuited the plaintiffs on the ground that the bill of sale was bad, and the Divisional Court having refused to interfere the plaintiffs appealed.

Bonsll, for the appellants.—The form of this bill of sale is identical with that held to be bad by Bowen, L.J., sitting at Nisi Prius in Bianchi v. Offord, 17 Q. B. D. 484, 35 W. R. Dig. 27. That case, however, was inconsistent with Ex parte Stanford, In re Barber, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 259, and has been impliedly overruled by Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 35 W. R. 68, 18 Q. B. D. 1.

J. F. Clerk (Finlay, Q.C., with him), for the respondent.—This bill of sale differs from those in Goldstrom v. Tallerman and Ex parte Stanford, since it contains the words "shall be recoverable in the same manner as the principal moneys and interest hereby secured." Those words give a power of seizure in default of payment which cannot be cancelled by the general clause against seizure. The provision has been held not to be necessary for the maintenance of the security in Bianchi v. Offord.

He also cited Hetherington v. Groome, 33 W. R. 103, 13 Q. B. D. 789.

Bonsll replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It is admitted in this case that the bill of sale is in the same terms as that in Bianchi v. Offord. It is also admitted that the words are not the same as those used in Ex parte Stanford and Goldstrom v. Tallerman. The question therefore arises whether we are prepared to overrule Bianchi v. Offord. I am not inclined to do so. That case decided that this provision was not necessary for the maintenance of the security. The stipulation certainly is not within the form given in the schedule to the Act, and it could only be inserted if it were necessary for the maintenance of the security. Therefore the bill of sale is bad and this appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Undoubtedly the cases on the Bills of Sale Acts are not entirely satisfactory, and the distinctions between them are very narrow. Now this clause provides that the sums paid by the mortgagees are to be recoverable in the same manner as the principal sum and interest. How is that recovered? By action on the covenant and by seizure. Therefore these sums were to be recovered by seizure.

But section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, provides that there shall be no seizure except where there is default in the payment of the money thereby secured or in the performance of any covenant contained in the bill of sale which is necessary for the maintenance of the security. This clause is, therefore, at variance with section 7, and has been held to be so by Bowen, L.J., in Bianchi v. Offord. Nor can that variance be cured by the insertion of the general clause against seizure for any other cause than those specified in section 7. Such a general clause cannot be admitted to cure defects in the bill of sale. In my opinion Bianchi v. Offord was a correct decision and was not interfered with by Goldstrom v. Tallerman. In the latter case it was provided that the money so paid by the mortgagees for rent, &c., was to be a charge upon the assigned chattels, but there was no provision that it was to be recoverable in the same way as the principal sum. Therefore there could be no seizure for non-payment in that case. The same was the case in Ex parte Stanford. Those decisions are therefore distinguishable from Bianchi v. Offord. I agree in that decision, and I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—In my opinion this bill of sale is void, because it has not the same legal effect as the form given in the schedule to the Act. It contains a provision which is not contained in that form and which is not necessary for the maintenance of the security, and cannot therefore be imported into the bill of sale. The case is on all fours with Bianchi v. Offord, with which I entirely agree, and which I think is easily distinguishable from Ex parte Stanford and Goldstrom v. Tallerman.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division, reported ante, p. 62.

In an action in the Sheffield District Registry of the High Court to recover a sum due in respect of the rent of a house, and for an account of rents collected by the defendant as agent for the plaintiff, after statement of defence was delivered an order was made for an account.

Upon the account being taken, the District Registrar certified that £3 in all was due to the plaintiff, and the defendant amended his defence by paying this sum into court as sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim.

The plaintiff accepted this sum in satisfaction, and applied at chambers for an order for costs upon the High Court scale. Kekewich, J., made an order allowing the plaintiff costs upon the County Court Scale B.

The Divisional Court revessed this order, on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to make it.

The plaintiff appealed.

Morton Daniel, for the plaintiff.

T. W. Chitty, for the defendant.

The County Courts Act, 1867, s. 5; Judicature Act, 1873, s. 67; Rules of Court, 1888, ord. 65, rr. 1, 12, were referred to.

BOWEN, L.J.—In this case Kekewich, J., had made an order by which costs were to be allowed to the plaintiff upon County Court Scale B. The Divisional Court held that there was no jurisdiction to make that order. The question is whether that order of the judge was within the scope and area of his discretion. The facts are important, and when they are clearly understood the manner in which the judge exercised his discretion becomes clear.

The action was brought in the Sheffield District Registry of the High Court for rent of a house held by the defendant of the plaintiff, and for an account of rents received by the defendant as agent for the plaintiff. The writ, therefore, was indorsed with a claim for an account as well as for rent. Shortly after the issue of the writ an order was made for an account by the district registrar, which order does not seem to have been opposed on the ground that it was necessary to take the account before the action was proceeded with. The defendant did not produce a proper account at first, but only did so after some trouble; and when the account was finally taken the district registrar certified that £3 was due to the plaintiff.

Thereupon the defendant paid this sum into court with his statement of defence, and the plaintiff took it out in satisfaction, and applied for costs upon the High Court scale. Kekewich, J., must have considered that the action was not merely to recover £3, but was an action to compel the defendant to account, founded on a breach of contract to account, because he allowed costs on the higher county court scale. So far, it was a matter upon which he would have before him the materials for arriving at a proper conclusion; and unless he was wrong we cannot interfere. Indeed, it seems to me that his order was perfectly right, unless he had no jurisdiction to make it.

Now it is said that section 5 of the County Courts Act, 1867, applies. That section enacts that if in any action in the superior courts the plaintiff shall recover a sum less than £20, if the action is founded on contract, he shall not be entitled to any costs of suit unless the judge certify that there was sufficient reason for bringing such action in the superior court. The argument was twofold: First, that this action came within that section, being an action founded on contract in which the plaintiff only recovered £3; and, secondly, that, although a judge might allow costs on the High Court scale, he had no right to steer a midway course and give costs upon County Court Scale B.

With regard to the first it is not necessary to decide whether this is an action founded on contract, within the meaning of that section, in which the plaintiff recovers less than £20. It seems to me that there is a good deal to be said against that contention because the claim is for an account as well as for a sum of money. Does an action for an account, to which is added a claim for the sum found due upon taking the account, become an action for the sum so found due? I do not decide it, and so I pass to the second branch of the argument, that a judge must either make no order or give costs on the High Court scale. As a rule, in 1867, costs followed the event. Then came the Judicature Act, 1873, and though section 67 of that Act applies section 5 of the County Courts Act, 1867, to all actions in the High Court in which any relief is sought which can be given in the county court, it leaves the construction of that section to be determined. When we turn to ord. 65, r. 1, it becomes plain that the costs of actions in the High Court are placed in the discretion of the court or a judge, except in particular cases. Therefore, even if the judge had no power before the Judicature Act to make the half-and-half order made in this case, he now has power to do so. Therefore it seems to me to be clear that Kekewich, J., had power, instead of either making no order or giving the plaintiff the full costs, to make this order, which does more perfect justice than could have been done previously. That being so, the court below ought not to have interfered with the exercise of his discretion, and so this appeal must be allowed. The only difficulty, it seems to me, in this case is to apply well-known principles of law to the facts before us, and I rather gather that the case was not so fully argued in the court below as here, and that the argument, as is often the case, proceeded upon a different footing.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that Kekewich, J., had no power to make this order. I myself doubt whether section 5 of the County Courts Act, 1867, applies to an action the substantial part of which is not a money demand but a claim such as this for an account. I abstain, however, from expressing any opinion upon it. It is said that, assuming the case to be within the section, the judge had only one of two alternatives, either to make no order or to give costs on the High Court scale. The view I take is that the Judicature Act and Rules have incorporated into the second alternative in that section the power to give costs less than the full High Court costs. The judge has power to moderate and modify the High Court scale if he does not think fit to give the full High Court costs. The learned judge having jurisdiction to make the order he did, the exercise of his discretion ought not to have been interfered with, and I further say that, in my opinion, that discretion was rightly exercised.
